

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

in the House of Commons that, in consequence of a representation of the Scotch Members, he had resolved to give up that portion of the Bill. A more unfortunate resolution could not have been arrived at. The Inspector General of Constabulary in Scotland, speaking in his last year's Report on this subject, said—

“I must urge strongly the establishment of a superannuation, such as exists amongst the London, Manchester, and other large police forces. It is the one thing most urgently called for, and it is necessary to the efficiency of the police in Scotland.”

Two English Inspectors speak of a superannuation fund as an all-important and vital subject; as the only means of making the police force efficient. As to the other question, whether there ought to be a separate police in burghs distinct from that in the counties? he was informed, and he believed that this arrangement did not work harmoniously; that it very often happened that there was a conflict between the operations of the county police and those of the burgh police, the result of which was that the detection of offenders was rather hindered than promoted. In England, whatever local power exists is in the hands of the magistrates. But in Scotland, the police received commands from four, or perhaps five, different sets of people—the Commissioners of Supply, the Police Committee, the Justices of Peace in General or Quarter Sessions assembled, and finally, the Sheriff—and this want of concentration of authority produced an unfortunate effect on the constabulary. There was a universal system of Procurators Fiscal in Scotland. The Procurators Fiscal made inquiries into alleged offences, and the Chief Constables made inquiries into the same offences, and through this double inquiry justice often failed. The interference of the Procurator Fiscal in the operations of the Chief Constable did more harm than good. He thought the proposed Committee ought to inquire by which of those two parties the investigation of an alleged offence ought to be conducted. The functions of the Procurator Fiscal were not the product of any recent Police Act, but dated from times when such a force as that of our new police had never been thought of. It was their business to receive and procure the earliest information of any offence having been committed, to take immediate steps for obtaining evidence thereupon, and to perform, in fact, many of the duties which were now supposed to devolve upon a wellconstituted police force. When the General Police Act was passed in 1857, the position and functions of the Procurators Fiscal were left untouched and undefined, and consequence was that great misunderstanding and heart-burning were of constant occurrence between themselves and the Chief Constable, and that it sometimes happened that the Chief Constable and the Procurator Fiscal were each engaged making investigations into the circumstances connected with some offence or crime independently. Of course, the officers of justice were thus liable to be defeated. Moreover, the Procurators Fiscal were not entitled, or thought themselves entitled, to give orders to the constables, and thus it had happened that, in large counties, the Chief Constable was for days ignorant of the employment in which his men were engaged. Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the indefiniteness of the relation between the Chief Constable and the Procurator Fiscal, and an inquiry into the functions was most necessary, with a view to a proper understanding of the position of each of those officials. An inquiry into the working of the police system of Scotland would not be complete without including in it the case of the Border counties in relation to the enforcement of the Saltnet Laws. The noble Earl concluded by moving for the appointment of a Select Committee.

LORD CLINTON said, there was no objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the proposition of the noble Earl, that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into this subject. There was no doubt that the subject had excited much interest in Scotland, and that, owing to an occasional division and conflict of authority among those who had the management of these matters, a good deal of inconvenience had arisen, and might again arise, unless some alteration were made. It was, therefore, desirable that the whole subject should be referred to a Select Committee, who could investigate the matter, and suggest any improvements which they might deem requisite.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he was glad to hear there were to be no objections offered to the Motion of his noble Friend. The present Acts stood in need of amendment. He did not, however, concur with the noble Earl in his view respecting one clause of the present Act, providing for the appointment of additional policemen; and he should be sorry to see the glance at the extraordinary complication of the accounts required to be produced by the Bill. There were statements of accounts, and balance sheet for the preceding half-year, and estimates of expenditure on capital account for the next half-year, for lines in the course of construction, rolling stock, works not commenced, &c., and if there was a single error in any of these, unless the officer of the company who had signed these accounts could prove that he was ignorant of it, he would be liable to all the penalties of the clause. Two practical evils would arise from such legislation. First, if they attached disgraceful penalties to the ordinary performance of any particular duty they would not find respectable people to perform it. But, in the second place, if such a power were placed in the hands of some particular Judges, it might be attended with the greatest oppression. No one had greater respect than he had for the general character and ability of the Judges of the English Bench; but they were fallible, and might have crotchets. It was just possible that a Judge might be appointed who might have a crotchet against railway officials, and might have a notion that all railway directors were rogues and ought to be sent to prison on the slightest grounds. He put the question to-day to one who was perfectly conversant with the subject—"What should be done if this clause were carried?" and the answer was—"We must appoint officers who know nothing of the accounts, and they can always prove that they are ignorant, and always sign." It would be much better to proceed on the ordinary rules of law, and unless a man was shown to be guilty of wilful falsification he should not be punished. He should move the insertion of some such words as "if he be cognizant thereof."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Marquess had drawn such a picture of the consequences which, in his own case, might result from the enactment of the clause as it stood that he feared it would be impossible to persevere with it without some alteration. His noble Friend had also suggested the mode by which a railway company might escape the operation of the clause in a manner reflecting credit upon the ingenuity of those bodies generally, and of his noble Friend in particular. If the noble Marquess would allow him (the Lord Chancellor) to suggest an Amendment in the Clause he thought it would meet the object which they all had in view. He, therefore, proposed to alter the clause thus—

"That if any statement, balance-sheet, estimate, or report, which is required by this Act, be false in any particular to the knowledge of the auditor or officer of the Company who signs the same for the Company, such auditor or officer shall be liable, upon conviction thereof on indictment to fine or imprisonment."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was entirely satisfied with that.

LORD ROMILLY hoped that the noble and learned Lord would, during the vacation, adopt the views which had been so clearly stated by the noble Marquess, and would not throw upon persons accused the onus of proving their innocence.

Clause amended and agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 13, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Carriers' Act. Rate of Insurance).

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE opposed the clause, not with a view to its ultimate rejection, but to give time for further consideration, so that an amended clause might be inserted.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought that the suggestion was perfectly reasonable, especially as the clause in its present shape was acceptable to neither party interested. He therefore proposed on the Report to bring up an amended Clause. He thought that the best plan would be that the words which had reference to silk should be withdrawn altogether from the Bill, and that next Session a Select Committee should be appointed to consider the Carriers' Act. Persons who dealt largely in silk complained that the Carriers' Act affected them very injuriously. It was said that Railway Companies refused in some cases to carry silk at all; whilst, on the other hand, it was said that the claims received from silk people were exorbitantly high. He would on the Report bring up an amended clause, and then it could be considered whether it should form part of the Bill.

Clause negatived.

Clause 15 (Fares to be posted in Stations).

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE suggested the insertion of the word "ordinary" before the word "fares."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought it would be better, instead of adopting the noble Duke's Amendment, to insert after the words "fares of passengers" the communication" should be provided. Suppose it turned out that there were no efficient means of communicating between the passengers and drivers of the train—would all the companies be liable to the penalty unless the means were efficient? He recommended the noble Duke to re-construct the clause in a more detailed form, because at present it might entail very considerable litigation.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the noble Marquess would find in the second line of the clause the words "shall provide," and this, he thought, would dispose of the first question raised. The noble Marquess would doubtless remember that the subject of the clause had been under consideration for upwards of a year at least, and that last Session a Bill specially dealing with it had passed through the Commons and very nearly through this House. The matter had occupied his serious attention during the Recess, experiments had been made, and he had every reason to believe that, if the clause were inserted as it stood, the company would be obliged to provide means of communication between the passengers and the servants of the company while the train was in motion, and to provide such communication to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Arbitration of Damages), agreed to.

EARL GREY said, that an existing law required railway companies to use engines consuming their smoke; but it had become a dead letter, because there was no one to enforce it. He therefore desired to insert a clause in this Bill to enact that all railway companies required by law to use engines consuming their own smoke should be guilty of an offence every time their engines should be found emitting opaque smoke, and that the police, borough and county, should be required to summon the offender. As long as only a general law stood on the statute book without any provisions for enforcing it, railways would transgress the Act with impunity, because no private person would take the trouble to prosecute. He had framed his Clauses on the precedent of the Act of 1854, by which it was provided that steam engines should consume their own smoke; and efficiency was sought to be given to that law, making it the duty of the police to lay informations against the owners of every steam engine in cases where the law was not observed. He would begin by moving the first of the series of clauses, of which he had given Notice, and if this were adopted, he would then move the other which would be required to give it effect.

Moved, after Clause 17, to insert the following clause:—

"If a Locomotive Engine used by any Railway Company which is required by Law to use Engines consuming their own Smoke shall be seen to emit opaque Smoke, it shall be lawful for any Person to lay a Complaint against such Company before any Justice of the Peace acting for the Division of the County or for the Borough wherein such Cause of Complaint shall arise."—(Earl Grey.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he must admit that he had not given sufficient attention to the noble Earl's Amendment; for although it had been placed on the table before Easter it had escaped his notice; but if the noble Earl would postpone his Motion until the Report of Amendments was brought up, which it was proposed to fix for this day week, he would see what could be done to meet the noble Earl's wishes. He thought the clause of the noble Earl required amendment.

EARL GREY said, he would be content to leave the matter in his hands entirely.

Clause negatived.

Clause 18 agreed to.

Clause 19 (Arbitrator appointed by Board of Trade), agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved the addition of a clause to provide that the Board of Trade should have power to enforce the recommendations of its officers regarding the construction and maintenance in repair of railways. His object was to prevent accidents through neglect to repair the bridges of a line or the permanent way generally.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought the effect of the clause proposed by the noble Marquess would be to shift the responsibility in the case of accidents from the shoulders of the railway companies to those of the Board of Trade, a change which would, in his opinion, be very disastrous to the interests of the public. An Inspector was invariably sent down to inquire into the causes of accidents; and though the Board of Trade could not compel the railway companies to pay implicit attention to his directions, the refusal to afford him any facilities he might require in the performance of his duties or inat-

PARLIAMENT—POINT OF ORDER.
QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask Mr. Speaker, Whether it is competent to a Member to give notice of the names of hon. Members to serve upon a Committee, when the House has not even decided that the Bill which was the subject of his notice should be referred to a Select Committee?

MR. SPEAKER: Such a notice as that would be of no effect.

ARMY—MALT LIQUOR FOR THE TROOPS IN INDIA.—QUESTIONS.

MR. M. T. BASS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been drawn to a practice, said to have been adopted in India, for restoring unsound Malt Liquor supplied to the Troops; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any Correspondence on the subject?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that his attention was drawn to this question last autumn; and, after receiving from the Government in India an explanation of the practice pursued, it was thought advisable to refer the question to high chemical authority in this country. The result of such reference went to show that to treat beer in the manner described, was attended with an advantage to the troops, and an order was sent out that the practice should be continued. He had no objection to lay the Papers on the table.

Afterwards—

MR. GREENE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he considers that the habit of taking the lowest tender for beer for the supply of the Troops in India is calculated to give the Troops a sound, wholesome beverage, and, whether he has thought it desirable to ascertain if at the price accepted for last season's supply it was possible to produce beer calculated to travel eight thousand miles by sea and a thousand or two thousand miles by land and be fit for the Soldiers to drink?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, it was not the case that the lowest tender for beer was taken as a matter of course. Specified particulars were sent to the brewers, the brewing was effected under the inspection of officers, and chemical tests were subsequently applied. More than that, the brewers were bound to furnish the Inland Revenue with certificates in respect of the brewing. This system had hitherto worked very satisfactorily, no complaints having been made of the quality of the beer supplied to the troops.

IRELAND—CARDINAL CULLEN.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, on the occasion of the reception of the Prince of Wales, made inquiry of the Government by what style and title he was to invite and receive Cardinal Cullen; whether he was instructed to address him in the invitation by the title of "His Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin;" if not, by what title; and, whether, on that occasion, precedence was granted to Cardinal Cullen immediately after the Royal Family, and before the Archbishops of the Established Church in Ireland, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the whole of the English and Irish Nobility?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, no communication of any kind whatever took place between the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and Her Majesty's Government on account of state when he really intended to bring on the Scotch Reform Bill. As it was more than two months since the Bill had been read a second time, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see the importance—indeed, the propriety—of fixing without further delay a day for the Committee.

MR. DISRAELI: I beg, Sir, in answer to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, to say that I think he must allow me to judge myself of the propriety of my conduct in endeavouring to bring about, as I wish anxiously to do, the earliest possible dissolution of this House. With a view to that result I am as desirous as he can be that the Scotch Reform Bill should be discussed in Committee without any unnecessary delay; but I must take everything into consideration when arranging the course of Business, and I do not think I am open to the charge of having been guilty of any neglect in respect of this Bill. Propositions which interfered with the Government Business were brought forward by other persons, but I could not prevent that. It is of great importance that the Boundary Bill should be proceeded with on Thursday, and, therefore, the Scotch Reform Bill cannot be placed first on that day. I believe it would not be satisfactory to have it put down as the second Order on the day when it is intended to discuss it, but I will give it the first evening I can after Thursday.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. CORRY said, it was very important to go on with Supply without delay, as only a very small portion of the Estimates had at present been agreed to. Under these circumstances he appealed to the hon. Members for Rye (Captain Mackinnon) and Tavistock (Mr. Samuda) to postpone the Motions of which they had given notice.

THE IRON-CLAD FLEET.

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPTAIN MACKINNON said, that his Motion was of such importance that he must decline to postpone it. He received his early training in the old wooden walls of the navy of England, and retained vivid impressions of the strict, but just, discipline of that magnificent fleet. He had an earnest desire to see the navy the future holding the same position efficiency and imperishable renown that of bygone days. This was his reason for drawing attention to the fault inferior, and retrograde construction of a large portion of our iron-clad fleet. Information had been obtained mainly from the records of the public Press, papers and pamphlets published at various times by naval officers, as well as from Parliamentary Returns. These sources of information had created an impression in mind that, during the last five years, large sums of money had been wasted in the Construction Department of the Navy owing, apparently, to a want of skill and experience in that Department. He had not, however, arrived at this conclusion without giving due consideration to the counter opinions and apologies in the organs of the Press which were supposed to convey the opinions of the Controller of the Navy's Department. He referred to naval articles and naval intelligence in certain daily and weekly papers, and concluded that he should not be contradicted when he assumed that those writings were the inspirations of that Department, as that a system of official communication had been carried on during the last five years on naval matters in the Press to a greater extent than had ever been known before. In illustration of his meaning he might mention that an article in the Arm and Navy Gazette of the 14th of March forestalled the usual statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty in the introduction of the Navy Estimates, and conveyed intelligence of a peculiarly departmental and confidential character which marked its official origin; and its object appeared to have been to commit the present Board of Admiralty, by the evidence of their present intentions, to an approval of the past, and to compromise them so as to secure their defensive co-operation with the present Controller's Department. The most important feature, however, was the indication that the article afforded of the purpose for which the monies proposed to be voted in the Estimates for building purposes was to be appropriated—namely, for another Hercules, for another Invincible, for another Monarch, and for a Monitor, all on Mr. Reed's designs. A Return of the state of the iron-clad fleet was laid upon the table of the House each year. He held a copy of such Returns for 1866 and 1867 in his hand; but was compelled to complain of it impose any practical impediment to the production of good sea-going vessels. While the Warrior class fulfilled the requirements of their day of progress, the vessels of Mr. Reed had not done so. He ventured to say that not one vessel designed by Mr. Reed had been a type for another which should follow. His first frigate, corvette, and gunboat were now obsolete; his "plough-bow" was discarded as a blunder. His great love—the broadside system—was in its last agonies; and the Estimates for building for the last five years had been wasted to a great extent in endeavouring to drive a smaller class of broadside vessels, with forms at variance with science and experience, at a great speed by dint of enormous horse power. Without entering into particulars, he maintained that, in the designs of Mr. Watts, the broad rules of science and experience in naval architecture were not departed from, and they afforded sufficient evidence of the direction which in the future should have guided wise and teachable men, or unprejudiced minds, in the pathway of improvement. Sir Baldwin Walker and Mr. Watts were of opinion that to carry heavy armour combined with great speed, at the same time insuring good sea-going qualities in broadside vessels, the large proportions, like those of the first six vessels, were a necessity; if iron-clad broadside vessels of a smaller class were desirable a reduction of speed was a necessity. Yet, the present Chief Constructor thought differently, and undertook to prove the contrary, although totally without experience, never having built a ship. The turret principle was urged upon him as a means of assistance, but he discarded it. So we had broadside ships of the Bellerophon type, which carried one-third less weight per indicated horse power, at a less speed than the Achilles, and in every respect a most inferior sea-going vessel. The Chief Constructor had lately held out at a public meeting of engineers that he was prepared to design a turret-vessel superior to all that the world had yet produced. He (Captain Mackinnon) had no confidence in Mr. Reed's ability to do so; and it was for this reason he had brought this subject before the House, hoping that he should at least obtain from the First Lord of the Admiralty some assurance that the adoption of the turret principle would not be left to be carried out by those who had for years past ignored its advantages and opposed even a fair trial. The total want of system evinced in the character of iron-clads resulted in the most lamentable fact that no fleet of the line could be formed to cruise and manœuvre together unless constantly under steam; and as gun platforms they were most unsteady that their artillery power would be almost ineffective even in moderate weather. He believed if they were to take aim at that House 100 yards in a fresh breeze, they would not hit. The corvettes intended as cruisers for protection of our trade were equally unsuitable for the purpose for which they were designed, having proved heavy rollers with a speed of barely thirteen knots a measured mile, which, judging by Bellerophon, meant eleven knots as a reliable speed at sea; therefore, they could neither capture privateers nor escape capture themselves from a similar class of vessels building by other countries. The best evidence that these vessels were inadequate for the purpose they were designed for was that, after expensive alterations to the original designs, in some cases involving almost an entire re-construction, with the Danaë, we were now building a new type of corvette, the Inconstant, for a greater speed, after more than twenty failures of this class had been added to the fleet at the cost of a large sum of money. With regard to the gunboats, there was such a blunder made in the war that we had built three armour-plated gunboats, equipped in every respect as good sea-going vessels, and costing a large sum of money, which had turned out useless for any purpose whatever, and, therefore, a dead loss to the country. As proof of this he need only name two of these vessels, the Vixen and Waterwitch. In making an attempt to go from one port to another in this country they proved themselves unseaworthy, rolling 50 degrees each way, though there was not a wind that seamen would call "a gale of wind." Such a fact was unknown in our naval history, and most discreditable to the national character as naval architects. The crews of these two men-of-war were sent to sea in such unseaworthy vessels, and the English naval authorities had put themselves the laughing-stock of the world. They had put on the front of each vessel a snout called a plough-tail, up which the water ran, and which, with a sufficiently high rate of speed could be obtained, would cause the vessel to and it was left entirely open to the firms whether they would propose a turret ship or whether they would suggest a broadside. It was understood that the construction of the vessel would be entrusted to the hands of the firm whose plan was most approved, if satisfactory terms could be arranged. Designs were sent in, and on the 8th of October following the Admiralty came to their decision; but though in every case the competing firms were thanked and praised the whole of the designs were rejected. That at first sight might appear to be a very curious result; but a study of Papers for which he had moved would do away with any such impression. It appeared that on previous occasions similar designs had been applied for, and in every case the same result had followed. And not only were the designs rejected, but somehow they were supplanted by official plans. He would give one or two notable instances. In 1859 or 1860 a similar proposal was made in the well-known case of the Warrior. The firms applied to all responded, and the expense to which they went might reasonably be represented by a sum of £300, and in many cases £500. But when the plans were sent in a very early opportunity was taken of discrediting them in that House, and those who had sent in designs were first made acquainted with the fact that they were not accepted by being asked to tender at the Admiralty on the official plans of that very vessel for which they had competed. How the official plans had been formed had never been satisfactorily explained, but somehow they bore an extraordinary resemblance to many of the plans which had been sent in as well in dimensions as in some extraordinary points of construction which were new. There were undoubtedly variations from the private plans sufficient to enable one to say that the designs were not actually copied. There was another curious instance. Soon after the introduction of iron-plated and iron-built ships it was proposed in that House that they should have wooden hulls for carrying armour instead of iron hulls. Such work ought to have been thrown open to private yards; but a Minute was prepared by the Admiralty with the evident object of throwing discredit on them. It represented that work done in private yards was slovenly, imperfect, and more costly than that done in the dockyards. Experience, however, had shown that what had been represented the cheaper production of the dock was at least 50 per cent dearer than of the private yards. The plea of economy, indeed, was now given up, and had served its purpose of throwing out of other hands into the dockyards it was argued instead that it was necessary to preserve the dockyards for purposes of war. This was an altogether different question, with which he would not on the present occasion. Again, on being proposed to build some large ships for the Indian service, it was suggested that the Admiralty would do not to confine themselves to the designs of their officials; and his hon. Friend Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird) suggested that as the best engines had been obtained by requesting proposals from firms of reputation, the same plan should be tried with ships. The Admiralty assented and it was accordingly agreed that private firms should be asked to send designs for these vessels. Their designs, however, were no sooner sent in than they were discredited. Lord Clarendon Paget, then Secretary of the Admiralty, informing the House that the only chance of obtaining a satisfactory ship was to cast aside their plans and adopt those of the Admiralty, as the private builders could not rise to the level of the Admiralty's requirements. The result was another failure. The same thing had happened with regard to the turret and broadside ships. He now came to the present state of things. He found that the same result had occurred, but in an aggravated form. Knowing what had occurred on previous occasions, he had deemed it his duty to point out to the First Lord of the Admiralty that the only way in which a satisfactory result was likely to be obtained was to make it imperative on the Chief Constructor of the Navy that he should not compete with the private firms, and should not exercise any influence on the decision of the Board, and he understood the right hon. Gentleman to assent to the suggestion. But what did the Papers reveal on the subject? First, that the Chief Constructor had actually put forward plans to compete with the proposals of the private firms, and, not content with one design, he made use of two—one for a turret ship and the other for a broadside. But what was still more strange was, that he acted practically as the arbitrator one built, and had obtained another by conversion, which was tried under difficult circumstances, and reported to the House as having achieved in every respect a perfect and unequalled success. The Admiralty had also two more building, one in their own dockyard, and one by the Messrs. Laird of Birkenhead. He did not wish to say a word in disparagement of the Constructive or any other Department, whose head was not present to defend himself; but he was bound to say that there appeared to be too much ground for the observations which were made by his right hon. Friend opposite before he became a Member of the Government. His right hon. Friend said that asking a man like Mr. Reed, who was the advocate of a totally opposite system of his own, to build a turret ship, was something like calling on an allopathic doctor to treat a patient on the homœopathic plan. He believed his right hon. Friend sincerely wished to give the turret principle a fair trial, and holding such views it would have been right and reasonable that his right hon. Friend should have investigated the matter a little further, in order to see whether persons who had, by experience and assiduity, attained a prominent position, could be so entirely wrong as to render it necessary that all their plans should be thrown over, in order to introduce those of the Chief Constructor. But he knew the obstacles which a man in his right hon. Friend's position must have to encounter from professional advisers. He thought he was justified in the criticisms he had made on the action of the Admiralty, and in saying that the private firms had not been treated fairly in the attempt which had been made to show that their calculations were deficient. Everybody seemed to be wrong but the Chief Constructor himself. To show what had been done by private firms, he might refer to the Prince Henry, built for the Dutch Government, and to the Crown Prince, built for the Prussian Government, both of which had given the greatest satisfaction. The Prince Henry had the draught of water to an inch that was promised, and the Crown Prince had the draught of water to an inch, and considerably more than the speed promised. He considered it a matter of the greatest importance to the country, especially as regarded a reduction in the Navy Estimates, that the Admiralty should take counsel with the private firms. He believed that if the matter were thoroughly looked into the House would find that frequent re-constructions were due to the fact that the Admiralty placed an absolute reliance on their own Department, instead of availing themselves of the experience to be found outside.

MR. CORRY said, he was quite ready to acknowledge that he had never found greater difficulty in deciding on any question than on that to which the hon. Member for Tavistock had called attention. There was much to be said on both sides. His hon. Friend (Mr. Samuda) had stated the case in relation to the comparative designs very fairly, except in his remarks about the reference to the Controller of the Navy. His hon. Friend could not suppose that an unscientific Board like that of the Admiralty could decide on the design of a ship until it had been submitted to an examination by the scientific advisers. It always had been the practice to refer to the Controller designs sent in by private builders for ships of war. He would not say that the Admiralty was bound by the opinion of that officer; but undoubtedly they must be very much influenced by it; and he must express his opinion that the Board would undertake very great responsibility if they decided upon building a ship, the design of which the Controller did not approve. Much fault had been found with all the designs in matters of detail, except, perhaps, that of the Messrs. Laird, which had been highly praised by the Controller and the Chief Constructor; but he would state presently why he and his Colleagues had thought it inadvisable to adopt it, though from the first he had entertained a secret hope that a design for a turret ship might be accepted. His hon. Friend was not correct in supposing that Mr. Reed had been allowed to compete. He had sent in a plan, and there was nothing to prevent the Controller or the Chief Constructor from submitting a plan for a ship at any time he might think proper; but he had not been asked to compete, nor was his design taken into consideration in competition with that of Messrs. Laird and the other competitors. If Mr. Reed had praised his own ship and found fault with the ships of other people, he (Mr. Corry) had nothing to do with that. His hon. Friend had quoted remarks of his son-in-law years ago in favour of building a turret ship; but those remarks were made before the experiment of building a steam as re-payment will be made into the Exchequer, no additional charge falls on the Revenue on that account. In order to institute a proper comparison between the Votes for the two years, the sum of £203,292 must be deducted from the gross amount, and the result is as follows:—The Votes for 1868-9 amount to £11,177,290; deduct the re-payment to the Exchequer of £203,292, and there remains £10,973,998, as compared with £10,976,253, the amount of the Votes for 1867-8. There is, therefore, an actual decrease in the sum to be voted to meet the requirements of the naval service for 1868-9 of £2,255, as compared with the sum required for the naval service last year. On the other hand, some trifling charges which are specified in the first page of the abstract have been removed from the Navy to the Civil Service Estimates, and the general result is an increase on the Estimates for the present year, as regards the naval service, of £9,480. Under these circumstances, the amounts of the two Estimates may be said to be practically the same. It was the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers in the present financial situation, affected as it was, and still is, by the cost of the Abyssinian War, that it would have been inadmissible to have proposed a larger sum than was voted last year for the navy. The Admiralty, therefore, had to consider in what manner they could appropriate the amount at their disposal, thus limited, to the greatest advantage, and in considering this question it was the unanimous opinion of my Colleagues and myself that as large an amount as could possibly be spared from the other departments of the naval service, without disregard to their proper efficiency, ought to be appropriated to the construction of armour-plated ships. In view of the progress made and still being made by other navies, that was, in our opinion, essential to the maintenance of our naval power; and that has been the principle on which these Estimates have been prepared. The question therefore whether any reduction, and, if so, what reduction could be made, under other heads of expenditure, arose upon the first Vote—the Vote for wages to seamen and marines—the first not only in order, but also in importance, because, whatever importance we may attach to our fleet of ironclads, it is, after all, subordinate to the maintenance of an adequate establishment of well-trained officers and seamen, without which our ships would be of avail. The possibility of effecting any material reduction in the number of sea to be voted for the service of the depended in a great measure upon strength at which the foreign squad ought to be maintained. This is a matter in respect of which the gravest censure has been passed on the Admiralty, not only on the present, but also on preceding Boards, and I may remark that the number of our ships on foreign stations was less last year than it had been during the period when our immediate predecessors were in Office. It is asserted by some persons that we are guilty of supreme folly in maintaining these squadrons, and that maintenance may be said to be the pivot on which our whole naval policy turns. I am quite ready to admit that, if these squadrons are useless, if they are kept up merely for the sake of giving patronage to the Admiralty, as some insinuate, or for any other such unworthy motive, then they ought to be at once suppressed; and, if they were so repressed, millions of public money would be saved. You would save the wages of 10,000 or 15,000 seamen, and a large proportion of the cost of building and repairing ships, and various other charges. The question, however, is, whether it would be wise to reverse our policy in this respect? I am not contending that the stations ought to be maintained on an extravagant scale; but, on the other hand, ought we to deal with them in a wholesale manner which some have suggested? Ought we to withdraw our ships altogether, or to such an extent as would make a serious impression on the Estimates? It has been stated that the vessels constituting the squadrons on our foreign stations are useless for fighting purposes. There would be some truth in that assertion if the squadrons of other nations consist exclusively of armour-clads; but, so far from that being the case, the foreign squadrons of other navies are even to a greater extent than our own unarmoured. Therefore our unarmoured vessels would, in the event of war, be as able as ever to protect our colonies and commerce against the unarmoured vessels of an enemy. The United States' Government is building a great number of unarmoured cruisers, and with an object that we can very well understand. If ever America were at war with us, she would try to cripple our commerce, and lumbering armour-clads would be comparatively useless for that purpose. Again of the country in time of peace. There is another consideration which has great weight with my mind. It is expressed in very few words in the French "preliminary note," from which I have already quoted—

"Besides supporting the political and commercial relations of a nation, the foreign squadrons are excellent schools for making sailors."

I entirely concur in that opinion. It is our foreign squadrons which, in a great measure, make our sailors, and if you were to recall or unduly reduce those squadrons, although you might have a large additional amount to expend on armour-clads, you would be left without officers and men capable of handling them and of maintaining the honour of the flag in the presence of an enemy. A pamphlet was recently published, which is attributed to a late First Lord of the Admiralty, and I find in it these words, in which I also concur—

"Although, if our naval forces were withdrawn from distant stations, a reduction could easily be made in the number of ships in commission, the work in our dockyards would be diminished, the demand for naval stores lessened, and the establishments abroad abolished, such a policy would be seriously detrimental to the future efficiency of the British navy, would disorganize the whole system, and leave this country in a few years without experienced officers and well-trained seamen."

I believe this is the opinion of the Duke of Somerset. At all events, it is the opinion of a sensible man, and I agree with him that, whether as regards the efficiency of the navy or the protection of British and colonial interests, it is absolutely necessary that, within reasonable bounds, our foreign squadrons should be maintained. But, though I am of that opinion, I quite admit that they should be kept up on as economical a scale as circumstances admit; and I undertook last year, in answer to observations made by hon. Gentlemen opposite, to inquire during the Recess, whether it would be possible to make reductions in our foreign squadrons without detriment to the interests of the public service. I will state the result; but I wish first to correct my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract in a comparison he made last year between the strength of the foreign squadrons in 1846 and 1867. He said that, exclusive of the Mediterranean, the foreign squadrons in 1846 had 12,068 men, but he omitted the squadron on the West Coast of Africa. The actual number in 1846 was 15,588 men, and in 1867 17,893, being a difference of 2,305, and not, as I had stated, of nearly 5,400 men. There had been in the meantime a great development of trade with Japan, China, and elsewhere, and important colonies had grown up in the Pacific. Considering these, and other circumstances, I do not think the increase could be considered unreasonable. But, as I have stated, I promised last year to inquire whether a reduction could be safely effected. In carrying on that investigation I have been singularly fortunate, because the officers in command have returned home during the year from a great number of foreign stations, and I have thus been enabled to communicate with them personally upon the subject. In this way I have had the advantage of consulting with Admiral Denman, from the Pacific station; Sir James Hope, from the West Indies; Commodore Hornby, from the West Coast of Africa; Commodore Caldwell, whose long service has since had to deplore, from the Cape of Good Hope; Commodore Hillyar, from the East Indies; and Admiral King, from China. In fact, the Admirals and Commodores on nearly every foreign station were relieved during the year, and I was thus able to have personal communications with the very best authorities. I had the advantage also of the advice of my able Colleague, Sir Alexander Milne, Sir James Hope's predecessor in command on the North American and West India station. I have therefore, had opportunities of getting the best information upon the subject, and can assure the Committee that the inquiry we have thus made has not been a formal inquiry, instituted with a desire to burk the question, but that we have been anxious to make any reduction which we thought could properly be effected. Now when articles are written or speeches made upon this question, Gentlemen often argue as if the Admiralty were omnipotent; but the fact is that we frequently have very little option in the matter. It is the Colonial Office and the Foreign Office which guide us with respect to the strength of the foreign squadrons; we are not always free agents. The question is one of policy in which the Admiralty plays almost a subordinate part. Well, in inquiring into the possibility of reducing the squadron on the North American and West India station, I found that in the opinion of the Colonial Office it was necessary to maintain a frigate and corvette in the St.

amounting to the annual value of more than £40,000,000—as well as to the lives of those engaged in it. Considering that we have nineteen treaty ports in China and Japan, our force was not more than enough. This year there has been an addition of four ships at Japan. Of course, we took the opinion of the Foreign Office on this subject, and drew its attention to letters which we had received from Admiral Keppel, whose opinion we asked as to the strength at which the squadron should be kept. In his reply, Sir Henry Keppel says, “We have either too few ships or too many open ports where our Consuls require protection.” Admiral King and Sir James Hope also concur with Sir Henry Keppel that the China seas require the protection of a large number of ships. It may serve as an illustration of the importance of having a strong force on that station to state that it so happened that, during last year, a revolution broke out in Japan which ended in a civil war, from which the greatest danger to our commercial interests was apprehended. In consequence of the unsettled state of Japan and the danger to our treaty rights, Sir Harry Parkes wrote to Sir Henry Keppel in November last requesting him “to concentrate at Hiogo as many of Her Majesty’s ships as could be spared from other points;” and added that—

Very possibly it was in consequence of that demonstration that we have been able to protect our commercial interests, and that there has been no violation of treaty engagements. This is another proof of the valuable service which is rendered by our ships on foreign stations. It was only the other day that we received intelligence that all the foreign Ministers had left Osaka, and repaired to Hiogo, in order to seek the protection of the ships of war, and disastrous consequences might have ensued if we had not had a powerful squadron on that station. Last year the squadron consisted of thirty-six ships and 4,082 men; this year it has been reduced to thirty-four ships; but the reduction in the number of men is very small—namely, from 4,082 to 4,008. The reason is that it was thought advisable last year to send out, on a special occasion, a large iron-clad—the Ocean—and we have now in the China seas the Rodney flag-ship as well as the iron-clad; but that is an arrangement which will not be permanent required. I now come to the East India station, which is the only one on which we have an increase, but that is owing to cause which will be readily understood the Abyssinian War. When the expedition was determined on, we had no reserve ships at home ready for sea, and two ships of war from the Brazils, and two also from the China squadron were placed at the disposal of the East India commander. Here, again, we had another instance of the advantage of having ships available at foreign stations, and Captain Edye, of the Satellite—one of the ships from China—rendered such valuable services in Annesley Bay, in the landing of animals and stores, and, above all, in the distillation of water, that, but for him, it is doubtful whether the war could have been brought to a close in one campaign. In consequence of the demands made on account of the Abyssinian Expedition, the East India squadron was increased from seven ships and 1,275 men to ten ships and 1,815 men, being three ships and 540 men more than last year. Of course, now that the Abyssinian War is over, we shall be able to effect a reduction, and return to the former state of things. The Cape of Good Hope is a small station with a squadron of only three vessels—the same as last year—of which one is stationary, the Seringapatam. There is, however, a small increase in the number of men—from 446 to 506—in consequence of a larger vessel, the Raccoon, having succeeded the Valorous. We now come to the West Coast of Africa. And here I will confess that it has always been a very great source of regret to me that we should be under the necessity of maintaining a large force on that unhealthy station, and one of the first things I did on my appointment to my present Office was to recall the Bristol, a frigate of the first-class, and to replace her with the Rattlesnake, a corvette of about half her tonnage, and with little more than half her complement. But here again we must act under the direction of the Foreign Office. I had an opportunity of consulting Commodore Hornby, Commodore Edmonstone, now at Woolwich, Captain Wilmot, and also a gallant friend of mine, Colonel Blackall, who had held the office of Governor of Sierra Leone, and it was their opinion that, if the coast blockade was to be maintained, it was impossible that there should be a reduction in the number of

ferred with. For these reasons we could not entertain the question of a large diminution in the number of men; but, after due consideration, we have thought it right to reduce them to a certain extent. The number of seamen voted for the fleet for 1867-8 was 37,015; and we propose for 1868-9 35,700, being a reduction of 1,315. There is also a casual reduction of 18 boys, making a total reduction of 1,333. This includes men for Imperial troop ships for general service, but not for Indian troop ships, in which there are 1,270 men. We have not been able, however, to effect this reduction in its integrity; for, per contra, there is an increase of 250 men in the Coastguard afloat, and of 200 in the Coastguard ashore—making, together, 450. There is, likewise, an increase of forty-one men in the Indian troop ships on the requisition of the India Office, thus giving a total increase of 491; which, deducted from the decrease of 1,333, leaves a net reduction of 842 men. I may explain that the Coastguard men afloat have been increased by 250 in consequence of the establishment of an additional district ship on the coast of Ireland. The Controller General represented to me soon after my appointment to the Admiralty that that coast was too extensive to be properly superintended by two district captains; but an increase involved additional expenditure, and I was not at first prepared to entertain it. In consequence, however, of the trouble given by the Fenians last year, it became in our opinion a matter of necessity to have a man-of-war stationed on the North coast of Ireland; and therefore, after due consideration, we decided on adopting the Controller General's recommendation, and established a third station at Lough Swilly. I was in hopes this addition to the Coastguard in Ireland might be effected without any additional expense, for it was represented to me that the Coastguard ship in the Clyde might be dispensed with if a training ship for the Royal Naval Reserve were substituted for her; but there was such an outcry from my Scotch friends against this proposal, that I was almost apprehensive of a renewal of the scenes of 1745, and we were obliged to continue the ship in the Clyde, and provide an additional ship, the Trafalgar, for the coast of Ireland. With regard to the increase of 200 men in the Coastguard ashore, 100 of them replace civilians, ninety-one were accidentally omitted from the Estimates last year, and nine have, on the urgent representations of the Duke of Buckingham, been stationed at Heligoland. Exclusive, therefore, of marines, the Estimates show decrease of 842 men. These are not seamen, but are of all ratings, exclusive marines. But we propose, also, to reduce the number of marines. Last August in consequence of a re-organization sanctioned by Order in Council, there was a reduction of 200, the object of the Order being to place the marines on the same footing with regard to promotion as other seniority corps. The staff was augmented by 120, and the commissioned officers by 16; but, as a set-off to this increase of 136, 336 men were reduced, leaving the net reduction of 200. We now propose a further reduction in the light infantry, not in the artillery—of 1,500, making a total of 1,700. I am aware that I lay myself open to the charge of inconsistency in proposing this for some years ago I opposed a similar proposition made by Lord Clarence Paget. But while confessing to some reluctance in reducing so valuable a force, I believe there are reasons why, on the whole, it is expedient at the present moment. The reduction of the squadrons reduces the numbers to be employed afloat, and already the turn for service afloat is not sufficient to give the men the necessary experience at sea. The barracks, moreover, are already overcrowded. I think, therefore, that on the whole the numbers may safely be reduced within the limits I propose. The diminution of 842 in the number of seamen, and that of 1,700 in the marines gives a total reduction of 2,542 men.

I now come to the effect of this reduction on the Vote, and it is a striking illustration of the tendency of the Estimates to increase from causes over which the Admiralty may almost be said to have no control. Every improvement for promoting the health and efficiency of the men, and adding to their comfort, must end in increased expense, and, paradoxical as it may seem, with the diminished number of men, there is this year a positive increase in the sum required for their wages. The net saving on the reduction of 2,542 men is £56,152; but, from the causes to which I have adverted, and which I will presently explain, there is an increase of £61,592, and there is, moreover, the wages to Imperial troopships transferred from Vote 17, and the proportion of wages, payable out of the Imperial Exchequer, to the two Indian troopships on this side of the Isthmus issue of soft bread in lieu of biscuits, chiefly on foreign stations, increased money allowances in lieu of provisions to men on ships' books but absent ashore and afloat, and the gratuitous issue of greatcoats to marines. These causes more than counterbalance the saving which would otherwise have resulted from the reduction of men to the amount of about £24,000.

Having now explained the two first Votes which provide for wages and victuals to seamen and marines, I think it will be more convenient if I confine my remarks at present to questions of great policy, and postpone the explanation of the minor Votes to a future occasion. It would be tedious to the Committee to hear reasons why one Vote is increased and another decreased by a few thousands. I shall be ready to give a full explanation of these details when the Resolutions are put from the Chair. With regard to one Vote of large amount—Vote 11, for New Works in the Dockyards—I will merely say that there is a decrease of £74,351, notwithstanding that ample provision is made for the great works at Portsmouth, Chatham, Malta, and Bermuda. The Malta dock, though it will not be completely finished, will be in readiness to receive ships in the autumn of the present year. In Vote 17, for the Army Department, there is a decrease of £55,376, which would have amounted to £146,586, but for the necessity of making provision for the first time in this, as in other Votes, for the issue of stores to other Departments. I now come to the great Votes 6 and 10, which provide for the building, repair, and outfit of the fleet, and I think it will be more convenient to consider the two together. In Vote 6 there is a decrease of £151,806; the Vote last year having been £1,375,368, and that which I now propose, £1,223,562. On the other hand, there is a large increase on Vote 10. Last year the sum taken under Sections 1 and 2 of that Vote was £1,716,070, and this year the sum asked is £1,985,408, showing an increase of £269,338, of which sum £231,941 is for Section 2, for building ships by contract and purchasing machinery. Therefore, the balance of increase and decrease on these two Votes, Nos. 6 and 10, is an excess of £117,532 above the Votes for last year. The decrease on Vote 6, for wages to shipwrights and other artificers, was the inevitable result of the policy on which, as I have explained, these Estimates were framed. But knowing the pressure at present existing in the shipbuilding trade, I reduce the number of men in the dockyards with great reluctance. They were all hired in contradistinction to established, men and were engaged on the condition that they should leave when their service might no longer be required; but still could not help feeling regret at the necessity of depriving so many industrious men of the means of livelihood. We made the reduction in a way to cause the least inconvenience, by directing the men to be discharged gradually, and not in one batch but to retain them would have been impossible, without an entire subversion of our policy—namely, to devote as large a sum as possible to the building of armour-clads. There are only two of the dockyards in which iron ships are built—Pembroke and Chatham. The reduction in the number of workmen in those two dockyards is very trifling—only, 150; but the total number discharged in all the yards is not less than 3,049, all of them being hired and not established men. The total number of workmen employed in 1867-8 was 18,321, while the number this year will be 15,272. If, therefore, we had retained the number of workmen at or nearly at the standard of 1867-8, the only mode in which we could give them employment would be in the building of additional wooden ships, for which the provision made in these Estimates is comparatively small. Therefore, however much we may regret the necessity of depriving the men discharged of their employment in the dockyards, we have felt that we should not have been justified in employing them in building ships which we did not require. I will now very briefly advert to the 1st section of Vote 10, which provides for the purchase of stores in the Department of the Storekeeper General. There is an increase of £7,160 for timber, and of £21,931 for hemp, the quantity of that article in the yards being very much below the establishment. There is also an increase of £17,823 for the purchase of coals, in consequence of the necessity of providing for a larger consumption on the home station, and especially for the Channel squadron. The total balance of increase and decrease in the Storekeeper General's Department is an excess of £37,397 over the Vote taken last year. I must here advert for a moment to a statement made by the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves), in a debate which took place before Easter. My hon. Friend seemed to be under the impression that the stores in the dockyards tained a large reserve of line-of-battle ships in the ports as a matter of normal policy, when I came into Office I found, in fact, no reserve in existence at all; and the same state of things existed when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War became First Lord of the Admiralty the year before. I therefore wrote to the Treasury to obtain their sanction to appropriate the greater portion of this surplus to hiring artificers towards completing the iron-clads which were being brought forward for the reserves, and to appropriate the remainder, which could not be so applied, towards the building of a second fast corvette, the Active, on the lines of the Volage, a class of ship which I considered was much wanted in the Navy. It is to be observed that these two corvettes were substituted for a frigate of nearly double their size, and two gunboats, and, therefore, added nothing to the unarmoured work provided for by the Estimates as I found them. The Treasury consented to this proposition, and between £40,000 and £50,000 was appropriated towards the completion of the armour-clads fitting for sea, and the remainder towards the second corvette, the Active, which is to be built by the same firm whose contract was accepted for the Volage. At the period of the year when this arrangement was sanctioned it would have defeated our object if time had been lost in calling for fresh tenders for this ship. The sum spent on the Active during the financial year 1867-8 is about £16,000, so that the expenditure on contract work, notwithstanding the alterations I have described, will be below that which was estimated for the financial year, and in consequence there will be a small balance paid into the Exchequer out of the savings on this part of Vote 10. The same observation applies to the total cost of these ships. I have stated the total estimated cost of completing the contract armoured and unarmoured ships at £1,126,300. The contract prices, however, were very much below the Estimates. The estimate for the armour-clads was £915,500; the contract price only £820,300. The estimate for unarmoured ships was £210,800, the contract price £174,400; including, in both cases, the changes resulting from the alteration in the scheme of contract work made by me in the month of June. Thus the total saving on the amount sanctioned by Parliament was £131,600—that is to say, the ships were contracted to be built for that amount less than the Estimates the Controller of the Navy. The contract price for building the second corvette, the Active, is £79,000, which being deducted from £131,600, leaves surplus of £52,600. Thus it will be seen that, notwithstanding an additional corvette and other alterations made in the autumn, the total expenditure on the new armoured and unarmoured ships was still less by £52,600 than the amount specified in the Estimates.

I now come to the performance of the new work last year, and will tell the Committee the number of tons ordered to be built in dockyards by the programme 1867-8, and the number of tons actually built. Last year my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract complained that the quantity of work done was much less than Parliament had sanctioned; but this year I will admit the work has been very faithfully performed. The amount of tonnage of the armour-clads ordered to be built in the dockyards was 6,845; the quantity actually built was 6,829, or only sixteen tons less than the programme. The tonnage of the unarmoured ships ordered to be built was 23,544 tons; the quantity actually built was 23,256, or 288 tons less. So that the total amount of tonnage built was only 294 tons less than that ordered to be built. It must be borne in mind that there were several disturbing causes in operation during the year. There was the Portsmouth Review, which took off a great number of hands from intended work, and numerous ships were fitted for their improved armament; so that this must be considered a very satisfactory performance and very creditable to the Department. So much for the tonnage built during the year. I now come to the ships launched, and still speak of dockyard work only. The armour-clads ordered to be launched were three—the Penelope, the Hercules, and the Repulse. Strictly speaking, the number launched was only two. But the Repulse which has since been launched, was completed ready for launching, and was kept on the stocks only for some reason of official convenience. The deficiency therefore, was only apparent. The unarmoured ships ordered to be launched were twenty-five, and the number actually launched was twenty-five. The work of the dockyards could, therefore, hardly be more faithfully performed, and these figures will show that the Board of Admiralty, as well as the Department of the of keeping up the strength of the squadrons abroad, to which I have already referred.

I now proceed to state the work which it is proposed to accomplish in the course of the present financial year. In the first place there will be the two corvettes to which I have just alluded, the Druid and the Briton. Both these vessels are to be built in the dockyards. One of them is building at Deptford; but she will be so far advanced as to be ready for launching at the end of the financial year. By that time also we hope that all the other vessels now building at Deptford will be launched, and it is not intended after that to commence any new ships in that yard. The second corvette will be built at Sheerness, and the description of both is as follows:—They will have a tonnage of 1,322, with 350-horse power, and they will carry twelve guns, of which two will be 6½-ton guns, and ten 64-pounders. Their estimated speed will be 13 knots, and they will be single screw ships. These vessels are to be advanced, the Druid to 6½ eighths, so as to be launched next March, and the Briton to 1½ eighths; the estimated expenditure during the financial year being, in the case of the Druid, £35,995, and of the Briton, £8,306; making a total of £44,301. That is the only provision for additional unarmoured ships made by these Estimates. Of armour-plated vessels, we propose to build six—three in the dockyards and three by contract. The first of the dockyard ships, to be called the Iron Duke, will be built at Pembroke; she is to be of the second class, and will be immediately taken in hand, and advanced 2½ eighths during the year. The estimated expenditure on this ship during the year is £70,422. She will have a tonnage of 3,774; and she will be an iron-clad iron ship with a double screw. Her armour plating will be six and eight inches, with ten inches of teak, and an inner skin of one-inch backing. She will be built upon the same principle as the Audacious, the Invincible, and the Vanguard; and her armament will consist of ten 12½-ton guns, six of which will be on the main deck and four upon the upper deck, together with four 64-pounders also upon the upper deck. An addition to the upper deck armament of iron-clad ships was adopted by me with the entire approval of my naval Colleagues, and will, I think, be a great improvement in the armament of these ships, which often, in heavy weather, cannot keep their main deck open. The horse-power of the ship will be 800, and her estimated speed is 13 knots. All the vessels of this class will have an armour-plated battery on the upper deck armed with four 12½-ton guns, so placed as to command the whole horizon. The next vessel I have named the Sultan, in honour of the visit paid by His Imperial Majesty to the fleet at Spithead and His Majesty has been pleased to express the gratification which he derives from the compliment thus paid to him. This is to be a first-class ship, very much resembling the Hercules, which she will follow in the Chatham dockyard. She is to be advanced 2½ eighths during the year, and the estimated expenditure upon her for 1868-9 is £91,113. Her tonnage will be 5,226; she will have a single screw with a power of 1,200 horses, and an estimated speed of nearly 14 knots. Her armour plating will be 9, 8, and 6 inches thick, with a backing of 10 inches of teak and 1½-inch of inner iron skin. Her armament will consist of eight 18-ton guns on the main deck, one 12½-ton gun forward, two 12½-ton guns on the upper deck battery, and two 6½-ton guns under the forecastle; total, 13 guns. There will be a central armour-plated battery on the upper deck, enclosed completely, where the steering-wheel will be, and where two 12½-ton guns will fire round a very large area of the compass, including a fore and aft line astern. The third dockyard armour-clad will be built at Chatham; but very little advance will be made with her this year, as she cannot be commenced till the Monarch is launched. [Lord HENRY LENNOX made an observation to the right hon. Gentleman.] My noble Friend tells me that the Monarch is more advanced than I believed her to be. The estimated expenditure upon this new armour-clad will be £18,815. [An hon. MEMBER: Her name?] She will be called the Triumph, the name of the flagship of Admiral Blake. She will be an iron-clad broadside ship, of the second class, similar to the Audacious, but with a single screw, lifting, of which the experimental trials have shown the advantage. Her armour plating will be 8 and 6 inches, and her backing 10 inches of teak, with a 1½-inch inner iron skin. Her tonnage will be about 3,800, and her armament will consist of ten 12½-ton guns—six on the main and four on the upper deck—and two 64-pounders on the upper deck, making a total of twelve guns. Her gines provided for ships building by contract amounts to £680,000. The total provision for hulls, engines, and equipments for new ships, including both the dockyard and contract built, is £1,996,914. That is in round numbers, £2,000,000, exclusive of £50,000 for the Cerberus armour-clad Monitor building for the Colony of Victoria, for which provision is made under Vote 14. Including the latter vessel, the total taken in these Estimates for building new ships is £2,046,914. There are in the dockyards, to be launched this year, two armoured frigates, the Monarch, and the Repulse, or rather the Monarch only, as the Repulse has been launched since the beginning of the financial year, and one unarmoured, the Inconstant; two sloops, the Spartan and the Sirius; and two gun-vessels, the Curlew and the Swallow—giving a total of seven. Of contract vessels there are to be launched one armoured, the Captain; two unarmoured corvettes, the Volage and the Active; and eight gun vessels due last year, which will shortly be delivered, giving a total of eleven contract and of eighteen dockyard and contract vessels to be launched, exclusive of the Cerberus, which will also be launched during the year.

I will now state to the Committee the sums spent on the hulls, engines, and first equipment of new ships in the last three years, and compare the expenditure in each of these years with that which is proposed for the year 1868-9. For armoured ships the expenditure stands thus:—In 1865-6, £792,090; in 1866-7, £591,686; in 1867-8, £824,526; while we propose for the year 1868-9 an expenditure of £1,359,169. For unarmoured ships, the expenditure was—in 1865-6, £360,619; in 1866-7, £429,819; in 1867-8, £929,344; for 1868-9, we provide £637,745. The total expenditure for armoured and unarmoured ships stands thus—In 1865-6, £1,152,709; in 1866-7, £1,021,505; in 1867-8, £1,753,870; in 1868-9, we intend to spend £1,996,914. The amount provided for armour-clads in the Estimates for 1868-9, including hulls, engines, and equipment, is £1,359,169, in addition to which £82,000 will be spent on the re-equipment of armoured ships, making a grand total for armour-clads of £1,441,169, and, with the £50,000 for the Cerberus, of £1,491,169. Complaints were made in former years that out of the very large sums voted a comparatively small portion of the total amount was spent building ships; but I do not think the complaint is applicable to these Estimates which, as I have stated, provide no less sum than £2,046,914 for the building ships of war. I will now state to the Committee the rate per cent of expenditure on armoured and unarmoured vessels, including hulls, engines, and equipment for the years 1865-6, 1866-7, and the estimated expenditure for 1868-9, as contrasted with the sums included in the Estimates for effective services in the several years. In 1865-6, the expenditure on armoured ships was 9·14 per cent, and on armoured and unarmoured 13·31 per cent on the amount voted for Effective Services. In 1866-7, it was 6·89 per cent for armoured, and 11·89 per cent for armoured and unarmoured, where this year we propose an expenditure 14·53 per cent for armoured, and 21·8 per cent on the whole of the effective Vote on armoured and unarmoured ships. So that considerably more than one-fifth of the whole money voted for Effective Services will be spent on building ships of war. I find that the Vote for Effective Services in 1865-6 was £8,658,205, while that proposed for this year is £9,352,579, showing an increase of £694,374. The sum expended on new ships in 1865-6 was £1,152,709, while that provided for new ships in this year is £1,996,914, showing an increase of £844,205. That is to say that while the amount now asked for naval effective services is £694,374 more than in 1865-6, the amount to be expended on shipbuilding is £844,205 more. In like manner, comparing 1866-7 with 1868-9 I find the expenditure on building ships in 1868-9 will be £210,328 more than the difference between the Effective Votes for the two years.

The Committee may now like to know the actual strength of our armour-clad navy. We have, including the ships proposed to be built under these Estimates, 33 armoured ships of the first and second classes. Of that number 16 are in commission, 1 fitting for reserve, building, 5; and 4 ordered. Of smaller armoured ships, and vessels intended for coast defence, there are in commission 5; fitting for reserve, 4; and ordered 2. Thus the grand total of our armour-clad vessels of war, including those building and ordered, is 44, exclusive of the Cerberus. In the present Estimates a large provision is made, not only for the building of ships, but also for creating and excellent results are anticipated under the supervision of Captain Wilson. I am happy to say that the Returns give continued proof of the good conduct of the petty officers and seamen serving in the fleet. I hold in my hand a comparative statement of the good conduct of the petty officers and seamen, and likewise of the number of desertions in various years. In 1860-1, when the average number of men borne on the ships' books was 42,728, the number wearing badges was 9,278, or over one-fifth; in 1866-7, the average borne was 33,000, and the number wearing badges 12,037, or over one-third; in 1865-6 the average borne was 33,650, and the number wearing badges 11,346, or nearly one-third, so that with 650 men less in 1866-7 than in 1865-6, there were 691 more badges worn. The desertions among seamen have decreased. In the last seven years they have numbered, in 1860-1, 3,296; in 1861-2, 2,472; in 1862-3, 1,935; in 1863-4, 1,449; in 1864-5, 1,325; in 1865-6, 1,101; and in 1866-7, 1,059. This Return shows a gradual reduction every year. There has been a steady and progressive increase in the numbers of seamen gunners and trained men. In 1860 there were 1,176 seamen gunners, and 1,462 trained men, making a total of 2,638. In 1867 there were 3,337 seamen gunners, and 5,817 trained men, making a total of 9,154. In 1868 there were 3,346 seamen gunners, and 6,056 trained men, making a total of 9,402. These figures furnish a striking proof of improved efficiency, and they are confirmed by the following extract from a letter of Sir Henry Keppel to Sir Alexander Milne:—

"Since I was last employed the greatest change I see in the service is the great improvement in the appearance and conduct of the men in the ships."

The sanitary state of the navy is most satisfactory. The Medical Director General reports—

"During the twelve months terminating June, 1867, the health of the navy may be said to have been in a most satisfactory condition. Although diseases of more or less fatal character were epidemic on many stations, the ratio of cases entered on the sick-list of invaliding and of death were the lowest that had occurred during a period of eleven years."

The number of cases returned on the sick-list was 1,264, being 73 per 1,000 below the ratio of the preceding year. The number of persons invalided from the fleet was

1,447, or 28 per 1,000; and the average rate in eleven years has been 34 per 1,000. The deaths numbered 524—10 per 1,000 or 1 per cent, the lowest proportion many years. The average total mortal taken for eleven years is over 15 per 1,000 and the death-rate from disease in 1 year ending June last was 8 per 1,000 so that the mortality is reduced nearly one-half. The Medical Director General reports—

"The iron-clad vessels continue to hold a favourable position in a sanitary point of view. The entry of cases on their sick lists were among the lowest of sea-going vessels."

This information must be considered most satisfactory in reference to the progressive increase which must go on in the number of armoured ships. The result of the operation of the Contagious Diseases Act is equally satisfactory. The ratio of cases of the most destructive form is reduced from 12 to 7 per cent, and the type is materially modified. When I visited the Naval Hospital at Plymouth last year I was informed that, where before the introduction of the Act 70 per cent of the cases were contagious diseases, since it has been in operation the proportion has been reduced to 30 per cent. In short, the proportions have been exactly reversed. The failure of the Act, where it has failed, has been solely attributable to the narrow limits to which its operation has been confined. It is in operation, for instance, at Chatham and Rochester, but not at Gravesend. Consequently Gravesend has become a hotbed for infection, and defeats, to a great extent, the salutary results from its operation in the neighbouring towns. At Sheerness the disease had totally disappeared, but it was introduced by a detachment of troops from a place where the Act was not in operation. These facts seem to furnish strong arguments for the extension of the Act to places not now subject to it. The successful working of the Act in the ports is to be attributable, in a great measure, to the tact and judgment of officers of the metropolitan police, who have the charge of carrying it into execution. The exercise of coercive powers has been rarely required in consequence of the kind treatment the patients receive in the hospital where they have the care of a chaplain and are also visited by charitable ladies. Many instances of reclamation have been the result. Great advantage in this respect is also derived from the Samaritan Fund to had now given up that policy, and proposed to go back to the armour-clad expenditure of 1865-6, which was in excess of that of subsequent years, and even to a still larger expenditure. To that part of his proposal he (Mr. Childers) would give his warmest support. Last year the right hon. Gentleman protested against any decrease in the number of men, and especially of marines, but his prudence and judgment had been stronger than his first impressions, and he had been able to make a reduction of 2,700 men, a large number of whom were marines. In these points, with regard to foreign squadrons, armour-clad ships, and marines, he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman admitted the justice of the policy recommended from the Opposition Benches last year. At the time he (Mr. Childers) stated that, though differing from them on questions of general policy, he was a general supporter of the present Board of Admiralty, and he should be still more so when he found his views so far carried out by the Board. Going now to the question of finance, the original Estimates of last year proposed an expenditure of £40,233,000 for the two great services, and the Estimates of this year proposed an expenditure of £41,050,000, or an increase of £817,000; and if the difference in the receipts in connection with those services last year and this were added, amounting to £217,000, the increase would be no less than £1,034,000. In the naval expenditure, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was not quite right, for the purpose of comparison, in including in the Estimates of last year the Supplementary Estimates. That course was hardly a safe one. It was tolerably certain from past experience that we should have Supplementary Estimates this year, and the proper plan was to compare the original Estimates. So corrected, the figures would show an increase, not of £9,000, but of £59,490, and in addition to that there was a very serious difference to be taken into account in comparing the actual naval expenditure of this year with that of last year. Vote 17, for freight, had always been treated as a Vote apart from these Estimates, as relating to the army and not to the navy. There was a decrease of £55,376 in the Transport Vote No. 17, but the extra receipts in connection with it were £91,210 more than last year, making a difference of £146,000 under Vote 17. From that would have to be subtracted £55,000 which was last year charged on

Mr. Childers

Vote 17, but which was this year charge on Vote 1. This left an increase of £91,000 and the result was that the actual Navy Votes this year were £151,000 in excess when strictly compared with the Naval Vote of last year. Then came the question of extra receipts. The Admiralty last year boldly estimated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would obtain no less a sum than £475,000 from the sales of iron and other old stores; but the right hon. Gentleman did not get as much as he expected from that source, and the sum was this year set down at £240,000, which made a difference of £235,000. That sum which the Exchequer would not receive, added to the £151,000 extra which it would have to pay, made a difference of £386,000 between the Navy Estimates of last year and this. This might not be a large sum when you were dealing with millions; but it was a large sum when the Committee remembered that they had now to face a deficit. It was desirable to reduce this sum of £386,000, and there was one point of dangerous tendency to which he entreated attention—the constant increase of establishments. He did not mean by this the number of men employed, for the number was to be reduced; but, whether you increased or reduced the number of men, the rule appeared to be to increase the number of persons receiving salaries. The right hon. Gentleman proposed altogether a reduction of 5,591 in the number of seamen, marines, and dockyard men, or persons receiving wages. In the Civil establishments there were the following amounts of increase on last year. The Admiralty Office from £176,000 to £182,000; Establishments at the Dockyards from £167,000 to £169,000; in the Victualling Yards there was increase of £200, Medical Vote £1,000, and Marine Divisions £3,000. The total result was that, while between last year and this there was on the different establishments an increase of £13,000, there was a reduction in the number of hands of nearly 5,600. That sort of increase to which he had called attention was one against which the House ought to set its face, and which economists ought to try to put a stop to. He did not think they ought to cut down salaries, but they ought to try to keep down numbers. Unless they did that the pressure put upon Departments would become so great that it would be found impossible to resist it. There was one point which really was so ludicrous that he must call attention to it in order that his

the original programme. He would now refer to one or two of the larger questions which had been touched upon; and first, as to the proposed reduction in the foreign squadrons. His right hon. Friend said, very rightly, that upon this depended a great deal of our expenditure upon dockyards and for other matters. His right hon. Friend had dealt at some length with the proposed reduction, but appeared to be angry because some one had said that many of the vessels employed in the service were useless, inasmuch as they would be compelled to "cut and run" if any large ships belonging to an enemy happened to attack them. He believed, however, that it was the Secretary for the Admiralty who was the culprit, for in his speech last year he used that expression. His right hon. Friend went on to speak very strongly against those who proposed to abolish the foreign squadrons; but he seemed in so doing to be fighting the air, for no one in the House proposed to do so. [Mr. CORRY said, the plan was advocated almost daily in leading articles.] He believed that the Committee was wont to discuss rather what emanated from Members of the House than to what appeared in the newspapers, which could be only cursorily referred to in debate. His noble Friend, when he employed that phrase, distinctly said that the question was whether our expenditure in this direction was not excessive, and that really was the question they had to consider. His right hon. Friend had appealed to the example shown by foreign nations, and had stated that the vessels belonging to France were mainly unarmoured. [Mr. CORRY: I said the ships in commission.] His right hon. Friend had said that out of 167 ships in commission, including transports, France had only ten armoured ships. He found that we had 320 ships in commission, and out of these 300 were non-armoured. These non-armoured ships were sent to all parts of the world, and the comparison employed by his right hon. Friend was rather in favour of a reduction than of an increase of that part of our naval force. But to his surprise his right hon. Friend had stated that the Duke of Somerset, in a pamphlet which he had published, had denounced any reduction in the numbers of the men. What, however, was stated in the pamphlet which his hon. Friend had referred to was that a reduction of 12,000 or 15,000 men would seriously disorganize the navy. What he himself proposed was a reduction not of 15,000 but of 7,000 men, and there was, he believed, ample argument in favour of that proposal. His right hon. Friend said that that was a question for the Foreign and for the Colonial Office more than for the Admiralty. Now that was exactly the view which he (Mr. Childers) entertained on the subject. He believed that expenditure originated in the action of the heads of the Foreign Office and Colonial Office; and until his right hon. Friend impressed upon his Colleagues the necessity of their remembering their responsibility and relieving the Estimates from the serious charges which unnecessarily large foreign squadrons entailed, there was, he feared, but little chance of the policy which had been so well initiated being properly carried out. His right hon. Friend said that the number of men in our foreign squadrons last year was 23,100. The number of men he proposed for this year was 20,300, or a reduction of 2,800 men, and his right hon. Friend proposed to increase that reduction to 3,300, and to lessen the number of ships in the foreign squadrons by eighteen as soon as the Abyssinian War was over. That fact alone showed that they might congratulate themselves on the efforts they had made. Before going further he desired to touch upon a question which bore strongly upon dockyard economy, and upon which he thought the Committee was entitled to a full and clear explanation. It had been stated last year from the Treasury Bench that the sale of pig iron in the dockyards would during the past year realize £100,000, whereas the amount actually realized was, he believed, only £40. [Sir JOHN HAY: £63 only.] After having heard such confident statements last year he had felt disappointed when his right hon. Friend that evening passed the subject over in complete silence. This silence was the more extraordinary, inasmuch as the loss of the money must have been a source of grief to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who could not afford to lose £100,000, and who must have frequently complained of the non-receipt of this sum. He trusted that the matter would be satisfactorily settled, and that they would receive an assurance that the £100,000, which ought to have been received in the last year, would during the current twelve-months be increased to £150,000, or perhaps to £200,000. He would now turn to the programme of work, and, as far as he could understand the numerous figures re-

14,700. It seemed, however, to him, that the reduction for the present year had been made without much forethought. He could not understand how it was that while the number of non-commissioned officers and privates had been reduced by 1,688, the number of commissioned officers had been increased by 12.

MR. CORRY explained, that the re-organization of the force involving this addition, had for its object, the placing of the Marines on the same footing with respect to promotion as other seniority corps. It was not just that the officers of the Marines should be put in a worse position than those in the Artillery and Engineers.

MR. CHILDERS had no objection to advancing promotion in the Marines by a sound scheme of retirement, but certainly not by increasing the establishment. A smaller number of men, involving a reduction from £362,000 to £344,000, could not require a larger number of officers, involving an increase from £63,000 to £67,000. The Estimates lay on the table three weeks before they were printed; and he could not help thinking that during that interval, a reduction having been insisted on, the Admiralty had made it at the last moment in the number of men in the Marines, the officers being inadvertently left untouched. He saw no reason why the reduction should not be carried to 12,000. Even now it was proposed to employ 8,000 marines afloat and 6,700 on shore. The latter were engaged in doing purely soldiers' duty, and were an unnecessarily large reserve. Whatever the value of Marine artillery, the Light Infantry Marine could not be very highly estimated in these days of steam, and the reduction might properly commence with them. He thought a saving would be effected by remedying the oversight with regard to the officers, and he would move that the Vote of £525,725 for the wages of Marines be reduced by £60,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £525,725, for Wages, &c., to Marines, be reduced by the sum of £60,000."
—(Mr. Childers.)

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that before replying to the questions of his hon. Friend, he wished to bear testimony to the great success which had attended nearly all the remedial measures introduced by Lord Clarence Paget. His hon. Friend had expressed gratification at the efforts of those now in Office, whom he had been pleased to call his pupils; but in one or two important particulars it was himself and not his hon. Friend, who first announced the policy in question. He last year announced the assent of his Colleague to the appointment of a Committee on the Dockyards, from which he anticipated very beneficial results, and as soon as the Reports of the yard officers had been received and considered by the Admiralty the would be laid before Parliament. He hoped that in another year more tangible benefits would result from that inquiry than the reduction of £3,000 which had been effected this year. Approaching first what might be deemed the most disagreeable portion of his subject, he would refer to the celebrated iron "pigs." His right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry) was in no way responsible for the amount expected to be derived from the sale of them, it having been his opinion all along that they were used for valuable purposes in the dockyard and that it would take a great deal of money to replace them. How far had his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay), and himself, been to blame in this matter? Statements were made by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), and obtained credence in consequence of the avidity with which the public always accepted anything tending to show that the Admiralty authorities were blockheads or worse—that this iron was most valuable, that the dockyards were paved with gold, and that all the benefits conferred by these "pigs" might be obtained at half the cost. Other persons, however, and among them the ablest professional advisers of the Admiralty, believed the hon. Member to be mistaken. In this conflict of opinion, an eminent firm at Birmingham (Messrs. Ryland) asked the Admiralty for permission to test the value of the iron, and the result was that they reported it to be worth a certain sum per ton. The Admiralty thereupon offered to sell it, with the proviso that they would not take less than the sum required to replace the use of it in the dockyards; but up to this time no purchasers had been found. He believed that, owing to the state of trade, the price of iron had been very low; but he had not very sanguine hopes of anything like the sum expected by the Admiralty last year being realized. As to the increase in Vote 3 for the Admiralty, it chiefly arose from the re-organization of the Department of Dockyard Accounts, a proposal which was made two years consecutively, and number to be built by the present Board of Admiralty. He did not think there was any other point on which it was necessary for him to reply to his hon. Friend. Of course the Admiralty would feel it their duty to oppose the Motion for further reduction moved by his hon. Friend. If, after mature examination of the whole circumstances, and long and anxious consideration, they could have assented to a larger reduction they certainly would have done so, but they did not feel themselves bound to recommend more than a reduction of 1,700 men. He hoped, after the very general support his hon. Friend had given to these Estimates, and the decided advance he described the present Board of Admiralty as having made in a policy which he approved, the hon. Member would withdraw his Amendment and enable them to take the Vote for the proposed number of men.

THE CHAIRMAN called the attention of the Committee to a point of Order. It was understood the other night that the general discussion on the Navy Estimates usually taken on the number of men, should this year be taken in the Vote for wages, it being important that the Vote for men should be obtained without delay. Now, they had on the Vote for the amount of wages a Motion proposed for the reduction of a particular item, and the rule was that when a Motion was proposed from the Chair for the reduction or omission of a particular item the discussion should be confined to it.

MR. GRAVES said, that he would strictly confine himself to the point indicated by the Chairman, and endeavour to show the Committee why there should be no further reduction in the present Vote; and one reason was that inasmuch as the reduction in the number of men had been attended with no diminution of expenditure; but, on the contrary, with an increase of something like £85,000. If they should diminish the force more than was proposed by the Government, the expense might be still further increased. That, therefore, was not the right way to reduce the Estimates. With respect to our seamen, year by year there had been a gradual dropping down in their numbers, and he thought they ought to arrest that diminution. The Returns presented this year showed that the number of our bond fide seamen had been reduced from something over 30,000 in 1861 to 19,000 in 1867, and, as appeared from the First

Lord Henry Lennox

Lord's statement, they were to be further reduced to something over 18,000 in the course of this year. Two years ago the noble Lord the then Chief Secretary of the Admiralty, said that after a seven years' experience of a gradual retrenchment, the number of bond fide seamen which then stood at 21,000, had reached a point below which it would be dangerous to go. Returns showed that the annual drain on our bond fide seamen amounted to 14 per cent. To fill up the number of boys rated as seamen it would be necessary to throw into our training ships from boys to seamen, 3,900 a year, whereas the numbers actually entered was only 2,200. The diminution in the number of seamen arose from natural causes, and not in any way from the diminished Votes of the House. He maintained that it was of the highest importance to assimilate the supply to the drain, and if we would keep up the number of bond fide blue-jackets we must enter a much greater number of boys in the training ships. Considering the small proportion of blue-jackets to the total number of men in the navy, it was only natural that they should look at what the majority was composed of, and see if they could not make a further reduction in numbers without decreasing the efficiency of the service. There were 4,000 supernumeraries in the shape of bandsmen and personal servants, and this number might be reduced with advantage. Of the fifty or sixty old wooden ships lying in Ordinary which the First Lord of the Admiralty alluded to, he (Mr. Graves) would further suggest that some fifteen or sixteen of the best should be selected for more immediate service than the others, and that these should be carefully looked after and kept ready for any sudden emergency. In this respect we should only be following the example of other nations. He thought also that, probably, an equal number might be broken up with advantage, and expense with regard to them saved for the future; and he would further recommend that the residue should be laid up in tiers, their engines taken out, and the ships placed under the charge of a few river police—just as hundreds of vessels are to be seen daily lying up in the docks of London and of Liverpool. This would have the effect of bringing about economy, without resorting to a diminution of marines or seamen.

GENERAL PERCY HERBERT said, he thought that the criticisms of the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) with right hon. Friend is inclined to reduce the foreign squadrons. That is a reduction which, I believe, ought to be made with a very strong hand; the old notion of arming all over the world being, as I believe, totally unsuited to the present state of things, and nothing more or less than a gross superstition. There is not a shadow of justification for the system in matters as they now stand. The consequence of passing the Vote will be that my right hon. Friend will have a larger number of marines on shore—and whom he will be obliged to keep on shore—than at any period during the past five years, although in that period the force appears to have been about 2,000 greater than it was in any previous five years since 1847. And further than this, I think that if we went back to a period before 1847 we should probably find that the marines on shore were then still less. The question is, will you consent, having raised your reserve force of marines on shore so considerably, to its being raised still higher? That is a very fair question to be put to this Committee, and if my hon. Friend chooses to divide on his Motion—partly on the ground that this increase in the force of marines on shore is totally unnecessary, and partly on the ground that no reason has been shown for increasing the relative number of officers in proportion to the men—I, for one, shall vote with him.

Mr. CORRY said, he did not know upon what ground the right hon. Gentleman stated that the reserve force of Royal Marines on shore was now increasing. The right hon. Gentleman had gone back to 1847; but since then a large augmentation had been made to the force by the recommendation of a Royal Commission on the manning of the Navy, who looked on the Marines as a very effective addition to our naval strength, and one giving us a valuable power for meeting a time of emergency. When, however, the right hon. Gentleman said the force was still going on increasing, he could hardly have read the present Estimates, because they proposed a positive reduction of 1,700 men; and he believed the reserve on shore would this year be at least 1,200, and possibly 1,300 or 1,400 less than it was last year. Therefore, so far from increasing the reserve of marines on shore, these Estimates would affect a considerable reduction. He confessed he was surprised that a Gentleman so well versed in naval affairs, and possessing so sound a judgment as the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) should come down to the House and propose without Notice a reduction of 4,000 marines in one year. That hon. Gentleman, earlier in the evening, had spoken against a sudden reduction in the number of artificers, as causing great public inconvenience as well as hardship to individuals; and yet he himself now proposes a sudden and abrupt reduction of 4,000 marines in one year.

GENERAL PERCY HERBERT said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) knew everything, and therefore he despaired of teaching him anything. But he got two officers of Volunteers as clever as himself, he would find 80 to 100 men in a company quite enough for three officers to look after.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 127: Majority 54.

Original Question again proposed.

COLONEL SYKES then rose to move to reduce the whole Vote by the sum of £20,000. He said his object was less to reduce the annually increasing expenditure of the Navy, than to diminish the annual sacrifice of valuable lives on the West Coast of Africa. The First Lord of the Admiralty spoke of having reduced the number of vessels at the out stations abroad by 18. That surely implied a reduction in the item of wages, victuals, &c. Yet there was a net increase of £85,000 for wages, and of £91,000 for victuals, in the Navy Estimates for the present year. On the 23rd of March last he (Colonel Sykes) obtained a Return showing the number of vessels on the West Coast of Africa for the years from 1858 to 1868 and within two days of the date of the Return, the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) had moved for another Return embracing the distribution of the Naval Forces for each year from 1847 to 1867. Between these Returns there was a very great discrepancy. According to the Return granted on his (Colonel Sykes's) Motion there were, in 1858, 25 vessels with 2,038 officers and men on the West Coast of Africa, while, according to the Return moved for by the hon. Member for Reading there were in the six years 24 vessels with 2,324 men. For the year 1867 the Return of the hon. Member for Reading gave 19 vessels with 1,894 men, while his Return again showed 25 vessels, with 2,134 men. Discrepancies ran of the pledge given by his noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox) last year when he moved the Estimates, the number of vessels on the station had been reduced. At this moment there were 14 there, carrying 74 guns. The number of officers and men was only 1,576, showing a very large reduction. Of the 14 ships only nine were cruising ships, the other five being stationary. He thought his hon. and gallant Friend would admit that it would be impossible to reduce the number of cruisers by six, which would only leave three cruisers—vessels were required on the station for the protection of our own trade. Besides it was only a few months ago that information was received of an intention to run a cargo of slaves down the river Congo. That attempt had been checked, and it was to be hoped that, with the loyal assistance of Spain, the slave trade on the African coast would gradually be suppressed. Under all the circumstances, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend would see the propriety of not pressing his Amendment.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, it was a lamentable thing that so many of our officers and men lost their lives or their health in our attempt to suppress the slave trade by cruising on the African coast. If that trade was to be suppressed, it must be by suppressing the market for slaves. He feared that the measures we took only increased the sufferings of the unfortunate persons who were stowed away in the slavers. If his hon. and gallant Friend moved to put an end to this cruising altogether, except so far as the interests of our trade required it, he should give him his support.

SIR T. F. BUXTON admitted it to be a melancholy fact that a great number of lives had been sacrificed in the attempts to suppress the slave trade; but he thought it would not be fair to measure the good we did by the number of slavers captured, any more than it would be to estimate the advantage of our Coastguard by the number of smugglers apprehended. He believed that in both cases much good was done in the way of prevention. The Commissary Judge at Havannah stated that the return of the trade between Africa and Cuba for the past year was unaccompanied by any statement of the landing of slaves. That functionary believed, however, it would be unsafe to assume that the slave trade had ceased because it had become almost invisible. The condition of the West Coast slave trade was this, that it was no longer visible; the plant was cut down, but though we could not assume that the roots were dead; they might spring into life again if our fleet were wholly withdrawn once. If we were anxious to maintain the footing on which we had acted for many years, we must keep a squadron on the coast of Africa; but he was glad the Admiralty had been able to reduce the number of the vessels, and he hoped they would be able to reduce them more and more each year. If the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Syke) went to a division, he should feel bound to vote against him.

MR. CHILDERS hoped that, as his right hon. Friend had reduced the squadron by 460 men and further reductions were contemplated, the hon. and gallant Member would not press his Amendment to a division. If the number were to be reduced by 500 or 600 men beyond the reduction proposed by the Government the squadron would be considerably crippled.

COLONEL SYKES said, as it appeared from the statement of the hon. Baron (Sir John Hay) that a reduction had been made in the number of vessels, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,335,842, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Victuals and Clothing for Seamen and Marines which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869."

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK remarked, that the Admiralty had wasted a great deal of money in victualling the men.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Lusk.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

JUDGMENTS EXTENSION BILL.

NOMINATION OF COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That Mr. Craufurd be one Member of the Select Committee on the Judgments Extension Bill."

given him any notice of the latter part of his Question with regard to the barracks, he could not answer him at that moment, but he would make inquiry and give the information required on another evening.

LORD OVERSTONE said, he sincerely regretted that the project for removing the National Gallery to Burlington House had been rejected. The subject was one of very great importance, owing to the value of the national collection and the growing interest and feeling of pride which the people took in it. The present building was most unsatisfactory from its want of sufficient space, and the pictures were seriously injured by the atmosphere on account of the deficiency of proper ventilation. Year by year the Trustees were obliged to put those pictures through the process of cleaning, and that process was by degrees obliterating the delicacy and the tone of their colouring. He regretted that the reply of the noble Earl was so unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it held out very little hope to the great majority of their Lordships of ever seeing the new National Gallery.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, that when the Royal Academy was removed there would be a large amount of additional space available for the exhibition of the national pictures. It would not, he thought, be judicious to select any plans, however excellent, until they had secured a really competent architect to whom they might confide the construction of the building.

VAGRANTS — THE GUILDFORD UNION.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON moved for Copy of Correspondence which has recently passed between the Poor Law Board and the Guildford Board of Guardians in reference to the Relief of Vagrants. It was not his intention to raise a discussion on the general question of casual relief—he only desired to call attention to a particular case in a particular union, which appeared to him to involve such a principle of injustice that he hoped his reference to it in that House would have the effect of preventing its occurrence elsewhere. He understood that the Poor Law Guardians of the Guildford Union had appointed as their relieving officer for the casual poor a police-constable. To such an act of the Board he did not think there could be any substantial objection; but he had been further informed that this relieving officer in carrying out his duties had proceeded upon the principle of inquiring into each particular case before granting relief, and when he considered that the applicant was what was called professional tramp, he refused relief. Now although he was supported by the Board of Guardians in the course he had taken he (the Earl of Carnarvon) wished to point out that the views of this officer in this respect were absolutely and wholly wrong. Vagrancy, as their Lordships knew, was treated by the law as an offence, and was punishable as such. But to inflict punishment upon a vagrant by absolute starvation—by refusing all relief—whether the applicant was a professional tramp or not was wholly contrary to the law. The duty of the guardians was simply to administer relief to those who were really in want of it, and the relieving officer was bound to afford board and lodging for the night to any casual applicant, provided he had no bona fide reason for supposing that such person was merely simulating destitution for the purpose of obtaining relief under false pretences. When the circumstances of this case at Guildford were brought to the knowledge of his noble Friend at the head of the Poor Law Board (the Earl of Devon) he immediately sent down instructions to the Poor Law Guardians in respect to the treatment of the casual poor, which instructions the guardians were to communicate to their relieving officer for his guidance; but the guardians by a majority of votes decided against obeying these instructions. Things therefore went on as before. When the Poor Law Board was again applied to it again sent down similar instructions for the guidance of the relieving officer; but with the same result as before, as the guardians a second time decided by a majority against communicating them to their official. A third time was the case brought before his noble Friend and a third time did he issue instruction to the Board of Guardians; but on this occasion his noble Friend did not communicate his instructions by letter, but by an Inspector, whom he sent down to Guildford, and who pointed out to the guardian that they had been acting illegally in regard to the treatment given by their relieving officer to the casual poor; but once more the guardians refused to communicate the instructions to the relieving officer on the ground that he must have been already aware through the newspapers of involving vigilant caution, knowledge, and attention to business. But the system had gradually departed from every one of these guarantees, and the consequence was that out-door relief had largely increased and the rates were rapidly increasing. Abuses had been gradually creeping into the whole system, and the time was not distant when he believed it would be necessary for the safety of the country to consider the whole question, which was much more formidable now than when the new Poor Law Act was first passed. He had been intimately acquainted with the late Mr. Senior, who was the real author and framer of that measure. He was in constant communication with him while he was pursuing his inquiries as a Poor Law Commissioner, and he well remembered, when congratulating him on the passing of the Bill, and saying that the country was now permanently safe in consequence, that gentleman told him not to be over certain—they had a lease for thirty or forty years, but before that period expired they would have the whole thing to do over again. He hoped their Lordships would give this question their most serious attention.

LORD REDESDALE said, that the question of vagrancy was a very important one, and he thought that the number of professional vagrants, which was gradually increasing, required a serious check. He concurred with the noble Lord who had just spoken (Lord Overstone) in thinking that very great abuses had crept, and were creeping into the administration of the Poor Law, and as to the great evils that were likely to ensue; but he was sorry to say that the disposition of the present day was to prevent a check being put to these evils, and rather to aggravate them. The real truth to be borne in mind was, that the purpose of the Poor Law was not that the funds raised under it, in many instances from very poor persons, should be administered as charitable gifts, but for the relief of destitution. He believed, after all, that the principle adopted by the Guildford Board of Guardians in regard to vagrants was a right one—namely, to discourage the system of professional tramps, who were not travelling about in quest of honest employment, but were mere idle vagrants who shunned work. The only way of dealing properly with that class was through a police officer; but that was not strictly the law. It would require some alteration before that could well be done. Relief should be given even in cases of vagrancy where there was believed to be destitution; but the parties should be brought before the magistrate next morning and committed for vagrancy. He had been Chairman of a Board of Guardians since the institution of the new Poor Law, and therefore he had had a good deal of experience in the matter, and he believed it to be impossible in many instances to grant relief to vagrants in workhouse in all cases, because in some unions there was only one workhouse for several parishes upon different lines of road. The result was that in the towns where there was no workhouse the paupers went to the overseer or to the relieving officer if he resided in the place. Now, it appeared to him that neither of those persons was competent to deal with cases of vagrancy. They did not like to expose the windows of their residences to be broken by the violence of those persons in the event of refusal to relieve them. He (Lord Redesdale) thought that the best course to pursue would be not to admit vagrants into the workhouses except in cases of sickness, when they must be maintained until their recovery. There were some persons who had peculiar views in reference to Poor Law relief; and, probably, some of those who raised objections took the view that the amount raised by rates should be administered as charity, and that there should be a general relief of all who came and asked for it. If such a system were introduced into this country it would lead to evils of a most dangerous character; and he certainly hoped that some law would be passed which would be founded upon this principle, that while the honest vagrant should receive relief the inveterate professional vagrant should as such suffer by the law. He thought it would be better to have separate houses for vagrants, administered under the discretion of a police officer appointed by the Board of Guardians. When Boards of Guardians were accused of obstinacy, he must say that, for the most part, the majority of a Board were better judges than the minority as to the manner in which relief was administered.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that he had no objection to the alteration proposed by the noble Earl the President of the Poor Law Board; but he hoped that the Correspondence which was to be laid before them would bring out the exact

Poor Law, he maintained those principles ought to be applied to all classes of the poor, without distinction. The treatment of all should be based on the idea of giving relief, and not of dispensing charity. In giving relief to aged and sick paupers they must have strict rules which would prevent aged and sick persons from having comforts within the workhouse which those of the same class did not enjoy out of it, and from coming upon the rates when they might be supported by their own relations, if they were able to support them, or when they might be in a position to obtain the relief they required for themselves. That was no imaginary difficulty. The question often arose whether medical aid should or should not be given by the parish; it was then the duty of the guardians to scrutinize these cases, and if they thought the relatives of the sick person had the means of supplying relief, then they should refuse the assistance of the parish doctor. Undoubtedly, if the sick poor required parish relief, it ought to be afforded them in the most humane and efficient manner; and he hoped improvements would be made in the administration of the law in that respect, and that due vigilance would be exercised to secure that the attendance on the sick poor should be as good as it ought to be. Then, again, as to the aged poor, it was obvious that, if they gave relief indiscriminately to aged persons, they took away all inducement to lay by money as a provision for old age, and would teach them to look upon the whole wealth of the country as their insurance fund for the time of infirmity and old age. If that were not guarded against, they would fall back into that system of universal pauperism from which they only emerged by means of the new Poor Law. There was a great tendency among the industrial poor to slide into the position of paupers. This argument was used among them—“Why should we work hard to maintain our families, when we see parish assistance given to other men who are as able as we are to support their families?” He contended that one of the duties of Boards of Guardians was to see that the interest of the industrious and deserving poor was properly cared for. He meant that they should not be put in a position in which they could justly complain of the relief that was given. It was a mistake to suppose that the burden of the Poor Law fell only on the rich—it fell very heavily on the poor also. He had frequently met with poor persons who remonstrated against the relief given to persons who, they said, were perfectly able to maintain themselves. The poorer ratepayers were as jealous as any class of the community about relief being granted where it was not really deserved. These were feelings which it was desirable to encourage, and he trusted that, in considering any alteration in the administration of the Poor Law, they would be carefully borne in mind. He wished, however, to be understood as being entirely in favour of such improvements in the administration of the system as would insure that the assistance which must be given should be given in the best and most effective manner possible, and as opposed to any economy which might produce hardship or insufficiency of relief. He believed that in many parts of the country there had been neglect in that matter. He thought there ought to be more supervision exercised on the part of the Poor Law Board and that not merely on the plea of economy but to introduce efficiency and to prevent those hardships in the administration of the law which, if not prevented, might be used as arguments hereafter for the subversion of the whole system. Thinking that our Poor Law ought to be maintained on its present principles, he hoped that he might be excused for making these few remarks.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, that the Poor Law could not be carried out in the present day with the stringency which was originally contemplated; and no one who had attended to the subject could doubt that a very great change had within the last few years occurred in its administration. There could now, in the great majority of cases, be no just complaint that the workhouses were not suited to their purpose or were inadequately provided for the comfort of their inmates. To his own knowledge there were workhouses which had become not hospitals, but what the French called hospices, where the inmates obtained a great deal more comfort than people of the same class out of them. Special care should, he thought, be taken that too great an extension was not given to that change. Endeavours should be made to keep down vagrancy by giving what relief was absolutely necessary to vagrants, but nothing beyond that. Houses had been hired in some cases expressly for the purpose of receiving vagrants, and this was a better system than taking them into the workhouse. Union rating had the moment suspended the choice of a plan was this—A competition was invited, which was responded to by a certain number of architects — eight or nine — who sent in plans, which were publicly exhibited. Before they were sent in, a memorandum was drawn up of the terms on which the exhibition was to be held; and it was that referees should be appointed by the Treasury, who were to determine to which of the plans exhibited the award of superior execution ought to be given. The referees who were charged with this duty were unable to agree that any one of the plans exhibited in competition was the best; but they selected two, and made an award that they thought the interior plan of one of the competitors and the exterior plan of another were the best. That award having been made, some of the unsuccessful competitors objected to it as being beyond the power of the referees. They said—“We entered into competition each one against every other, but not into competition with the joint production of two others.” In the memorandum of the terms of competition it was stated that any matter in dispute should be referred to the decision of the Attorney General. That had been done, and he believed the reference was still going on. Until it was concluded, it would not be in the power of the Commissioners for the erection of the Palace of Justice to take any steps in regard to the selection of any plan. He hoped that before long the reference would be terminated, and that the Commissioners would then be allowed to proceed with the erection of the building.

MONETARY CONFERENCE (PARIS).

ADDRESS FOR A PAPER.

EARL FORTESCUE, in moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to request that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to order that there be laid before this House, the Proceedings of the International Monetary Conference held in Paris, June 1867; and to call Attention to the Report adopted by the International Conference on Weights, Measures, and Coins, held in Paris, June 1867,”— said, that the account of the proceedings of the Monetary Congress held at Paris was exceedingly interesting. It clearly showed the loss of time caused by the existing system, and of that labour the loss of which was the loss of wealth to the commerce of the world. The matter was one of importance to every civilized nation, and perhaps to none more than to that which stood at the head of the commercial nations of the world. There were now several foreign nations, including the Danubian Principalities, the source of a great part of our corn importations, the Brazils, and several South American States, among whom the use of the metric system in its entirety was compulsory. When he reminded their Lordships that among a population of 146,000,000 of the most civilized nations of the world the use of the metric system was compulsory, and that our trade in imports and exports with these States amounted to no less than £180,000,000 annually, they would allow that a case had been made out for assimilating to this more perfect system our own most confused, inconvenient, and anomalous system of weights and measures. There were other States, containing a population of 70,000,000, whose systems of weights and measures had been more or less assimilated to the metric system. Over and above these, there were two great commercial nations—the United States of America and this country—in which the use of the metric system was permissive; but in our own case in the least satisfactory method. By the English law no weights or measures could be lawfully used which were unstamped; but there was no authority in any public Department to stamp these weights or measures according to the metric system, so as to enable them to be used without exposing the users to a penalty. The United States had in like manner made the use of metric weights and measures permissive; but they had gone a great deal further. Far from refusing to stamp these weights and measures, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized and invited to furnish each State of the Union with a series of weights and measures on the metric system, and the Director of the Post Office had provided the Post Office with postal balances for foreign letters, graduated in metric grammes. The metric system was, in fact, viewed with constantly increasing favour in the United States. The metrical system was at present being used by various communities, numbering 150,000,000 persons, and the Report which had been come to by the International Congress had been assented to by representatives of twenty different Governments. Mr. Hoffman had declared that a consequence of the diversity in systems of weights and measures works on chymistry were sealed books to foreigners, although the language in which they were written was understood by the reader. Merchants were

COLONIAL BISHOPS.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to Parliamentary Paper No. 575, of Session 1867, Whether that Paper correctly describes the Bishopric of Columbia as endowed with property derived from a benefaction of Miss Burdett Coutts; whether it is not the fact that the Bishoprics of Adelaide and Capetown have been endowed in like manner by the same donor; and, if so, whether the Return might not with propriety be amended so as to describe the three foundations with the same correctness and precision?

MR. ADDERLEY replied that the Paper in question was compiled, as all other such Papers were, from Returns furnished by the Governors of the different Colonies. The Governor of British Columbia gave more details than were contained in the Returns from Adelaide and Capetown. In these two Returns no statement of Miss Coutts's endowment of £17,500 for each place had been made. The Colonial Office had, however, obtained information on the point from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and an amended Return would be laid on the table.

IRELAND — THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.—QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When he will lay upon the Table of the House the draft of the Charter Her Majesty's Government propose to grant to the Roman Catholic University of Ireland?

THE EARL OF MAYO: A correspondence has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the two prelates appointed at the meeting of the Irish Roman Catholic hierarchy held in Dublin to communicate with the Government on the part of the Archbishops and Bishops. That correspondence is now nearly complete; and it will be my duty, I hope in a few days, to lay it on the table of the House. No steps will be taken as regards a Charter for the Catholic University till the House is in possession of the correspondence.

THE RITUAL COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why the Second Report of the Ritual Commission, which was laid upon the Table of this House on the 30th April, by command of Her Majesty, has not yet been distributed among Members, and how soon it will be in their hands?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied that he was informed by the Secretary of the Commission that the reason of the delay was, that, attached to the Report, there was a large blue book of about 300 pages. He believed, however, that it would be delivered to Members to-morrow.

ARMY—FORTIFICATIONS—DOCKYARDS AND NAVAL ARSENALS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will place upon the Table of the House a Statement of the several Contracts entered into and still unfinished for work connected with or for the purposes of the proposed Fortifications for the defence of the Dockyards and Naval Arsenals, &c., of the United Kingdom and the Colonies, showing the date of each Contract; the nature of the work to be executed or material to be provided; the total amount to be paid; the extent of work executed or quest of the people to annex them, the Free State being a party to the transaction by agreeing to the boundary, and the Basutos agreeing to such taxation as should make their annexation entail no additional charge on the Government of Natal. As to what events have precipitated measures, we have not yet received any explanation. The reports from the spot which have reached the newspapers are certainly highly coloured and distorted, but the Boers' invasion and devastation of Basuto-land have probably been the cause of hastening and necessitating measures of precaution. Sir Philip Wodehouse has moved up to the spot with the Cape Mounted Police, and with no other force, but he has delayed forwarding his communications. We hear, however, that he has been well received, even in Dutch quarters. As soon as despatches are received from him the whole Correspondence shall be laid upon the table of the House.

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE.

QUESTION.

MR. CORRANCE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the exemption contemplated in favour of Spanish or Portuguese Cattle landed at Liverpool or Southampton will extend to their admission into the Islington Market subsequently to the separation of the Markets by the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied that the markets had not yet been separated by the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill, as the Bill had not become an Act. When the occasion arose, he had no doubt it would be considered by the Privy Council. In the meanwhile, he must decline to answer a hypothetical Question.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON RAILWAYS.

QUESTION.

MR. HORSFALL said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, If the Report of the Royal Commission on Railways has received the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; and whether they are prepared to introduce legislative measures founded thereon?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, in reply, that the Board of Trade had given most serious and careful attention to the Report of the Commissioners, and a large portion of the Government Bill brought in by the President, which was in an advanced stage elsewhere, and would be shortly laid before that House, was based on recommendations contained in that Report. There were, however, several suggestions not included in the Bill of this Session. Some very important ones with reference to Private Bill legislation seemed to be rather within the province of the Standing Orders Committee; others to be matter of arrangement for railway companies themselves; while others, such as the recommendation of prosecutions by the Board of Trade, the Government could not adopt without further information and consideration.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. DILLWYN said, he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice. The subject was one of great importance, and well deserved the attention of the House. Unless there were some means of controlling the public expenditure, it would be very easy for the Government to ask a larger sum for a popular purpose than was required, and to apply the surplus to a less popular branch of the service. Accordingly, at the end of each Session the Appropriation Act was passed, and an examination of the accounts was, of course, necessary to see that the requirements of the House had been complied with. Up to a recent period the audit had been conducted by and on behalf of the Treasury; but in 1856 the Committee of Public Moneys was appointed, and various irregularities were brought to light, which induced the Committee to recommend that the system of audit should be altered, and that it should be transferred from the control of the Treasury to that of the House. In 1866 an Act of Parliament was passed altering the system, and expressly laying down the principle that the audit of public accounts should be made on behalf of the House of Commons. It was perfectly clear that the relative positions of the Audit Department and of the Treasury were thereby altered. The Treasury now stood in the same relation to the House of Commons as the Accounting Department before did to the Treasury, and the Audit Department now stood in the same relation to the House of Commons as it formerly did to the Treasury. The House of Commons found the money, and

Mr. Adderley

Treasury and the ex-Secretary—and they represented the men who were to be put on their trial. There were also independent Members on the Committee, like the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey); but these Gentlemen could not be expected to devote their whole time to the examination of the public accounts. What he wished to suggest instead of the present system was the appointment of a Standing Committee of the House, who should have the Audit Department under their direct control. The Auditor General would be their officer, and would be in direct communication with them; and they would then have some hope of knowing where deviations from the Appropriation Act had occurred in the administration of the finances of the country. It had been said that this was a moribund Parliament, and that it represented an expiring Constitution. For his part he did not look with any apprehension to the result of the Bill of last Session — although they should look forward to great changes. But it was desirable, he thought, to point out to the new Parliament—who would be new to the work—that, in the opinion of the present House, the present machinery of the Audit Department was defective in the respects pointed out by his Resolution. He hoped to have the support of the Government for the views which he now advocated, and which were, indeed, admirably summarized in a speech made by the present Prime Minister, in April 1856, in which the right hon. Gentleman said—

“An audit administration should be complete and independent. The whole accounts of the country should be placed under its control, and it ought to be responsible directly to that House.”—[3 Hansard, cxli. 700.]

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, in seconding the Motion, said, he had always been of opinion that the Act of 1866 was a mistake, and had been founded on wrong principles. One great objection to it was that it united together two functions that ought never to have been combined—namely, the office of Controller General of the Exchequer with that of Auditor General. The Controller General was the chief accountant of the Crown—all the public monies stood in his name; but no accountant ought to be an auditor. Take the case of any public company or great commercial establishment. What would be thought if the person to audit the accounts, was the cashier of the company? Would a gentleman allow his accounts to be audited by the steward who received his rents; or a shopkeeper employ to audit his accounts the man who had the control of the till? It was absurd, then, that the accountant of the Crown should be also the chief and, indeed, the only auditor of public accounts. That was a fundamentally vicious system. It appeared also to him that the Audit Department, to be efficient, should be a great and powerful Department — directly responsible to the House, and having complete control over the business it had to do, and not a subordinate Department. The Court or Chamber of Accounts at Paris was not a subordinate Department of the State; it was what was called a Sovereign Court. Besides its mere accounting power it had a judicial power over accountants, might order them to bring in their accounts at particular times, prescribe by what vouchers and other documents those accounts should be supported, and so forth. This seemed to him to be a model accounting system. It had been laid down on high authority that every Department should have a complete control over its own business; but the Board of Audit formerly, and the Accountant General now, had no such power. Accounts were sent in, and, if anything was wrong, it was queried and sent back; but there was no power of compelling the Auditor to answer queries; and, in case of default, there must be a reference to the Treasury, who would instruct the Attorney General to proceed against the accountant. There was another defect. Sometimes the Board of Audit were very much encumbered with business; at other times it had scarcely anything to do. The reason was because the Board of Audit had no power to regulate its own business, to prescribe the times at which the accountants should bring in their accounts, or to compel them, unless by a roundabout process, to produce documents or vouchers, or to answer questions. They might make an order on the accountants; but, if the accountants did not obey, there was no remedy. They might call the spirits; but, if the spirits did not come, they could do nothing. Therefore the Audit Department was practically impotent to perform its duties, as it was in the hands of the accountants and of the Treasury. Now, the Audit Board ought to have the power—if necessary, by taking him into custody—to compel an accountant to appear before them. They ought to have a power similar to that of the Courts of Law of committing for contempt. He was convinced the proposal that he should nominate his own clerks, it must be remembered that he had no communication with the House. He would necessarily, therefore, have to apply to some Department for their salaries, and to what Department could he apply but to the Treasury? Under the present system the clerks were appointed by the Government, who were responsible to Parliament, and their salaries were voted by the House. Thus Parliament had really more control over these officers than if they were appointed by the Auditor General, independent of Parliament. Several years used formerly to elapse before the application of the sums voted by Parliament could be entirely tested; but he believed that during one Session the expenditure of the previous Session was now thoroughly audited and laid before the House. He believed this point had been nearly reached, and it ought, at all events, to be aimed at. With regard to the Controller of the Exchequer, Controllers had very different functions in different Departments, and that officer had nothing to do with the expenditure. All he had to do was to satisfy himself, before the Treasury could draw ls. of the annual supply from the Bank of England, that it had been authorized by Act of Parliament. He admitted that the accounts might be simplified and rendered more intelligible; but there was no ground for regarding the present arrangement as a retrograde one, or for supposing that the system proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) would be an improvement.

MR. POLLARD - URQUHART said, that, having read with some attention the evidence taken before the Public Moneys Committee, he felt inclined to concur in the views of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) and the hon. Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) rather than those of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey). Mr. Romilly, in his evidence before that Committee, said—

“If a subordinate officer were placed at the Treasury for the purpose of audit, it would be a system that could hardly command confidence, and certainly would not be entitled to it. There is a very great difficulty in a Board checking the great public Departments. . . . In the case of the army and navy accounts there is an appeal to the superior authority of the Treasury, and the Treasury themselves have the power of deciding on disputed points. The check is one over which the Treasury have full control. . . . The check would be very different if it were to be exercised not by, or on behalf of, the Treasury, but over them. There is always a risk in checking the accounts of any Department by officers placed in that Department, that these officers become part and parcel of that Department.”

Mr. Romilly's opinions on this subject were entitled to great consideration. Alteration had since been made, and the Audit Board now exercised an important function, seeing that all expenditure was in conformity with Acts of Parliament. It might be said that this was a mere matter of form. Lord Monteagle's experience certainly was to the contrary; for in his time there were several differences with the Treasury. And if control and supervision were necessary in the days when the Controller General and the Audit Board were separate, it was much more necessary now that these two Departments were united. Every Opposition found fault with the Ministerial Estimates; but when they in turn succeeded to power, the tendency was always to increase, and not to diminish. The people of this country wanted to know the reason why expenditure, which was always represented in the first instance as merely temporary, was suffered to become permanent, and they called, and would call more strongly hereafter, for an account distinctly stated. The necessity for some impartial and external audit was evident. This might be thought a small matter; but the real fact was that all attempts at improvement had been but gradual and tentative since in 1780 the great jobbery of that day first attracted the attention of Burke. There was still room for more improvement. It was very easy to those versed in figures to make an account appear perfectly fair, while all the time it covered very gross extravagances. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had rendered good service in calling attention to the matter, and he should certainly support him if he went to a division.

MR. WHITE said, he was much surprised that the language of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) varied so widely from what it was a little time ago, on this very question. The present system of audit was established under the Act of 1866 (29 & 30 Vict., c. 39) “An Act to Consolidate the Duties of the Exchequer and Audit Departments; to regulate the Receipt, Custody, and Issue of Public Moneys, and to provide for the Audit of the Accounts thereof.” When that Bill was read a second time the hon. Member for Peterborough said “it was practically an abolition of all control over the issues of Votes in Supply.” And he

43, any Accountant dissatisfied with any disallowance or charge in his accounts made by the Auditor-General may appeal from his decision to the Treasury, who may direct the relief of the appellant, wholly or in part. And the same Clause declares that "the Controller and Auditor General shall govern himself accordingly." He would then ask was it not absurd to pretend that the present system of public audit was a valid and efficient one? With perfect confidence in the integrity of the present Controller and Auditor General (Sir William Dunbar) he could not help fearing, mayhap some years hence, there might be some startling evidence of the inefficacy of the present method of check and supervision of the public expenditure. Some of his hearers could not already have forgotten the gigantic Exchequer fraud perpetrated by Beaumont Smith. Besides, he (Mr. White) must remind the House that some men, and even officials too, have very misty notions of what were the functions or duties of an auditor. A remarkable instance came under the cognizance of the House only a few years back. The auditor of the Duchy of Lancaster—although holding a patent office—was summarily dismissed because he required to know whether the balance alleged to be lying at the banker's was really in their hands—the neglect of which simple precaution, by the way, enabled Pullinger to rob the Union Bank of £250,000. The Attorney General of the Duchy was asked by the Committee whether the auditor, if called upon by a Minute of the Chancellor, or Council of the Duchy, to sign a bill or document which, to his knowledge, was a misappropriation of the property, or contained any fraudulent act upon the property of the Duchy should do so, on the mere production of the Minute. The answer of the Attorney General of the Duchy was—

"Yes; I have no doubt, in his pure character of auditor, although he was aware the Chancellor had either committed a fraud in passing the Resolution, or had been imposed upon by fraud; if the Chancellor persisted in the Minute, it would be the auditor's duty to sign it."

He had said enough, but he trusted in no carping or captious spirit. His sincere desire was to secure such a system of public audit as should deserve the public confidence. The House should not forget what had happened, and what might happen, unless proper checks and safeguards were provided by Parliament. As custodians of the public purse they should ever remember the terse dictum of Lord Lyndhurst, "That jealousy, not confidence, is the eternally governing principle of the British Constitution."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was right that the House of Commons should be satisfied that the audit of the public accounts should be entirely independent; but had any case been made out against the independence of the Audit Department? The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) had so fully and clearly answered the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) on that point, that he (Mr. Hankey) had relieved him from a great part of the duty which otherwise it would have been incumbent on him to perform. There seemed to be some confusion in the minds of the hon. Gentleman who made the Motion, and of the hon. and learned Baronet who seconded it, as to the functions of Controller and Auditor General. They had spoken of that officer as an accountant in one capacity and an auditor in another. Now, he did not understand in what sense the Controller and Auditor General was an accountant [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: As Controller General he is an accountant, but as Auditor he is not an accountant.] The hon. Member for Swansea said that the whole of the public money was paid into his account; no doubt the money was paid into the Exchequer account; but it should be remembered that the Controller and Auditor General had not the power of drawing money from that account. The Treasury had to make application to the Controller and Auditor General; and when he had satisfied himself of the legality of the demand, he gave credit to the Treasury for a certain amount. But when that was done it was the Treasury, and not the Controller and Auditor General, who were concerned with the issue of the money. When it was issued, then came in the function of the Controller and Auditor General as Auditor, to see that the money had been spent in accordance with the provisions of the Appropriation Act. It appeared to him that there was now a very proper and stringent system of check; and, as far as the Act had been tried, he must say it had worked well. He might remark that the present Government were not responsible for that Act, which was introduced by the late Government, and had received the sanction of the Committee on Public Accounts. The only fault, as far as he was aware, to be found with the Act, was that the alteration which it introduced the Act, the House would gain a complete knowledge of the manner in which the public money had been expended. At present it could hardly be said that the Act was in full operation; and he had been informed by those who were well acquainted with the subject, that three or four years would probably elapse before the system got into perfect working order. He did not say that it might not be necessary to introduce some modifications into the Act; but he must express his opinion that its principle was a sound one, and that, as far as experience went at present, it had worked remarkably well.

MR. O'REILLY said, he was of opinion that a considerable improvement had been effected in the system of audit by the Act of 1866, for which the country was mainly indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, but that it was still in some respects deficient. The Audit Department ought to be an independent one, responsible to Parliament alone, and its duty should be to see that the money voted in the House of Commons was applied to the purposes for which it was voted. Therefore, the Audit Department should be supreme in respect of audit over all other Departments, and responsible only to Parliament. Within his own Department the Auditor General ought to be supreme and independent. The Select Committee recommended that the Assistant Auditor General should have the power of reporting separately to Parliament; but it would have been most undesirable to give effect to that recommendation. It was inconsistent with one of the main objects of the measure, which was to substitute individual responsibility for the divided responsibility of a Board. The proposal was a sort of compromise between two things, either of which alone might have been desirable; but of the two he preferred individual responsibility. The matter is very clearly stated in the Correspondence laid before Parliament last year. It said—

“The main object of substituting for the Board of Audit a single chief with supreme authority in the Department, is to fix the whole responsibility of the due execution of all the duties upon one public officer. It is true the Bill emerged from the Select Committee with some important alterations. A power was given by it to the Assistant Controller and Auditor, to report jointly with the Auditor General. On what grounds this change was proposed by the Committee it was difficult to say, as they neither took evidence on the point, or made any allusion to it in their Report to the House. When the Bill came back in its amended form to the House, it was pointed out by several Members, and among others by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) that the proposal to assign co-ordinate functions to the assistant officer was inconsistent with the measure itself, one of the purpose of which was to substitute individual responsibility for the divided action of a Board. The Chairman of the Select Committee (Mr. Bouverie represented to the then Chancellor of the Exchequer the desirableness, on public grounds, of omitting the provision in question. This suggestion met with Mr. Gladstone's ready acquiescence, as it was an admission of the soundness of the original view of the Government—that on the supercession of the Board of Audit, individual responsibility was the only alternative basis upon which the business of the Consolidated Exchequer and Audit Department could be satisfactorily conducted.”

It did not seem a practicable proposal to have a Standing Committee of that House associated with the Auditor General, who would be able to throw responsibility upon them. The Auditor General should be the supreme and final authority as to the form in which the accounts should be made out. Much was said of “Departmental audit;” but that was simply an Office examination of accounts, and could not be spoken of in the sense of an Appropriation audit, the object of which was to see that money was spent under proper authority from the Treasury. The audit of the India Office accounts was first intrusted to an auditor at £200 a year; a more adequate salary had since been paid, but it would be well if the India Office accounts were also submitted to Parliamentary audit. With regard to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), he thought it was substantially right in its spirit; but, in his opinion, it was not necessary that it should then be pressed upon the consideration of the House.

MR. CHILDERS wished to say a few words on a question which had been brought forward so much to the public advantage by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). Many interesting questions had been raised in the debate, such as the audit of Indian expenditure and other matters, which would doubtless be again brought forward; but he would confine himself to two—namely, the importance of securing in the Executive Government a proper system of control over the public expenditure, and, in the Audit Department, a proper system of audit for the information of the House; and these two things had been in some respects a little confused. On the first he deprecated the language of his hon. Friend the Member for Dundalk, who said the House should be jealous of

MR. GLADSTONE rose to make an appeal to his hon. Friend. He begged him to observe the position in which he proposed to place the House. The Motion consisted of two Resolutions, the first of which was—

“That those who conduct the audit of Public Accounts on behalf of the House of Commons ought to be independent of the Executive Government, and directly responsible to this House.”

Now that was a proposition which was full of undeniable and sound doctrine. The Audit Department ought to act on the part of the House of Commons, and ought to be directly responsible to that House so far as it was in the power of the Executive Government to make it. It was impossible to deny that proposition, and why, then, should his hon. Friend make the House divide upon it? The only course that could be taken against his hon. Friend would be to move the Previous Question; but that was a course which he should be loth to adopt, as it would seem like placing an obstruction in the way of his hon. Friend, whose object was a rational one. When once the House had got a fair sample of the working of the Act of 1866 in the shape of the accounts produced under that Act, then, if there was a sentiment on the part of his hon. Friend or the House that there ought to be further inquiry and that further legislation might be needed, he should think it extremely unwise on the part of the Executive to place any obstacles in the way; because if there was any jealousy felt by the House of Commons, that jealousy would be sure to be stimulated by any resistance of the Government, even though plausible reasons might be given for that resistance. If a portion of the representatives of the people entertained jealousy and suspicion with respect to the machinery provided for auditing the public accounts, the existence of such feelings would be a good reason for granting any further inquiry which might be demanded. But his hon. Friend, he thought, would see that it was not desirable for the dignity of that House to call upon it to assert this first proposition as an abstract Resolution; for every one, whether on the Opposition or the Treasury Bench, must be of one mind with his hon. Friend on the subject. The second Resolution, as a matter of fact, was more doubtful. That Resolution was—

“That, inasmuch as the appointment, salaries, and pensions of the officers intrusted with the conduct of such audit are more or less under the control of the Treasury, the present system is one which imperatively calls for revision.”

Now, the words “more or less” made a very important difference, for if the salaries and pensions were “more” under the Treasury, or, in other words, if they were to a considerable degree under it, the system might call for revision. But if they were but little under the Treasury, the call for revision might not be so imperative. The House had not really got the facts to enable it to judge how the new system was working, and he thought it would be very disadvantageous to the cause which his hon. Friend had taken up if he were to insist on the House giving judgment before the materials of that judgment were in their hands. He hoped, therefore, his hon. Friend would not force a division in a case in which the apparent weight of authority against him might produce an effect unfavourable to the object he had in view.

MR. DILLWYN said, he could not resist the appeal which had been made to him by his right hon. Friend.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LOCAL CHARGES ON REAL PROPERTY. RESOLUTION.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, it was with no little diffidence that he rose to move the Resolution that stood in his name. The subject to which it referred created no inconsiderable interest at the present time. The principle which it involved was grave and important; and should it be necessary for him to make any apology to the House for introducing so difficult a question, his excuse must be that for many years he had interested himself in the administration of local burdens; that he had always felt strongly the injustice of the present mode of assessing them; and in the western counties, in which he resided, this subject had been very ably and very anxiously discussed. He advocated this proposal on the broad principles of right and justice. He was neither animated by any party or political spirit. He was happy to think that this question was quite remote from the arena of party politics. Neither was he influenced by class interests, for no man in that House felt more than he did that the prosperity of the community at large depended on that of every class; and he would be the last man to say or do anything which should be detrimental to any class whatever. The Resolution which the reign of Henry VIII. until the 43rd of Elizabeth, and he contended that it was the language of reason, of justice, and of policy. By the Act of 43rd Elizabeth, passed in 1601, however, overseers and churchwardens were empowered to assess all property particularized therein, the contributions being made compulsory and parochial, and every parish, instead of every inhabitant, being expected to assist according to ability. That basis had undergone no alteration for nearly 300 years, and personal property not being mentioned in that Act, it had been exempted from taxation. Judges had held that all property to be assessable must be local, visible, and productive, and money and securities for money, not being local, had escaped taxation. There had been many appeals for the purpose of rating personal property. In 1775 the Judges gave it as their opinion that stock-in-trade was assessable; but it had never been practically or only partially carried out. In 1840 an Act of exemption was passed, and stock-in-trade had been exempt ever since. He gave no opinion whether it was right or desirable to assess stock-in-trade; there were many difficulties in the way which were perhaps insuperable. But was it creditable to a British House of Commons for thirty years to pass an annual Act of exemption rather than seriously consider the matter? The law was either good or bad: if good, it should be enforced; if bad, it should be modified. The Act of Elizabeth might be said to have dealt with the then existing state of things, both as regards property and society. Land and houses were at that time the chief, if not the only source of wealth. It was therefore not unreasonable that personal property should not be particularized. How different was the state of things now! Real property was not more than one-third of the annual income of the country. In 1865 the annual rateable value of property assessed to the income tax in the same year was only £90,000,000, while the property was valued at £290,000,000, and the aggregate annual income of the country was upwards of £650,000,000; for it must be borne in mind that incomes under £100 per annum were not assessed. But the local taxation was assessed on this £90,000,000 only; in fact, £6 out of every £7 of the annual income of the kingdom escaped local taxation, and paid nothing to the relief of the poor. How had all these large incomes from personal property been acquired? From labour—from labour of poor men—people make wealth. All capital was acquired by labour; why, then, should not wealth thus created contribute to the exigencies of the State and the relief of the poor, to the comfort of the afflicted, and maintenance of the aged, many of whom had worn themselves out, and spent the best part of their lives in acquiring for others wealth and affluence? The present state of things was most anomalous. The overseer called on every small cottage holder for his poor rate, although he was little better off than those for whose benefit that rate was collected. They were, in fact, rating one pauper for the support of another—robbing Peter to pay Paul; yet hard by, in the same parish probably, there lived a man receiving £1,000 a year who did not pay a farthing towards the support of the poor. The present mode of assessment was most impolitic; it tended to discourage improvements in land, and to diminish produce, thus so far prejudicially affecting the community at large. A man purchasing a large estate, with the buildings dilapidated and the land undrained, invested a considerable sum in the necessary improvements, and was immediately assessed on those improvements. Why should he pay local taxation on the money thus invested more than if it had remained perhaps, in the foreign funds? So again a man who has taken a farm for fourteen years, he calculated the outgoings when he agreed for his rent. He found, unless he spent a large sum in manure and improvements, it would be a ruinous undertaking. He borrowed money for the purpose, and immediately the assessment committee came down upon him and made him pay local taxation on the personal property he had borrowed and invested in it. Surely these men, by investing additional capital in their estates, not only benefited themselves, but by increasing the produce of their land benefited the community at large. They were more patriotic and deserved more encouragement than the man who invested the same amount in foreign securities buried, as it were, his talent in a napkin, sits down with folded arms, and is simply content to receive his own with usury. So long as land enjoyed exclusive privileges it was fair it should pay exclusive burdens; but, protection being removed, those exclusive burdens should cease. He was an advocate for Free Trade; but they had not got it. He considered all exceptional legislation was bad; and the principle of Free Trade having been adopted, he desired that pense; and that the present mode of assessment, which exclusively fell on real property, was not reconcilable with sound principles of political and financial economy, much less of justice. This was a question that must be fairly met and fairly considered. This was a difficulty which must be solved. This was a grievance which must be mitigated. He would now move his Resolution, feeling confidence in the principle of equity it embodied; in the sympathy of all classes of the community out-of-doors; and in the sense of justice which ever actuated their representatives in the British House of Commons.

MR. CORRANCE, in rising to second the Resolution of his hon. Friend, said, he was conscious of doing so under certain disadvantages in this respect—first, that when he entered the House that night he had no intention of entering upon that debate; and second, that he had his doubts as to the expediency of discussing it in so general a form as that. But when he heard the able statement of his hon. Friend, not only did those doubts cease, but he felt that there was no danger that the cause would suffer from any shortcomings on his part. But, if that was a personal disadvantage, it might not be so considered by the House; for it was at least a guarantee for this—he should not go into statistics, and his remarks would be brief. Now, he had said that he agreed with the hon. Member as to the fact, and he thought, also, that by the Lords' Committee of 1846 these were fully borne out. Those facts rested upon grounds absolutely irrefragable, as he thought. Nevertheless, that inquiry laid over a wide ground and took in a great range of both general and local taxation, each one of which, in detail, would require close investigation and patient proof. It included the incidence of income tax, land tax, tithes, and of local rates, and no less so the actual economic effect of such burdens upon the industry itself—and the effect of such deduction from the gross produce of such an industry of any reproductive class. Those perhaps were scarcely suspected, for use and custom reconciled them to much. They knew that they paid income tax upon the gross sum, without any deduction for agency or collection, or incidental expenses, which amounted to about 25 per cent. It reached the last farthing they possessed. Of the land tax they knew that it fell upon agriculture in a larger proportion than aught else; that it could only be re-adjusted within parochial limits, and that under the power of redemption all expensive improvements could evade the tax; that in Liverpool and most large towns it was nominal at most, and that upon railways, canals, docks, &c., it was at once freed by redemption from the proportionate increase. All that was within demonstration and proof. They also learnt that under a system of local taxation, founded upon old and obsolete legislation, and perplexed by omission and doubts, the proportion of such charges upon land were immense—that one-sixth of the property of England alone contributed to such charges as that. But of each of such things the House would no doubt require proof beyond that which in that general discussion they were able to give. They must raise those questions in detail, and view in detail their rights. They must show not only the burden, but its effects; not only its pressure upon a class, but its effects upon industry itself. Nor did he think that that would be a difficult task, if to the plain and accepted axiom of political economy, they might hope to have the consent of that House. To that they could claim the concurrence of Ricardo, who spoke thus—

“It must be acknowledged that in the actual state of the poor rate, a usual larger amount falls upon the produce of the farmer, than on other classes in proportion to their respective profits. The farmers will, therefore, have less motive to devote his capital to land than to some other trade, unless the price of his produce is raised.”

Again—

“Any tax, whether in the shape of land tax, or rate on produce when obtained, will increase the cost of produce, and will, unless under direct competition with other untaxed produce, raise its price to the consumer; but if, under any circumstances, the price of produce did not so rise as to compensate the cultivator for the tax, he would naturally quit a trade where his profits were reduced below the general level.”

Now these are axiomatic facts. Of all political economy they lie at the very root—no new reading could disturb or shake them, not even the authority of the hon. Member for Westminster himself. And if such be the case—if such, on inquiry fairly raised and fully carried out, they could prove—not that landlords were unfairly used, not that tenants were unjustly taxed, but that through a misunderstanding of the true economic position, a neglect of the plainest laws, capital was alienated and the industry depressed—he could, he thought with some confidence, seek in that House their redress.

consideration, and for the purpose of increasing the burdens on land, and thus placing the taxation on a more equitable system than now prevailed. He might refer to the example of America. There, a man's property was calculated and assessed as on a capital sum. A merchant would have to pay on the amount of his capital assessed at a certain rate. A professional man would be assessed in the same way on any capital he had, and for a sum which was merely nominal as compared with the assessment on the merchant or landowner. That he held to be a far more just plan than the income tax in this country. He did hope that a change would take place, but that it would increase the burdens on land and relieve others who were unjustly assessed from the undue proportion they now paid. As to the charges on land for the support of the Militia, they were mere fragments of the far more onerous and important burdens formerly laid on the landholders, who, as he had said, were once bound to furnish all the fighting men of the country at their own expense. The trifle they had now to pay for the Militia was a mere remembrance of the time when more righteous laws prevailed, and a sign of hope that a return might be hereafter made to a more equitable system of legislation.

MR. LIDDELL said, he had listened with pleasure—he thought he might say in common with the House at large—to the speech of his hon. Friend (Sir Massey Lopes), which had dealt so fully with the facts and figures of the question as materially to smooth the way of speakers later in the debate. He would not attempt to deal with the very important question before the House in the off-hand and abstract manner in which it had been dealt with by the hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. M'Laren), nor would he enter into a contention with the hon. Member as to the distinction without difference between landowners and landholders; but would merely observe upon that point that, with regard to liability to the payment of rates, he had always understood that they were upon precisely the same footing. His hon. Friend who brought forward the Motion dwelt much upon those burdens that affected the land from which other species of property was exempt. Now, it was to one class of exempted property which he wished in the first place to refer—namely, mines other than coal mines, and he wished to point out the position which the Courts of Law had taken up with regard to it, and how it had been regarded by eminent authorities in this House. With regard to the Courts of Law, it had been laid down as early as the time of Lord Mansfield that all kinds of property which were not specially named in the statute of Elizabeth as rateable for the relief of the poor were exempt from that burden; and the law was therefore held to exempt all mines other than coal mines. The efforts of the Courts of late years had been to extricate themselves from the difficulties they had by their own decisions created for themselves; and when a case was heard in the Court of Exchequer Chambers as to the rating of a metallic mine, the Judges held that, were the question not incumbered by previous decisions, they would have decided in favour of the rating of these mines. The Courts, therefore, were in this position—they had given an interpretation to the law which they did not now agree in; but because this had been once given they lacked courage to reverse it. Decided opinions had been frequently expressed upon this question, both by Committees of the House and also by influential Members in debate. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers), then the President of the Poor Law Board, speaking in the House, a couple of years ago, with reference to the important decision given in the Mersey Dock case, and its probable result upon property hitherto exempted from taxation, said the House should understand, not that the law was unjust or that fresh legislation was requisite, but that there had been a misconstruction of the law, and that all exemptions were mere questions of privilege and favour. As soon as the area of chargeability was extended by the recent Act, from the Parish to the Union, it became evident that the exemption of personal property would be questioned, and that the House would be forced to consider the policy of that exemption. It was promised, indeed, at the time, that the matter should engage the serious attention of the Poor Law Board; but from that day to this nothing further had been heard upon the subject. The law as it stood recognized a liability upon two grounds; but only the first of these—that arising in respect of the occupation of land—appeared to have been borne in mind; but the House must remember the second subject—namely, the liability of inhabitants to the rate in respect of the enjoyment of per-

MR. READ said, he regretted to have to differ from so high an historical authority as the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren); but his reading of history was that, previous to the Reformation, it was the monasteries and other religious institutions, and not the land, which maintained the poor. The arguments with reference to the income tax applied with equal force to the moneyed interest and other holders of property as to the land. And he could not agree with the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) that the tenant-farmers were unduly exempted from the payment of income tax, because they were assessed on only half the amount of their rent. On the contrary, he was of opinion that they were assessed very fully and amply. The hon. Gentleman had argued that the stock-in-trade of farmers ought to be assessed if the stock-in-trade of other persons were to contribute to the rates; but on this point he begged to inform the hon. Gentleman that stock-in-trade in agriculture was supposed in the eye of the law to be assessed in order to produce the rent paid to the landlord. In addition to the two exemptions of real property already named—mines and woodlands—from rating, there was a third exemption. The owner of real property by overstocking his land with game so deteriorated the rent as to allow that land to escape its fair assessment and contribute its fair share to the maintenance of the poor. In America the assessment was not on the annual rent, but on the annual profit. The hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) had proved by statistics that the rates gradually and constantly increased. Several items of new local taxation had been introduced, and more were expected if turnpikes and education were to be paid out of the rates. The farmers were twitted with this—What a bother you make when you pay anything in the shape of rates! Why, what a bother and fuss was made when an additional income tax of a 1*d.* was imposed! But every 1*d.* rate which the farmer paid was equal to 2*d.* of the income tax. It was said that if the farmers were relieved from the charges they now had to bear the landlords would reap all the benefits; but he, on the contrary, felt assured that all small savings would go into the pockets of the tenants. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said the other day in reply to a deputation that the tax on shepherds' dogs was not on the shepherd, but on the farmer, and therefore he supposed that those who argued that all rates fell on the owner would say if the farmer paid 10*s.* for a tax on two dogs it was a burden on the landlord. With regard to a national rate, he thought it ought to be particularly guarded against. It was impossible to restrict extravagance or to prevent centralization. If they could possibly localize the income tax it would have a good effect, and a certain portion might be applied to local expenditure. The assistance given to local taxation from the Consolidated Fund in 1866 amounted to £1,398,000, and out of that sum only £211,000 went to the country for police purposes, while the metropolis received £176,000 for the same object. Then with respect to lunatics. What had the land particularly to do with them? In the country, it was said, the management rested with the county authorities. But the moment any saving was proposed, down came a Government officer in the shape of a Commissioner, and ordered what must be done. The result was that as soon as a poor patient was cured by luxuries and comfort, he was sent away, and when he returned to the rough usage of the cottage he speedily relapsed. The lunatic was cured for a time, but very seldom permanently. He thought that many of these fixed charges ought to be borne by the nation, but that all relief to the casual poor should be paid by the district. This was no question of country against town; but he thought the towns ought to take up the case even more readily than the country. It was essentially the case of the poor man, and was more likely to receive in a Parliament elected by household suffrage a fair and generous consideration than in the present.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, the hon. Baronet who had introduced the Motion (Sir Massey Lopes) had rendered a real service to the House and the country, for no one who had considered the subject could doubt that it required a much more systematic and deliberate consideration than it had yet received, not only on account of its great importance and the amount of taxation it involved, but because its importance was constantly increasing. In the natural progress of things more and more duties were continually being imposed on the Government, which duties would be almost always best performed by the localities, and at the same time, as the taxation of localities must constantly increase in order to meet increasing expenses, if there and large expenditure upon different properties, it would be found that the return for those outlays was by no means beyond the limits of a fair and moderate return ; but it was rather a smaller return than was generally received by those who invested their capital in trade and commerce. He doubted whether any hon. Member who had not really turned his attention to that point could form a conception of the enormous outlay that was being constantly made in this country by those who were in the occupation of land. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), in his remarks, had made a frank and liberal admission. That hon. Gentleman said he thought that the land was charged with burdens, in the shape of local taxation, beyond those which it deserved to bear. He (Mr. Floyer) thanked the hon. Gentleman for that admission ; but there were some points of his speech with which he could not agree. The hon. Member drew a comparison between the position of householders and the occupiers of land in respect to the income tax ; and he said that in the one case the occupier of land only paid on half the value of his holding, whereas the householder paid upon the whole value ; but the hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten the landlords' income tax, which was paid upon the full value of the land. So that in effect it might be said that there were one-and-a-half payments of income tax from the land, whilst there was but one payment from the house. The hon. Member for Oxford also observed that he considered that the payment of poor rates ought to be looked upon by the landowners and occupiers as a provision for the old and infirm people who had outlived their strength for work, but who passed their best days in labouring for the improvement of their farms. He (Mr. Floyer) trusted so long as the poor existed upon the land—and they had the highest authority for knowing that they would never cease out of it—that they would be looked upon, by both landowners and occupiers, in the kindest spirit, and with the feeling that it was through the labours of the poor they had derived their incomes and the land had been made profitable to them. The question, however, was very much open to doubt, whether a larger proportion of the labouring classes were not employed by the manufacturing and commercial population than by the occupiers of land. He believed that the statistics would show such

to be the fact. Therefore, as the land round towns was assessed it had to contribute, under recent legislation, largely to the support of those who had once been employed in commercial and trading operations, but who had now become old and helpless. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) drew a historical parallel between the liabilities to charges thrown upon landowners and landholders as compared with the other portions of the population who were engaged in manufacturing and commercial operations ; and, in referring to very early times he mentioned, amongst other things, the liability of landholders and their retainers to serve in the wars under the Crown. It was true that a certain portion of the land of the country had been held upon what was called knight service—that was, that the owners and occupiers were obliged to serve their Sovereign in the event of war at home or abroad ; but the hon. Gentleman had forgotten to tell them that a large portion of the land was held by persons on free socage, and who were not liable to knight service. Besides, it should be also recollected that those who were actually employed in knight service received for such service from the Crown ample payment for the services they had so rendered. It was, therefore, a mistake to suppose that such service was gratuitously rendered. He (Mr. Floyer) denied that the payment of the land tax was a commutation for the services to which the hon. Member for Edinburgh referred. The fact was, those feudal tenures had been done away with at an early period of the reign of Charles II. Therefore, the land tax, which was imposed at the time of William III., could not be considered as a commutation or substitute for those liabilities and charges previously imposed on them. Then the hon. Member had made an error in his comparison of the charges imposed on the different classes. He had chosen to estimate the impost on landed proprietors at something like 20 per cent of their incomes ; but history would show him that merchants and manufacturers paid more ; for they had to pay fifteenths not only upon their incomes, but on their whole personal property. The hon. Member had, therefore, failed to make out that in olden times merchants and manufacturers were taxed less heavily than those who had to do with the land. As a matter of fact, the very reverse was the case. There was no doubt that a strong feeling existed in this country that the limits of true, but it was only a very little step, and it was a great part of the policy of the promoters of that Act that the area of charge would still remain coterminous with the area of management. He was glad to be able to admit, and his admission was all the more unprejudiced, as he originally viewed that Act with little favour, that in many cases the effect of that measure had been the reverse of what had been anticipated, and that extravagance of management had not resulted from its adoption. Much as he agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Westbury (Sir Massey Lopes), he was far from wishing to see local burdens levied upon anything but locally rateable property. There were certain exemptions from rating which he agreed should be got rid of; but those exemptions might be counted on the fingers. He did not think that the plausible suggestion which had been thrown out—that stock-in-trade should be rated—was practicable. The system had been tried in Scotland, and he believed to a certain extent still existed in that country. But it was found impracticable to rate stock-in-trade, and it was, he believed, exempted by Act of Parliament. The evidence of Sir George Lewis, given before a Committee of the House of Lords fifteen or sixteen years ago, showed that such a plan would weigh very severely upon the farmer, while in the towns it would not have such an effect in equalizing burdens as was commonly supposed. In this as in many other matters the circumstances of the town and of the country were very different. In the towns the poor rate assessment was in fact equivalent to a house tax, and that, of a very severe and oppressive character. He did not, indeed, see how taxation could weigh more heavily than it did even now in many parts of the metropolis. The charge for relief of the poor had existed from the time of Elizabeth as a charge upon the visible property of a town, and he believed the maintenance of the pauper was a charge from which the owners of visible property would never shrink. There were other charges, however, which he thought were most unfair on the poor rates, and Parliament would act wisely in preventing the addition of more of such charges. With regard to the question of lunatic asylums, it was obvious that, so far as those asylums were places for the maintenance of the indigent poor, the charge was one which could be fairly borne by the real property of the district in which the asylum was situated. But, so far as the asylum was a place provided by the humanity of the age, with special appliances and skilled superintendence for the treatment of the unfortunate class placed within its walls, he thought the charge should be made upon the general taxation of the country. It was a matter not of local, but of general necessity and convenience. It was proper, too, that there should be a contribution from the Imperial funds in aid of the maintenance of constabulary forces. An important question, that of the education rate, was looming in the distance. He had a strong objection to an education rate levied as such upon the owners of rateable property; but he did not wish to enter into that discussion now. He merely quoted it as an instance in which Parliament might interfere to prevent what he thought would be a great injustice. It was not easy to see whether householders in towns or landholders and others in counties were subjected to the most oppressive burdens. The whole subject was one of great interest and importance, but, while he thanked his hon. Friend for bringing it forward, he thought that, looking to the words of the Motion, it would not be well to press it. The exemptions from rateability were few. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had hoped to have introduced a Bill respecting the exemption of Government property—a subject which had been already reported upon by a Select Committee. With a few exceptions of palaces and great public Offices, he believed that that exemption might be got rid of. Then it had been said that in cases where much game existed the land was under-rated, and a partial exemption was thereby created; but he did not see any reason why that point could not be dealt with by the Assessment Committees. As to the exemptions of mineral property his hon. Friend the Member for Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) had prepared a measure which might perhaps pass the House this Session; and the exemptions in the case of timber might also be dealt with. But these exemptions, if abolished, would not amount to anything like the relief sought for by his hon. Friend (Sir Massey Lopes), and those who thought that personal property might be the subject of rating.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, very great objection was felt by many people to the constitution of the boards which were intrusted with the management of lunatic asylums. They were not responsible either presented a large class of persons interested upon this question—namely, the boatmen of Deal and of the Kent Coast. [“Hear, hear!”] He understood that cheer, and he wished to say that, although much abuse had been showered upon the Deal boatmen by anonymous writers in the public Press, he was prepared to say that those men were as brave, as enduring, and, as a body, as honest a class of men as could be found. He did not desire to introduce irrelevant matter upon this Bill; but if those who abused the boatmen in the Press should ever bring the matter before the House of Commons, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would be ready to defend them boldly in his place. And what did these men ask? That salvage cases and matters in which they were concerned should be tried by nautical men who understood such matters rather than by lawyers who knew nothing about them. He would give an instance of what he meant. He had lately been at Deal when the afternoon was fine and calm, but at night there was rough weather and a real gale, during which time the boatmen were out, risking their lives and their properties for the sake of saving the lives and properties of others. Now, these men would rather have their claims dealt with by a local Board upon the spot, composed of naval men who knew the circumstances of the case, than by some County Court Judge who had been sleeping quietly in his bed some miles inland, and could hardly understand the perils to which they had been subject. With great respect to the County Court Judges, they were not persons likely to understand these matters. And then came the serious question of delay. The County Court might not be sitting for some days after a case occurred, and was the captain of a ship to be delayed until the sitting of this Court? Such delay would be most detrimental. Now there was, in the Cinque Ports, a Court appointed by the authority of the Lord Warden, composed of naval men and merchants, quite competent to try and decide these cases—they were summoned at two hours’ notice—they were bound to meet within twenty-four hours, and were sworn before trying a case. What Court could be more speedy or more economical? Formerly, this Court dealt with these cases largely, but some fifteen years ago, a Lloyd’s agent had been sent to Deal, before whom parties preferred to go for arbitration, because the awards he gave were generally larger than those of the old Court. But, if properly worked, this Court was admirably fitted to serve as a local Court to deal with these matters. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would prefer that, upon general principles, legislation upon this subject should be postponed. But, if the House determined to go into Committee, he should feel bound to move words which would prevent the abolition of the Lord Warden’s Court, which might, at least, exist as a concurrent jurisdiction with the County Court, so that people should not be driven to the latter if they preferred to settle their business before the former. If the House determined to abolish the Lord Warden’s Court, it would be his duty to urge the claims to compensation of the officers who had vested rights in such Court. He hoped, however, that the Court would be left in existence, and in what he had said, he felt that he had been doing his duty to his constituents and also to the country.

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE said, as it might be convenient that the House should know what course the Government proposed to take, he rose thus early in the debate. His hon. Friend (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had made a speech which would have been more appropriate on the second reading. If his hon. Friend had been in the House when the Bill was read a second time, he might have been saved the trouble of making many of the observations he had just delivered, because similar remarks had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond, and were answered by the Government at the time. It was unnecessary for him to defend the course of those who desired to legislate upon this subject while a Commission was inquiring into it, seeing that on a more important question than this, the House was willing to legislate without waiting until the Commission now sitting upon it had made their Report. The reason why the Government had assented to the second reading of this Bill was that they had been informed that there was considerable pressure for legislation upon this subject. The provisions of the Bill were only intended to serve a temporary purpose, and they could be easily altered in the event of their being inconsistent with the recommendations in the Report of the Commission. He agreed with the hon. Member that the boatmen of the ports on the East and South coasts were a much abused race, and probably they deserved a good deal of that abuse, but got rather more than their de-local tribunal of this kind was surely much better than the County Court, which often sat at a distance, and not more frequently than once a month. On these grounds he seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Gorst,)

—instead thereof.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he wished to point attention to the provisions of the Bill as at present printed. He could not but think that many hon. Gentlemen had not read the reprint of the Bill. The avowed object of the original Bill was to facilitate the trial of cases which, from the small amount at stake, it was inconvenient to carry to the Court of Admiralty. To remedy the failure of justice which consequently occurred, the hon. Member for Kingston-upon-Hull proposed, in the first instance, to confer Admiralty jurisdiction, in all Admiralty cases where the claim did not exceed £500, on twenty-two County Courts named in the Bill, appointing a Judge to each of these with a salary of £2,000 a year. This would have involved an expense to the country of £44,000 a year, and the jurisdiction thus given would have been rather formidable. The grievance, he had thought, might be met by a much less cumbrous machinery than the original Bill contained. The object to be desired was to give a local and speedy trial in certain, not in all cases, by an Admiralty mode of procedure, not by means of Admiralty jurisdiction. He had therefore suggested to the author of the Bill certain alterations, which would in his opinion greatly improve it, and he hoped render it acceptable to the House. First of all he said there should not be twenty-two County Courts named in the Bill; but where it was thought necessary or desirable a jurisdiction should be given to a County Court, similar to, but not the same as Admiralty jurisdiction. That should be done by Order in Council, and without increasing the charge on the country. Jurisdiction would be given not in all but only in some Admiralty causes. Wherever a cause of action mentioned in the Bill arose within the County Court district so appointed, the suit would be commenced, not by seizing the ship, but by a summons served on the captain of the ship or on the owner if resident within the district. There should be a list of nautical assessors laid before the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and confirmed by him, so that, in cases of salvage and collision, the County Court Judge if he thought proper, or if required by either party, would be assisted by two nautical assessors. Originally the Bill gave Admiralty jurisdiction in all Admiralty cases above £500; but under the Bill it was no longer an Admiralty but a County Court jurisdiction. He had thought that jurisdiction in cases of the amount of £500 was inconsistent with the other cases of their ordinary jurisdiction which the County Court entertained, and the hon. Gentleman had consented to lower that amount to £300 in collision and salvage cases, and to less in others. Judging from his own experience where in collision and salvage cases the claim was for £300, the decision would not be for more than from £50 to £100. He had also inserted in the Bill a clause giving a power of appeal to the High Court of Admiralty where any difficulty arose. Under these circumstances he thought that the Bill was one which the House should pass; and he hoped it would not be supposed that the Government had acted in the matter, as the hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had stated, merely to satisfy the hon. Member for Kingston-on-Hull (Mr. Norwood), and other Members who supported the Bill.

MR. NORWOOD thought, with regard to the Cinque Ports, it would be objectionable to have two tribunals in the same district.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL pointed out that the retention of the Cinque Ports Court would be perfectly consistent with the principle of the Bill—namely, the establishment of local courts; and as the jurisdiction would only be a concurrent one—and there existed a strong feeling in favour of retaining it in the district—he suggested that it might be desirable to continue it.

MAJOR DICKSON wished, in correction of a mistake that had been made, to say that the Commissioners of the Cinque Ports were not mere tradesmen. They thoroughly understood the questions which came before them, and their decisions were well worthy of confidence. He should be glad to know when the Commission on this subject were expected to make their Report.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Repeal of Acts and Parts of Acts).

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN moved the addition of words to the effect that nothing in the Act should affect the power of any Court appointed under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, and under the jurisdiction of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. The Vice President of the Board of Trade was in error as to the constitution of the Cinque Ports Courts, such Courts being composed of naval captains and persons well acquainted with the subjects coming before them, and in the case of the settlement of a claim referred to it was an agent of Lloyd's, and not the Court of the Lord Warden, who acted on the occasion.

MR. NORWOOD assented to this suggestion, and the Amendment was withdrawn in order that the Cinque Ports Admiralty jurisdiction might be retained by an alteration in the Schedule of the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

MR. GRAVES moved the following new clause (Port of Liverpool and the Court of Passage):—

"The port of Liverpool and the district within the jurisdiction of the Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool shall not be included in any County Court district for the purposes of this Act, but the said Court of Passage, upon such an Order in Council being made as Her Majesty is by this Act authorized to make with respect to County Courts, shall have the like jurisdiction, powers, and authorities as are by this Act conferred on County Courts, and as if that Court were a County Court; but nothing herein shall be deemed to enlarge the area over which the jurisdiction of the Court of Passage extends, or to alter the rules and regulations for holding the said Court, or to take away or restrict any jurisdiction, power, or authority already vested in that Court; and fees received in that Court under this Act shall be dealt with as fees received in that Court under its ordinary jurisdiction."

MR. NORWOOD said, the Court of Passage sat quarterly only, and that would lead to a most unsatisfactory state of things.

Clause amended and agreed to, and added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

MILITARY AT ELECTIONS (IRELAND)

(Mr. Serjeant Barry, Mr. Gavin, Mr. Edmonds.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, he proposed that the second reading of the Bill should be postponed.

MR. VANCE complained of the Bill being continually put on the Paper and then adjourned. It was inconvenient to Members to have to attend and then find that the Bill was put off.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, that being the case, he would move the second reading of the Bill. His object in postponing it was to suit the convenience of Members. The object of the Bill was to assimilate the law of England and Scotland to Ireland with reference to the presence of the military at Parliamentary elections. The military were not only allowed to be present at elections in Ireland, but were employed to escort voters to the poll, thereby causing great dissatisfaction, and interfering with the freedom of election. The practice not only caused dissatisfaction amongst the people of Ireland, but was objectionable to the military engaged in the service. The English Act, passed in 1741, provided that the military should be removed two miles from the place of election; and, if the Secretary of War neglected to carry out the law, he was to be deprived of his office. There must have been an exception made in favour of the Household troops; because it appeared that the presence of the Guards at an election of Westminster caused the House to pass a Resolution declaring that it was a violation of the law. In 1847 another Act was passed, directing that, instead of removing the military two miles from the place of election, they should be confined to their barracks during the election, and that was the Act which he proposed by this Bill to extend to Ireland. In England, the military might be called on in case of necessity; but it must be shown that the necessity was so strong as to supersede the law. If they searched the records of English elections, they would find a degree of disorder utterly unknown at elections in Ireland; and therefore it could not be urged that, though the law might be fit for England, it was not for Ireland, in consequence of the greater prevalence of rioting at Irish elections. Even if there were a peculiar tendency to riot at elections, it was caused

MR. BAGWELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Bagwell.)

The House divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 57: Majority 20.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. VANCE thought that the subject had been sufficiently discussed.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN then moved that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

MR. MONSELL appealed to the noble Earl the Secretary for Ireland to allow the debate to be adjourned, as it was at the instance of the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance) that the question had been forced on at that late hour.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, that if hon. Members were determined to persist in this course it would be useless to enter into a contest. If the hon. Baronet (Sir Patrick O'Brien) would withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the House, he would consent to the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate arising; Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

BRISTOL ELECTION.

Petition of Electors of the City of Bristol, complaining of that Election [App. 1]; referred to the General Committee of Elections, and Mr. SPEAKER to issue his Warrants for persons, papers, and records.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (METRIC SYSTEM) BILL—[BILL 44.]

(Mr. Ewart, Mr. Bazley, Mr. Baines, Mr. John Benjamin Smith, Mr. Graves.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. EWART, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, he would shortly state the progress of the system. It was well known that it arose in France towards the close of the great Revolution, and was the production of some of the most scientific minds of that period in France. It encountered great opposition; and the practical philosophers sent on a mission to measure a quadrant of the meridian were often in danger from the partizans of the Revolution. The first Napoleon, who was hostile to new ideas in general, was also hostile to the metric system. He therefore restored the old system of weights and measures concurrently with the new one, and created a spurious system which was denominated the système usuel. It was not till a much later period—the year 1837—that Louis Philippe fixed a term, within which it was enacted that the metric system should be compulsorily adopted as the system of France. That term was the year 1840. Such compulsory enactment was the only practical way of securing the introduction of the measure. During all this length of time—a period of between forty and fifty years—the metric system was comparatively unknown in England. On the important subject of an uniform system of weights and measures, the country seems to have gone to sleep, nor was it awakened till the period of the Great Exhibition of 1851. It was then found difficult to ascertain the

The only course for our Government to adopt is to fix a term of years within which the system shall take effect, and to work up to that object, lengthening or shortening the term according to the circumstances of the case, and the educational progress of the nation. As we proceeded, difficulties would vanish, as they did in France and Portugal under the determined perseverance of the rulers of those countries; and the simplicity of the system would become more and more apparent. In the Report of M. Jacobi, which he could not sufficiently recommend to the attention of the House, the results of the metric system for the promotion of education, trade, and manufactures were exhibited in a striking manner. The fact is, the metric system is the complement and corollary of Free Trade. By adopting it, we shall extend the commerce of England and the commerce of the world.

MR. GRAVES: Sir, when my hon. Friend invited me to support the principle of the Bill which he has just submitted to the House, I felt some hesitation in acceding to his request, from the fact, that though long convinced of the necessity of a uniform system of weights and measures, I had not given that serious consideration to the precise character of the change which its importance deserved; it was, however, a question which, as representing a large commercial community, I could not shirk, and with the full consciousness of the responsibility attaching to such representation, I entered upon the consideration of the proposal, and I am bound to say the more I examined into it, the more was I satisfied of the inconvenience attending our intricate systems, and the greater appeared to be the necessity for adopting in lieu of them the metric and decimal, which are simplicity itself, and have the advantage of being extensively used in many of the commercial nations of the world. There is, no doubt, always a great difficulty in altering a system which has become interwoven with the daily and hourly avocations of a people, and the older the country the stronger the difficulty. England has always shown herself averse to change; but, on the other hand, when once the public mind has become impressed with the necessity for change, it is remarkable with what facility it is accomplished. Let me recall the House to what took place in Ireland not many years since, when a change was made in the currency; it was urged then, as I dare say it will be to-day, that confusion would result and great dissatisfaction arise, but happily wiser counsels prevailed; the currency was altered; some inconvenience was felt, but in twelve months it was all forgotten, and everyone was delighted with the change. Everyone in this House will probably admit that the introduction of one uniform system throughout the whole country would be an immense improvement. Now, let me ask hon. Members to consider whether the inconvenience which must attend the securing of uniformity would be much increased by taking one step more, and making the change a perfect one? I think it would not, and that it will be wiser not to involve the country in any new system, till it is prepared for one which will meet our own wants, and which will bring us into communion with other nations. It is hardly necessary for me to dwell on the variety which exists in our present system, or the endless trouble and confusion which grows out of it; everyone is more or less cognizant of it. It is a heritage derived from the union of countries possessing different standards of weights and measures, each preserving its own to the disadvantage of the whole. We have, for instance, the English mile, 1,760 yards; the Irish mile, 2,240 yards; and the Scotch mile, 1,980 yards; and there is the English acre, 4,840 yards; the Irish acre, 7,840 yards; and the Scotch acre 1,980 yards, all differing in quantities. Then there is the stone of meat, 8 lbs.; of cheese, 16 lbs.; hemp, 32 lbs.; flax, 16½ lbs., and many others which I could name. And there are the hundredweights, sometimes taken at 112 lbs., 120 lbs., and 140 lbs., in fact, putting aside all local customs, there are eleven systems of weights and measures, all well known and extensively used in the British Islands, and which are all sanctioned either by Act of Parliament or usage. The hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) has traced very succinctly the history of this question up to the present, and has shown that in any inquiry which has been instituted, there has been a large, if not a unanimous opinion expressed in favour of the abandonment of our present standards, and the adoption of a metric one, founded on the principle of decimal subdivision. The Bank of England, it would appear, some years since obtained an Act authorizing the decimal multiples and division of the Troy ounce for weighing bullion. In the year 1838 a Royal Commission was appointed, the Chairman wegian and Danish Members of the three Parliaments and others adopted this resolution—

“It is expedient to adopt the French metric system, with attendant subdivisions and denominations, for weights and measures in the three Scandinavian countries.”

The difference between our ton and hundredweight, in which nearly all the external trade of this country is conducted, and the metric ton and cental is happily so small that it could not derange our ideas for long. The present ton of 2,240 lbs. would only exceed the metric ton of 1000 kilogrammes or 2,205 lbs. by $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, while the hundred weight of 112 lbs. would only exceed the metric cental of $110\frac{1}{4}$ lbs. by $1\frac{1}{2}$ lbs.; while, by a similar accident, the practical standard of land measure in this country—namely, the surveyor's chain of 66 feet—does not differ from the metric chain of 20 metres by more than $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Coincidences so fortunate as those between our principal measures and those of the metric system render its adoption much easier to us than any other that has been proposed. It may possibly be urged as an objection to making the system compulsory, that it has been tried permissively and failed; that if it promised all the advantages its advocates claim of it, public opinion would have seized hold of it, and we should to-day witness its formal adoption; but the fact is, that no provision has been made for the standards, and consequently there is no means of verifying those in use. Indeed, I may mention as a fact, that a firm in London, having foreign trade, weighed goods with metric weights, and were summoned for using a metre which was not stamped, for the simple reason that there was no stamp to verify and stamp it by. It would, no doubt, be more in consonance with our practice to rely solely on permissive powers, and make good this oversight in the Act; but I fear we should only be adding to the existing complication, and that it must be obligatory to use as well as disuse. But before this could be done it will be necessary to educate the young, and prepare the public mind for the change before it would be prudent or desirable to introduce it. My hon. Friend has wisely, I think, left a blank when the Act would come into operation, and there is no part of the Bill which will need more careful consideration at our hands than passing the number of years which should elapse before compulsion would attach.

Mr. Graves

Now, Sir, I will say a few words on the educational aspect of this question, for it is an important one in its consideration. The House of Commons objected to make the metric system compulsory, very much on the ground that the people were not sufficiently educated in it. Well, Sir, as soon as the Permissive Bill was passed, a deputation from the Metric Committee of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and the Council of the International Decimal Association waited on the President of the Committee of Council for Education to ask that the metric system might be taught in the national schools; and what was the reply? “No; we cannot undertake to teach the metric system, unless it is made compulsory, because there is not time for teaching both systems.” Now, let me dwell for a moment on this want of time, for it has a strong bearing on my argument, and it is admitted on all hands that a large amount of scientific instruction must be introduced into our schools. A Committee is now occupied upstairs considering how this can best be done, and the want of time will form no small difficulty in the desired introduction of science. The period devoted to education is not likely to be extended, and it can only be by economizing the primary branches that it will be possible to embrace science to any extent. The evidence was taken before the Committee on Weights and Measures of 1862 as to the probable saving of time which would be effected by a substitution of the metric and decimal systems, and I will merely quote the reply of one witness, the Rev. Alfred Barrett—

“(1778.) How much do you think the boys' education would be shortened by the adoption of the decimal system?—Two years at least.

“(1779.) And would the learning of the decimal system be more agreeable?—Yes, I think so, and more complete.”

I can well believe that a large saving of time will be effected. Many of us will remember the difficulty we had in mastering the cumbrous “Table Book,” and when acquired how difficult to retain; while the simplicity of the metric system is such that the youngest child can learn it; and, once impressed on the mind, will never leave it. It has been said by that large class of persons who dislike innovations, and will not take the trouble of thinking for themselves, that the proposed change is a theoretical one, and only advocated for purposes of science. This is a great mistake. There is scarcely a Chamber of Commerce in this country which has not of a quadrant of a meridian through Paris (about $39\frac{1}{3}$ inches) which they termed a "metre." No doubt those multiples and aliquot parts of the metre which form the French measures of length are adjusted to meet the decimal system, as are also the measures of area, capacity, and weight, which are by a further process built upon the metre. But decimal notation is equally applicable for the man who finds that it helps his calculations whenever he has to work out his sum in our own old weights and measures; for decimals are really not a system, but, as I said, a process for easily reaching a certain practical result, like logarithms or algebraical symbols. I grant all the advantages which their friends urge in behalf of decimals for the purpose of calculation; but it requires no Act of Parliament to enable those who appreciate them to make their own calculations by way of decimals. Least of all, is legislation needed for the merchant princes—the men of enormous means and gigantic transactions—whose advocate my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) has made himself. They have but to keep a calculating clerk—an employé whose one duty is to manipulate the decimals—and they have got what they want. The sufferers will be the little people—the small buyers and sellers, the hucksters and the marketers—who will be compelled under the penalties of a compulsory Act of Parliament, to learn and to use a system which is, in its outward type, as non-natural as it is novel. I will, in order to prove my point, take the most familiar instance, and show that although a great deal has been said about the advantages of the French subdivisions, yet, after all, our subdivisions are more natural for the ordinary purposes of life. If a boy has to divide an apple, does he ever think anything about the circumference of the earth and its aliquot parts, or about the decimal system and its unrivalled facilities for calculation? No; but he takes his apple, and cuts it into two parts if he wants to halve it, and those halves into quarters if he wants to make four parts of it. In the same way, if a housewife has to cut up the loaf for her family, she divides it into two, into four, into eight, or into sixteen parts, and the sixteen people share their bread naturally. Supposing the loaf to weigh originally a pound, each of these sixteen divisions comes out an ounce. Such is the rationale of our system of measuring—the binary system so-called—founded on continual halving, and proved, by the common sense of mankind, before the great era of enlightenment inaugurated in 1789, to be the most convenient and natural one. But I may be told—Halve away, but then express your halvings in decimals. This is very easy for the merchant prince to do when he is totting up his large transactions in "centals," or for the Chancellor of the Exchequer when dealing with a nation's finances; but how will it suit the little transactions of daily life? I come back to my loaf. How are ordinary people to represent halves and quarters by decimal points? The symbol of a half is the figure "five," with a dot to its left hand; the symbol of half that quantity, that is of a quarter, is the sum twenty-five, also with a dot to its left hand. Arithmeticians understand how this can come about, and the symbols have grown natural in their eyes; but in what—even the most infinitesimal—degree do they tell their own story to the unlearned? What palpable relations towards each other can be disentangled out of these most frequently recurring symbols? What is there in the nature of things to show that the dotted five means a half, and the dotted twenty-five a half of that half, and a quarter of the "one," with no dot on either side, which stands for unity? Decimal notation is then, after all, as I have been arguing, a process, and not a system. It is a process good for the schools, and good for the bustling counting-house and the large sum, but the poor man would be completely thrown out if he had to employ—under penal legislation, too—decimal points for the purpose of measuring his little purchases by halves and quarters. With permissive means, such as now exist, the system will come in where it is wanted, and be kept out where it is not wanted; but under a compulsory enactment it will intrude itself everywhere, and show itself in its real colours as nothing less than a public nuisance. But the more we examine the Bill of the hon. Member for Dumfries, the more inapplicable do its provisions seem for the purposes of practical life. I have touched upon the principles of the metric system, let me now call the attention of the House to the language in which (after the French model) it is proposed to clothe that system. The new unit of weight is to be the "gram" or "gramme," which is attained by providing a square vessel, whose capacity is the cube of the hundredth part of a metre ("centimetre" to wit), and then weighing the amount of water which it will hold at a certain temperature. One-tenth part of this gram is to be a decigram, and ten times a gram is to be a dekagram, for the reformers decreed that aliquot parts were to be named after the Latin, and multiples after the Greek numerals. How in the name of common sense can we make poor people understand that because there are the letters "ci" in the one word it means the tenth of a gram, and that because there are the letters "ka" in the other it means ten grams, or 100 decigrams? My hon. Friends the Member for Dumfries and the Member for Liverpool come to this House representing great commercial transactions; but I stand up for the poor man. Only imagine an honest housewife going into a shop and asking for a decigram of pepper, and a dekagram of tea; imagine, too, the milkmaid selling her fluid by the litre. The Member for Liverpool is a kind-hearted man; is he then prepared, with all the stringent force of a penal statute, to enact that when one of his youthful constituents may desire to effect a commercial transaction in a manufacture for which one portion of that great borough is famous, he should be bound to go to the shop and tender his "dime" for three decigrams of Everton toffee? Fancy the farmer who has been accustomed ever since he entered on his farm to cultivate the "ten" or the "twelve acre field," having to consult the steward about liming the seventeen ars field, or be a criminal and a contemner of the laws of his country. Fancy the bumpkin who was prepared to boast that he was within a decimetre of catching the fox as he crept through a gap about a decametre from the white gate. If the theorists and the men of wealth—men of brains, it may be, but as certainly men of self-assurance—have worked out this system for themselves, there are poor men, who form the majority of mankind, for whom it will never answer, and there are men of brains at least equal who are decidedly opposed to its adoption. Is it not possible that our present system is not only quite as convenient and useful as the metric system, but a little more philosophical also? Why should a standard founded on the quadrant of the earth's circumference passing through the meridian of Paris be a better one than ours? No doubt it looks very solemn, from the grand nomenclature with which it is propped, but all those odd names for the French weights and mea-

asures were adopted at the first heat of the great Revolution, when the pedantic aping after ancient Greek and Latin terms led to their being applied to everything novel and French—from the scanty proportions of a lady's dress to the most intricate principles of jurisprudence and moral philosophy. Moreover, they have taken root in nations whose vernacular languages are themselves derived from the old classical tongues. May it not, I repeat, be just possible that our unit is as good as that of the French, even upon the most abstract grounds? I have received from Sir John Herschel a letter which induced me to come prominently forward and propose the rejection of the present Bill, instead of giving the silent vote with which I should otherwise have been contented. It is dated the 6th of April, 1868, and is in the following terms:—

"Pray pardon me for calling your attention to this Bill of Messrs. Ewart and Co., in the hope that you will oppose it—at all events by vote, and perhaps by word. It is most uncalled for and violent, and is supported, I believe, mainly by the chemists among men of science, whose reading and experimental practice bring them frequently into contact with the French weights and measures, and such engineers as have foreign contracts to execute. As respects a reference of our fundamental units to a natural standard, our national system is anything but the haphazard, indefensible thing it is usually represented to be. The polar axis of the earth is a much better natural unit than the quadrant of a meridian through Paris, and, dividing this into 500,000,000 inches, our actual imperial foot comes within a 1,000th part of twelve such inches, or a geometrical foot. I have by me two foot-rules—one by a good optician, the other purchased at a good shop, and none the worse for wear, which differ from each other by more than that quantity. Taking for the definition of our ounce the weight in air of 1-1,000th part of such a geometrical cubic foot of distilled water at 62° Fahrenheit (our standard temperature), according to the rate declared in the Act 5 Geo. IV., our actual imperial ounce differs from such geometrical ounce by only 1-7,000th part. But if, as some later experiments seem to have shown, that rate is slightly incorrect, then, according to these experiments—that is, according to the best of our actual knowledge—the weight of that bulk of water in vacuo at a temperature of 72° in place of 62° is, with absolute precision, identical with our actual imperial ounce also weighed in vacuo. As for our measures of capacity, our half-pint is the measure of ten ounces of water. Were it worth while to legislate for the correction of such trifling deviations, our system would stand on a footing every way more scientific, as concerns its units, than the French—to say nothing of the actual deviations of the latter from its own theoretical basis, which are by no means insignificant. As to the expediency of sweeping away our national system, and the probability that our shopkeepers will ever be got by such dragooning to buy and sell by the metre, litre, and kilogramme, or our farmers and landowners to measure their land by the hectare, and alter the title-deeds of their estates in accordance, &c., these are matters of statesmanship of which you are a much better judge than I profess to be. For my own part, I do not believe it; but the attempt would create the most extreme disgust and resistance."

I may parenthetically notice the astuteness with which the promoters of the change have kept in the background the portion of their scheme which refers to the alteration in the measure of area. The inconveniences hinted at by Sir John Herschel give reason enough for their prudent reticence. I shall now quote the opinion of another man of science, who, as it will be seen, approaches the question in a direction different from that by which Sir John Herschel travels to it. Professor De Morgan, who, as he himself says, is not only Professor of Mathematics at University College, but practises as an actuary, was one of the witnesses examined before the Committee of 1862, and came under the intellectual thumbscrew of the Chairman, the hon. Member for Dumfries. Being pressed (Q. 2331) upon the "metrical units," he answered—

"With regard to the metrical system, I should distinguish between two distinct things. Decimilation and metricalisation are two things which are often confounded; persons imagine that they must go together, which is not the case. Any system may be made decimal. I am as much for decimal division as any person can be; I believe that the decimal division of units might be introduced very easily; and I believe that it would co-exist perfectly well with the binary division, which I am satisfied must always be used by the common people, so far as halves and quarters are concerned. The halves and quarters are easily converted into decimal fractions. The decimal system, therefore, if fully established throughout the country, might go on and thrive, consistently with the habit of dividing all units into halves and quarters in common life.

"(2332.) Then you draw a distinction between the decimal system and the metrical system?—The metrical system is the decimal system with the units of the French system superadded. I object to the introduction of the French units into this country. I object to it upon a balance of convenience and inconvenience. I admit that the change might be convenient to our foreign commerce; but I believe that it would create such an immense amount of confusion throughout the country that the inconvenience would far more than counterbalance the advantage we should derive in our foreign commercial relations."

After submitting to a good deal of pressing about the experience of foreign countries, Professor De Morgan roundly stated (Answer 2338)—

"What I mean is, that there would be no advantage commensurate with the disadvantage

Mr. Beresford Hope

The advantage is in foreign commerce, and the disadvantage would be in the internal transactions of the country."

This led to the point-blank question (2339) "What are they?" And I particularly direct the attention of the House to the answer—

"In the first place, change is in itself a disadvantage, and a great change is a great disadvantage. I must first have it distinctly proved to me that there are advantages which would more than counterbalance the disadvantages I foresee in other respects. I take an objection to the metre. It arose from a mere fanciful connection with the quarter of the meridian, which I think of no practical importance to any man alive. You might just as well try to subdivide the distance from the earth to the moon. The metre is, of course, too long to be the common measure; it is a little longer than a yard. In decimal division the next thing would be the decimetre, which would be too short to take the place of our foot. The same thing applies very much to the other measures. I not only have a general objection to their size as compared with ours, but I think it would be necessary that a very strong case should be made out in their favour before any such change is effected."

The House will observe that Professor De Morgan approaches the consideration of the desirability of the unit having a direct commensurable relation to the great mundane dimensions in a different spirit from Sir John Herschel. The latter accepts the theoretical desirability of the relation, and then shows that our unit fulfils the law more perfectly than the French. Professor de Morgan assumes the practical attitude of a man of the world, and makes light of the necessity. But wide apart as these two men of science are in their premises, they meet in their practical conclusion, and equally condemn the penal enactment in our realm of the metrical system. I will only trouble the House with one more quotation from Professor De Morgan's evidence, as throwing a light upon the frame of mind in which the theorists of France took up the innovation—

"(2408.) The metre, you think, is fanciful?—It was obtained in a fanciful way. It was the ten millionth part of the quarter of the meridian."

"(2409.) Why do you consider that fanciful?—Because it was of no use to anybody, and among the reasons why it was adopted were such as this: that it would be a very pleasant thing for a small proprietor to say, 'I am lord of exactly such a fraction of the whole surface of the earth.' Now, I do not suppose that any little proprietor ever troubled his head with the fraction he held since the time when Adam began to delve the land."

The next witness whom I shall summon is one whom I heard with exceeding astonishment brought forward by the hon. Member for Liverpool as an advocate for the deci-experience to follow that common usage of mankind, rather than the more elaborate system of Greek and Latin terms?"—[Questions 74, 75, 76.]

I will not trouble the House with Mr. Levi's replies at length, as I think the questions themselves amount to a condemnation of the proposed system. The witness sums up—

"If you have two difficulties to encounter, one to introduce a new system, and another to learn a new language, the difficulty of introducing it" (the system) "is immensely increased."

Only let me entreat my hon. Friend not to be too proud to own himself wrong now, and return to a better mind. Mr. Airy has not been above doing so on this very question, for I find that he printed, in 1862, Notes for the Committee on Weights and Measures, referred to in his evidence, in which these paragraphs occurred—

"I once recommended the substitution of a measure of 2,000 yards instead of the mile of 1,760 yards; not only because it is decimal, but also because it approaches very near to one minute of a degree on the earth's surface, because it corresponds to the nautical mile, and because the Government possess the power (through the turnpike roads and the railways) of exhibiting the material symbols of the measure. But the inconvenience arising from the circumstance that 2,000 yards cannot be measured by the ordinary land chain of twenty-two yards would be so great, that I now doubt the expediency of such a course. I also once recommended the substitution of a weight of 100 lbs. instead of 112 lbs.; and I think that, in certain cases (as at the Custom House, where the duty on large weights of ten, &c., is charged not by the cwt. but by the lb.) it might be convenient. But, viewing the small connection which really exists between the use of the cwt. and the use of the lb., I now doubt the expediency of that substitution."

Such is the Bill which we are asked to pass. Its merits, such as they are, are compressed into the small compass of the facility of decimal notation for a certain class of sums, and the convenience of a common scale by which English and foreign merchants can compare their invoices, and chemists can conduct their experiments. All these advantages already lie within the compass of an easy option; and those who clamour most loudly for the change, are those most easily able to purchase the convenience for themselves. Its disadvantages I have recapitulated. If the Bill is to become not only an Act, but an Act which shall be in deed, and not in name only, law—an Act which shall not be a mockery and an incubus to the statute book—it must be weighted with heavy penalties, inexorably inflicted. Last year several of the English papers expressed deserved sympathy for an unlucky Belgian editor, who, in describing a great flood, innocently remarked that the river rose a certain number of toises. For this the unhappy man was dragged to the bar of justice as a criminal; he had violated the law of his land; he had brought the Belgian statue book into contempt; he had rebelled against authority; and so his doom was fine and imprisonment. This is what we shall have to come to in England, if the hon. Members for Dumfries and Liverpool and Stockport are to make their law and use their law. I have read the language in which the Mover of the Bill exposes the inconveniences of his own proposal. I have also brought to the Bar of the House men of the highest scientific eminence—Herschel and Airy and De Morgan—as witnesses against the Bill; but in asking the House to reject it, I do not rely upon their testimony. I speak in the name of the poor honest people of the country, traders and buyers, who will suffer infinite inconvenience and embarrassment, and who in their perplexity will have their small incomes cruelly mulcted, if this extraordinary measure becomes the law of the land.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he was sorry to find his hon. Friend, who held the position of Member for a scientific University where they had both been educated—a position in which he (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart) had assisted to place him—should sneer at a system of notation that was desired by so many eminent men, and by all the great merchants of the day. His hon. Friend had told a pitiful tale of what would happen to the small tradesmen, and the fruitwomen, if this Bill were passed. But did his hon. Friend never buy an apple from a woman in France or in Switzerland? The system prevailed in the retail trade of those countries, without any of the inconveniences which his hon. Friend had conjured up. It might be said that France was a highly centralized country, where the people were bound above all things to obey orders proceeding from head-quarters. But that was not true of such countries as Switzerland or Holland, where the people had as much social independence as in this country. Yet the system prevailed there, and the

the cause of education. Now, if education was to be considered merely as the teaching of an art of ciphering, that might be true; but if by education was meant instruction in the science of calculation, then the present system of arithmetic was much to be preferred. He wished to say one word on the subject of the compulsory nature of this Bill. A Permissive Bill would aggravate the inconveniences involved in the change. If it were made at all, that must be done by a compulsory measure, the operation of which the Government could facilitate, as the Austrian Government had facilitated the change in the coinage of North Italy, by printing tables and distributing them among the people. It was admitted on all hands that the change would cause inconvenience, and the quicker and sooner the change was made the less would the inconvenience be. They had a Permissive Bill already, but no one adopted the system; in fact, no individual merchant or trader would adopt it till the adoption was made general over the country. Suppose a Government were to adopt the decimal and the metrical system in their taxation and tariff, while the rest of the country adhered to the present system, one could easily see what a scene of confusion would ensue. Against the authorities cited he would quote that of Mr. Cobden, who, speaking of his residence in France, when he was negotiating the Treaty of Commerce, said—

“I was engaged for, I believe, six months in the constant study and conversion of English weights, measures, and prices into French weights, measures, and prices, and so much did I feel the disadvantages of our system as compared with that of France, that to say I felt mystified and annoyed would not express my feelings at the time; I felt humiliated. The one is simple, symmetrical, logical, and consistent; the other dislocated, complicated, uncouth, and incoherent.”

MR. J. B. SMITH said, when this question was last discussed in 1864 they witnessed the anomaly of Mr. Cobden supporting the metric system as a means of facilitating the growing intercourse between nations, created by the adoption of Free Trade, while the Free Trade Ministers—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) and the Member for Ashton (Mr. Milner Gibson)—voted against it. The Government, however, were defeated by a large majority, and then engaged to take charge of the Bill. But what a Bill it had proved to be! According to the Report of the Warden of the Standards one of the Inspectors of weights and measures had seized some weights in a tradesman's shop as being illegal, and brought the culprit before the magistrates. The simple-minded man took the Act of Parliament in his hand as his defence against the charge, and the magistrates dismissed the information, observing however that the Act was so loosely drawn they believed he was liable to a penalty. The Law Officers being consulted gave it as their opinion that, though it was lawful to use metric measures, anyone having them in his possession was liable to be prosecuted! It was absolutely necessary that a Bill should be brought forward to correct the blunders of the existing Act; and his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) now proposed the second reading of a Bill for the compulsory use, after a limited time, of the metric system of weights and measures. He (Mr. J. B. Smith) hoped that we should not now witness another anomaly—namely, the Government opposing this Bill, while in 1864 five of its present Members supported the metric system. The extraordinary progress which this system had made in other countries was sufficient evidence of its superiority to the old systems. It was now in use by 150,000,000 of people, and its use was permitted among upwards of 120,000,000 other people. The United States adopted it last year. A Royal Commission in India had recommended its adoption in the province of Bengal, and another Commission is now sitting to consider its adoption by all India. Last year the representatives of twenty nations assembled at Paris and recommended its adoption by all nations. M. Matthieu, the President of this assembly, in an admirable opening speech, observed—

“The establishment of railways and electric telegraphs, those great instruments of progress and civilization, has, so to say, changed the face of the world. Communications are now so easy and so rapid that the different countries are now in a condition in which they were not before, of being rather provinces of the same empire. We cannot now limit ourselves to attempting some simplification: we are led by the force of circumstances to extended reforms. This is the only mode for facilitating social transactions and commercial operations in the entire world.”

No less than 61 per cent of our exports go to countries using the metric system, and the time is arrived when we should no longer delay its adoption and thus facilitate our growing intercourse with all the world. The hon. Member for the University of Cambridge is opposed to this Bill, provinces. He might refer to a remarkable illustration of this fact which prevailed in the retail trade of Paris at the present day. A person going into a chandler's shop would ask for a livre or pound of candles, and the shopman would hand over a packet containing 485 grammes, or a pound, thus showing how completely the old system kept its hold on the mass of the population in France even though the new system had been introduced by a Revolution, and had been in use for half a century. He did not think the working men, still less the wives of the working men of England more likely to adopt the new system than the same class of people in France. Were Englishmen and Englishwomen to be driven out of their customs and into the adoption of a foreign nomenclature? At least, it was not worth while to go through a Revolution, as the French had done, for the sake of the decimal system. Our present arithmetical system was defensible as an intellectual exercise which developed the minds of scholars, and the decimal system would not be an advance from an educational point of view. Besides the change which had taken place in the corn trade proved that, consistently with the present system, the metric system might be introduced wherever it was considered convenient, whether with regard to weights or measures. The conclusion to which he had come was that, however convenient the metric system might be for the purposes of scientific investigation or engineering, it would be, as regarded the people of England, a grievous inconvenience to have a system introduced which was to be brought into compulsory action—to force upon them a system strange to them by name; of which they had a very imperfect comprehension; to which they could attach no definite idea; and which he believed would never take root in this country. The great diversity that still prevailed in measures of capacity, notwithstanding the efforts that had been made to obtain uniformity, showed the strength of custom in these matters and the difficulty of setting it aside, and the moral he would draw was, "Do not attempt to introduce a change still more at variance with the national taste and feelings, but endeavour to simplify our present system, and bring it into universal acceptance."

MR. MORRISON said, he opposed the Bill on different grounds. He concurred in the arguments for a decimal and uniform system, and particularly one that was international as well as national; but he could not ignore the fact that all the strength of a Government in the full fervour of revolutionary change in France had failed as yet to secure the entire acceptance of the metric system there, and he questioned whether the cause was advanced by trying to pass this measure in the last Session of a middle class Parliament, to be followed by one in which the working classes would be more perfectly represented. It would be one of the most unpopular measures ever passed by a House of Commons. A cry was sure to be raised against the middle class if the Bill passed; and this would increase the difficulty of putting it into practical working when the time fixed for doing so came. He, therefore, put it to the promoter of the Bill whether it was worth while putting his supporters into a false position by forcing a division. He was in favour of the principle of the Bill; but he could not vote for it in the last Session of an unreformed Parliament. He would urge his hon. Friend to be content with the discussion which he had elicited.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, it seemed to him that this question might be regarded in two ways; first, with reference to this country alone; and, secondly, with regard to our communications with other countries. If this were merely a question regarding ourselves, he, for one, would hesitate very much before assenting to a change, even for the better, in an old country, with a vast population, accustomed to certain ways, a departure from which must necessarily involve very considerable confusion and annoyance. He admitted the inconvenience arising from the present system. Those who suffered the most from it, were those who were scarcely able to judge for themselves; and looking to this country alone, he certainly would be inclined to adopt the advice given by some hon. Members—namely, to endeavour to simplify and bring to one point the weights and measures which exist in this country, although he admitted there was very great difficulty in doing this. He himself attached no importance to the educational argument on the present system. He certainly was not one of those who would advocate unnecessary difficulty in learning for the sake of strengthening the mind. When everything had been made as easy as possible, there would assuredly be difficulty enough left to secure this object. There was quite enough labour house, and he will at once see the number of yards, admitting of verification by a legal standard, which ought to be represented in the measure of the silk furnished to him. As affecting domestic transactions, the considerations are of a different class. If the use of the metre standard as a material measure, and not a tabular equivalent, be in any way made legal, it will be in the power of a single person here and there to require that all tradesmen with whom he may deal to verify their asserted measures by exhibition of, and reference to, a material and metrical standard. And, in a district where not one inhabitant in 10,000 cares about the metrical system, a troublesome person may compel many tradesmen to keep, by the side of the yard measure of 36 inches, a metre measure of 39 $\frac{1}{4}$ inches. The evils of a double standard must be great under any circumstances, but in no case can they be so great as when the two standards are sufficiently near to be occasionally confounded, and sufficiently different to alter every price by 9 per cent. It would be a very great misfortune for the country to be exposed to such an inconvenience."

One of the points referred to the Standards Commission was to inquire and report whether any and what additions to the existing official standards of weights and measures were now required, and under this head was involved the expression of their opinion as to the establishment of the metric system in this country. With the view of placing before the Commission the fullest information upon the whole subject of the metric system in France, the mode in which it was established, and its practical working at the present time, the Warden of the Standards had been in communication with the head of the French Department of Weights and Measures, and had received from him copies of the laws, ordinances, and official instructions relating to the metric system, which would enable him officially to lay the requisite information before the Commission for their consideration. Such information had not hitherto been afforded in this country, and it would enable the Commission not only to form a better opinion as to the actual working of the metric system in France, but to contrast it with the working of the Imperial system in this country. It was suggested, therefore, that until such information should have been laid also before the Government and Parliament, together with the Report of the Standards Commission, any legislation to authorize the introduction of the metric system into this country would be premature. But it appeared to him, with all deference to the opinion which that House had expressed more than once, and to the general feeling of the commercial classes as interpreted by the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country, that the Bill should be read a second time for the purpose of assenting to its principle, on the understanding that it should not be proceeded with in Committee until the Report of the Commission had been received, which would not be during the present year. It had also been suggested by the hon. Member who had last spoken, that it should be left to a new Parliament, like many other questions, inasmuch as that new Parliament would be better able to express the views of the large body of people who would be effected by the change. Sooner or later the country would in all probability adopt the metric system, but he did not at present see any prospect of carrying a compulsory measure, without causing serious, and even perilous dissatisfaction.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he was glad to hear from the Government that they would support the second reading of the Bill; at the same time, he was not quite sure that it was a Parliamentary course to read a Bill a second time merely for the purpose of sanctioning the principle on the understanding that the measure was to go no further. He wished to correct a misapprehension of his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith), who had represented him as being an opponent of the metric system. That was erroneous. He had been always of opinion that of all systems of weights and measures now existing in the world the metric system of France was the most complete and most useful in all dealings between men and between nations. This Bill was founded on two principles. The first was that this country having already sanctioned the use of the metric system by Act of Parliament, the Government should be authorized to construct metric standards so that people might have an opportunity of verifying the metric measures in use, and having their accuracy guaranteed by the Government stamp. The second principle was that after a certain number of years our present measures should be abolished and those of the metric system substituted. With regard to the first part of the Bill he was prepared to accede to it. As they had passed a measure the Preamble of which stated that it was expedient to legalize the metric system of weights and measures, the natural consequence was that they should pass another to enable that system to be brought into operation; and at a future time it might be necessary to compel its adoption. If, however, they were to go too far at first allowed his Bill to be incorporated with mine; and the whole question of religious tests, in both the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, will henceforth be dealt with in one single and simple measure. In one sense, no doubt, this is an advance. But it must be remembered that the House of Lords last year declined, by a large majority, even to read a second time a Bill sent up to them by an overwhelming majority of this House; and it was therefore useless to invite them again to a second contumelious rejection of the self-same measure. In this House, too, we are getting on: we cannot allow to hon. Gentlemen opposite an absolute monopoly of political education. We all advance—some of us slowly, with hesitation, with difficulty; some by bounds so rapid that the amazed spectators can scarcely follow the motions of the performers. I hardly think, however, that we shall have much argument of this sort from the other side of the House. If, indeed, my noble Friend the Marquess of Salisbury were still amongst us he might, if it suited the nobility and generosity of his nature, use such an argument without exciting a smile of scornful derision on the faces of his opponents. But he has passed away, I believe, with the general regret of the Assembly of which he was an honour and an ornament—I am sure to my own great and unfeigned sorrow. For if I may venture to plagiarize with due acknowledgment from Mr. Canning, I would say that I would gladly give his cause the advantage of his abilities, so we might have the great advantage and delight of his presence—

What, then, is it which this Bill does really propose to effect? It will be obvious to any one who reads it that it deals on quite different principles with the Universities and with the Colleges within them. As to the Universities, it enacts, and so to say it compels, freedom. It provides that the full privileges of University membership shall be open to every subject of the Queen without the imposition of any religious test; but the schools of Arts and Law, of Mathematics and History, of Physical Science, of Medicine, and of Music, shall for the future stand apart from the school of Divinity, and, as far as the Universities are concerned, shall not be affected by or connected with it. As to the Colleges, the Bill does not enact or compel at all, but it allows freedom of election, or rather—for this is too large a description of it—it removes restrictions on freedom of election, so far as those restrictions have been imposed by the direct authority of Parliament. And I believe, for the first time, it proposes to remove them all. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), I believe, had dealt only with the restrictions imposed by the Acts of Uniformity. It had been objected that the Bill in its old shape was incomplete and cowardly. The hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford said, and said truly, that it left still excluded those very persons—I mean the Roman Catholics—whom, on any principle of justice and respect for founders' wills, should have been the first to be included. The fact undoubtedly was so; whether it was an objection it is for the House to say; but if it was it is so no longer. All, then, that we ask to be done with the Colleges is that the State should remove restrictions on their freedom of action which the State itself imposed. All things else regarding them will remain as they are now. Their statutes, old and new, will remain unaltered; the religious convictions of their members, old and young, will remain unaffected; their feelings, their associations, will continue entirely unchanged; above all, the personal influence of religious men, whether within the Colleges or without, that influence which is the true source of religious teaching—the wide-reaching power of religious life and religious example—these will remain untouched. No Act of Parliament gave this influence, no Act of Parliament can lessen it, or take it away. Is this, then, just? If not, it should not be done; and it is fit, therefore, to inquire whether it be just or no. Now, as to the Universities, it seems to follow that it is just, from the now generally received proposition, that they are national institutions, to which the nation has granted great privileges, in which it has great interest, and which it is fair that the nation should have access to without reference to the form of religion which the individuals comprising it may chance to profess. No one indeed very seriously disputes this part of the measure; and many Members opposite have abstained from voting or engaging in any active opposition to it. But it is said that it is not just to the Colleges. What is it, then, that we propose? Literally nothing more than to repeal the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. and two or three other much more recent Acts, specially directed against the Roman that these are surely altogether exaggerated expressions, and utterly weak and unworthy fears. The Church and religion are always perishing out of the land. Ten times, at least, in my own not very long life-time, the clergy and clerically-minded men have foretold the speedy downfall of both; but, thank God, they do not fall down; they grow and spread; they derive strength from measures which are said to threaten their extinction, like the much quoted tree in Horace, which, as he says—“Per damna per cædes ab ipso

Ducit opes animumque ferro.”

Now, what was the Archbishop's answer? I approach an Archbishop, I hope, with proper dispositions. There is the conventional respect for the rank and office, which I try to feel; and there is the real respect for the man, which I feel without effort. But I suppose an Archbishop's logic is no better than that of other men, and that his reasons may be examined by the merely human understanding. He told the remonstrants that, as he had been ten years ago a party to a settlement by which these endowments were secured to the Church of England, he would oppose to the uttermost of his power any measure by which that settlement was threatened with disturbance. But I should like to have asked his Grace who was the other party to that settlement? How were any but members of the Church of England represented on that occasion? It is true that, ten years ago, a Commission of members of the Church of England reformed certain scandals and abuses in the Oxford system, which were too bad for longer toleration; that they reformed establishments, at that time confined to members of the Church of England, for the benefit and in the interest of the Church of England; but how that affects this question, or how it shows, or has any tendency to show, that persons belonging to other religious communions may not now justly share in the advantages of these establishments, I am entirely unable to perceive, and his Grace did not think it fit or needful to explain. The truth, however, is, this whole remonstrance is based on a false assumption as to religious teaching in the sense in which those words were used. I do not want to weary the House by going over again what I said last year; yet I must respectfully but emphatically assert that it does not, and never did, exist in University or Colleges in the sense in which these petitioners talk of it. I asserted

then, and I assert now, that the real religious teaching which men of my time got at Oxford—and I mention Oxford and my time, because what is true of Oxford and my time is true mutatis mutandis of all time and of both Universities—that which awakened conscience, aroused feeling, and influenced life and practice—was derived from the writings and teaching and example of two illustrious men, equally discouraged and proscribed by University authorities, one in Oxford and one out of it—Dr. Arnold and Dr. Newman. All direct religious teaching worthy of the name I maintain to be personal; indirect religious teaching and influence may come from public services, from the administration of sacraments, from religious buildings, and in a hundred other ways. These indirect influences are utterly untouched by the measure before the House. The direct religious teaching, so far as it is real, so far as it depends on personal authority, will remain exactly as it is. Does any sane man believe that the influence of Mr. Jowett, or of Mr. Liddon, will be in the slightest degree affected by the repealing of the Act of Uniformity of the time of Charles II.? Of course not. No one will be hardy enough to venture any such assertion. Is there any danger, then, to doctrine and to faith? First of all, in a national Church you must needs have great variety of doctrine. Some time ago, within my own knowledge, one Bishop refused ordination to a candidate who answered a doctrinal question in the words of another Bishop, telling his questioner that he had done so. And at present you would find, upon most important points of doctrine, the authorities of Oxford and Salisbury on one side, and of London and Carlisle on the other—hopelessly irreconcilable. There is, as we know, controversy raging in the University; there is, as we know, the very widest difference already in religious teaching; and to talk as if there was one clear, definite code of belief taught alike, and taught with authority, to all the students, is—forgive me—to talk nonsense, and to talk unfair and misleading nonsense too. I am sometimes told by good men, with honest horror, that in the Universities at the present moment there is a large amount of almost professed infidelity, and that every religious belief—even the most elementary—is considered there as an open question. I hope, I believe, there is exand argument. I pass by the rhetorical garland of abuse which the distinguished Prelate who presides over the See of Oxford offered the other day to the acceptance of an audience largely composed of undergraduates with great favour and applause, because he does not sit in this House, and I differ from him in thinking it fair to make imputations on men in their absence and when they can make no reply. But the hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckingham is in his place, and as he called this Bill, a little while ago at a public meeting, a distinct and avowed attack on Christianity itself, I ask him to stand up here and tell us whether, when he said that, he had even read the Bill, and, if he had, on what sentence, or word, or syllable in it he founds a charge so groundless and so offensive? On these subjects, however, I say no more; and I almost regret I have said so much. Such courses are never ultimately successful, because they are unfair and do not deserve success. They may pain and wound a particular man; I will not deny to the hon. Gentleman the satisfaction, if he desires it, of knowing that such expressions have pained and wounded me, but they cannot prevent the success of what is just; they will not alter by one hair's breadth the course which, as matter of conviction, it is my duty to take. Sir, the vast endowments of the Universities and the Colleges can no longer remain the peculium of one particular religious body. They were in effect, by the change then made in the terms of holding, given to that religious body for the wisest purposes and with the best intentions some 300 years ago. In the state of things which then existed, and which continued for many years, they were useful and beneficial in no common measure. But that state of things has past away, and with complete toleration and complete social and political equality it is just and fair that there should also be a complete and absolute educational equality. That these great institutions will continue to work, as they have worked hitherto, for the advance of true religion and of real morality, I have as little doubt as I have of my own existence. How they will work I do not pretend to foretell; I leave the future where Homer left it, and where all wise men must leave it, on the knees of the Gods. But I know that there are a thousand ways in which good may be done or religion may be maintained; and

I do not believe—you must excuse me for saying it is childish vanity, and folly to believe—that a few English statutes are the one set of provisions in the world on which Christian truth reposes, and that when they are altered or repealed they involve in their repeal or alteration the destruction of Christian truth. There is much more wisdom, much more real religion, much more Christian faith in the noble words of Mr. Tennyson's King Arthur, with which, and with the thought contained in which, I will end what I have to say—

“The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
And God fulfils Himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world.”

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Coleridge).

MR. WALPOLE said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of those who differed from him on this question in language which he did not expect to hear from him and which seldom fell from his lips. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Coleridge) was entirely mistaken in his view of the objections entertained to the Bill. Nobody had ever thought of objecting to the fullest educational freedom with regard to the Universities, and indeed the freedom of which his hon. and learned Friend spoke so highly was already secured to everyone throughout the length and breadth of the land. The hon. and learned Gentleman had very properly divided his subject into two parts, the one relating to the Universities and the other to the Colleges. Though the hon. Gentleman now maintained that there was no distinction between the Universities and the Colleges, he spoke differently some time ago. With regard to the Universities, his hon. and learned Friend said he believed the Bill would establish a system of complete freedom, while, with regard to the Colleges, he stated that he only proposed to do justice to them by removing the restraints by which their action was at present fettered. Let them see how the matter stood. In both Universities the utmost freedom of admission was given to Dissenters, and by the University Acts powers were given or intended to be given to them to receive the benefits of a University education by the opening of private halls or hostels. The only distinction between Oxford and Cambridge—a distinction which he admitted ren of various religions went to the school the provisions of the trust should not on that account be altered. Parliament said that the children of parents of every sect should be enabled to go to these endowed schools, but that it would not interfere with the governing body of these schools. A more complete analogy could not be found than that which existed between the principle laid down by Parliament for the endowed schools and that which he maintained ought still to continue in these Colleges. With regard to the practical operation and consequences of the present Bill, he took issue with the hon. and learned Gentleman, and would state in a very few words why he stoutly and strenuously opposed his measure. There were four points of view in which the practical working and consequences of such a measure might be viewed—as regarded the Dissenters, the Colleges, the Church of England—with which the Universities were connected; and the general interests of the public. With regard to the Dissenters, could the hon. and learned Gentleman contend that they were at present debarred from any privileges which they had a right to expect, holding different opinions, as they did, from those on which these Colleges were endowed? Could he contend that the Dissenters did not now enjoy the fullest benefits and advantages of a University education within the walls of the several Colleges? Did he not know that at this moment there were at Cambridge Dissenters of almost every class, to whom every indulgence was extended, and whose religious convictions and practices were not interfered with? There were at Cambridge Jews, Roman Catholics, Dissenters, and even Parsees, and no practical grievance was complained of. But because they received all the advantages of a University education, and a share in the exhibitions, were they therefore to have a share in the government of these institutions? He would concur with the hon. and learned Gentleman in regarding it as a misfortune that accomplished and learned students could not receive these Fellowships, because they belonged to other religious communities, but he denied that this was a reason for disturbing the trusts on which these Fellowships were held. It was to be regretted that there was not some other mode of rewarding those who had during their University career attained to special literary or scientific distinction, but this was not a sufficient plea for disturbing the very foundations of the Colleges. Then in regard to the Colleges themselves, did the hon. and learned Gentleman really believe that no injury would happen to the religious discipline and teaching of these collegiate bodies, if they admitted to a share in the governing body, not as a favour or as a privilege, but as a right, any persons of any and every religious opinion, and even persons of no religion at all? In Cambridge there were seventeen Colleges, fifteen of which were called the smaller Colleges, because they were not so large as Trinity and St. John. The resident Fellows in these smaller Colleges did not average more than six or seven, and even in the two larger Colleges the seniority was composed of not more than six or seven Fellows. Now, if persons of any and every religion were to be admitted as Fellows they might arrive at a point at which the majority of the Fellows might not belong to the Church, and would the practical working of the system under such circumstances be beneficial? Would not the youthful mind of the country be materially injured if they gave to persons holding religious opinions not in conformity with the trusts of the College the right of advocating secular as distinct from religious principles, the right of upholding rationalistic theories, the right of maintaining the views of all the Dissenting bodies, and, above all the right of proselytising, which would be freely used in order to bring these young men to Rome? Every one could foresee the controversies and contests which would arise, and it would be extremely difficult for the young men to judge between the scepticism on the one hand and the fanaticism on the other which would prevail. With regard to the Church of England they could not inflict a greater blow upon her than by passing the measure. One of the chief benefits of the connection between the Colleges and the Church of England was that the clergy and laity were so brought up and educated together that no discordance prevailed between them, and they were taught to entertain no narrow or intolerant views. The tendency of the system under which they received a common education was to enlarge the mind and liberalize the ideas of the clergy, and this was shown in all their dealings with mankind after they received Holy Orders. If, however, the House should pass a measure of this kind, such a state of things could exist no longer. As there would be an end to the present definite religious teaching the consequence culture and refinement ; not more life, but a higher life. And these they might have been encouraged to attain if their clergy had not been excluded from the highest education which the country possessed—namely, in its Universities. It appeared to him that the anti-social and disintegrating influences which were at work in modern society were terribly strong. What was the duty of those who wished to counteract these agencies ? To maintain a common culture and a common faith. Every one knew the power of both in smoothing away religious and political distinctions. Men could not live together for twelve months without coming to like one another. Nothing had struck him more during the short period in which he had had the honour to be a Member of that House than the wonderful tolerance with which hon. Members listened to opinions the most opposite from their own. Christians agreed upon more points than they differed ; and the effect upon young men of different religious opinions of receiving their education in common would be, that they would like each other better, and be more tolerant of each other's opinions. It seemed to him that the episcopal and clerical opponents of the Bill knew this, and did not desire it to pass for that very reason. It was said that it would be injurious to the Church ; but the laity of England were not to be excluded from instruction in the Universities because young men were studying there for the Church. If the latter could not bear the free breath and healthy light of inquiry and opinion, let them have their theological Colleges, as had been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) ; but let not great national institutions be turned into forcing-houses for the clergy. He thought, on the contrary, that no greater boon than this freedom of inquiry could be desired for them. Which was the more cruel—to make them sign the Thirty-nine Articles first and inquire afterwards, or to let them inquire first and sign afterwards ? When the deputation on this question waited the other day on the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Gloucester spoke of the Church of England being founded on a rock, and of the storms that raged round it. But how had those storms originated ? Not with the Dissenters, but with some of the clergy of the Church. Fears of too much freedom of inquiry, and even of infidelity, had been expressed. But where did the thing come from that was so much feared ? Not from Protestant Dissenters, but from tutors and Fellows, and even Bishops, who had swallowed all the University tests ; and they would make the Dissenters scape-goats for their sins, and send them into the wilderness. Apprehensions of Romanism had likewise been expressed ; but where had the Romanist movement in the Established Church its rise ? Not among the Protestant Dissenters—he should like to ask how many Protestant Dissenters had become Romanists—not from the increased activity of the Romanists themselves, but at Oxford, among clergymen, Fellows, and tutors, who had swallowed all your tests ? How could it be otherwise so long as they compelled men to sail under false colours ? Men came in under false colours and changed them when they went out. If they allowed men to come in stating manfully what they believed, they need not fear that, on going out, they would depart from the opinions they had expressed. Let them cease to try the consciences of men ; to lead them to tamper with their convictions and trifle with their consciences at a time when their convictions were honest and their consciences were clear. The argument used by Milton in his Plea for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, was applicable to this question—

“ Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions ; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. . . . What some lament of, we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men, to reassume the ill-deputed care of their religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligencies to join and unite into one general and brotherly search after truth, could we but forego this prelatical tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men.”

It was in the interest of Christian truth, unity, and charity that he supported this Bill. It would not injure, but rather increase, the influence of real religion by liberating it from odious and unnatural restrictions ; and then real religion, breathing more freely, would more effectively pursue its high and holy course, promoting truth, peace, and good-will among men.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had spoken with an ability and—though he could not himself agree with much that had fallen from him—on the whole, with a temper which showed that he would tended that the Church of England ceased to be the Church of England, or that institutions founded to impart sound learning and religion ceased to be appropriate to their purpose, because England, almost as one man, threw off the yoke of the Church of Rome? If, indeed, they had ceased to be "national," it was only to men who themselves were not of the nation—to men who did not hold those principles and those creeds which had at all times been bound up with the religious life and profession of the nation. Were they to revolutionize not only the Universities but the country itself in order to do away with the only question on which there was any repugnance on the part of the Dissenters to the University system? Were they, he asked, to revolutionize and degrade not only the constitution of the Universities, but the Constitution of the whole land, in order to take away that which presented the only point of repugnance between them and the nation? He protested against the abuse of the word "national" in respect to the Universities. These Institutions had come down to them with all their great functions and their character unchanged. The new Member (Mr. Winterbotham), who had spoken that day with much ability, had in one short phrase stated the whole battle between them, for he said, "We ask for religious equality, and we will be content with nothing less." There was nothing like coming to a clear explanation. There was no use going on year after year with mere side issues, which were only so many means of aggravating, and never led to a settlement of anything. The real question was—Was this to be a religious land or was it not? ["Oh!"] He expected a shout of disapprobation when he made that statement. Hon. Gentleman did not see that religion must be founded on a faith. They talked of their all uniting in teaching religion and morality; but the greatest and most absurd figment of the day was the notion that they could uphold religion and teach morality without a faith on which they were to be founded. If they elected into the teaching and governing bodies of the Universities men of entirely different and contrary creeds, there must ensue either constant conflicts that would be destructive of all religious teaching, or, as was more likely to happen, religion would be so subordinated to every other subject as to be practically swept out of the University curriculum. Religion would be tabooed by common consent, and they would have no religion taught at all. It was impossible to found any argument on the contradictory state of feeling that now existed. This Bill would open the doors of the Universities to those who had not even an idea of a hereafter. His hon. and learned Friend had argued his cause with consummate ability; but he had pleaded as an advocate; in time he would doubtless reach the highest position in the profession which he adorned, and he (Mr. Hubbard) appealed from the argument of the present Advocate to the matured decision of the future Judge. He had never wished to say a word that would give the least pain to his hon. and learned Friend; but entertaining as he did the strongest objection to his proposal, he could not shrink from the duty of boldly saying what he felt and believed on this important subject.

MR. POWELL said, he hoped that after a discussion of only two hours on such an important measure the debate would not be arrested. The object of the Bill was to un-denominationalize our system of education and to create a secular system. The petition against the Bill had been signed by 460 Heads and Fellows of Colleges, whereas that in its favour received the signatures of only 290,

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

LEAVE.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, to make the Motion which stands on the Notice Paper in my name, and which, I believe, I could have made, as a matter of form, on the night on which the Resolutions were reported, if it had not been that I waited for the answer to the Address to the Crown—namely, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent, for a limited time, new appointments in the Church of Ireland, and to restrain, for the same period, in certain respects, the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, I think it necessary, Sir, to give you notice that I object to the right hon. Gentleman's proceeding at this hour (7 minutes to 6 o'clock) with a Motion for the introduction of a Bill in pursuance of the reply of Her Majesty to an Address from this House;

The cases alluded to by his noble and learned Friend must have been very peculiar and unusual in their character, and he should be obliged if his noble and learned Friend would favour him with the details, so that he might verify them. At present the fees, though not large, might be reduced by the Lord Chancellor, with the consent of the Treasury. When the Bill got into Committee he proposed to move Amendments which would have the effect of doing away with some of the preliminary steps in the enrolment—steps which were totally unnecessary. The result would be that these small charities need not employ any solicitor; but that everything might be done by their own secretaries at an expense of about 30s. or 40s.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he agreed with his noble and learned Friend that it was most desirable to prevent any secret grant or alienation of land given for religious and charitable purposes, and it appeared to him that the most effectual way to secure that object was by requiring that all those grants should be enrolled. There could be no practical objection to such a course, which need not be attended with inconvenience or any great expense. His noble and learned Friend, on the previous occasions when he moved a measure similar to this one, had invariably made enrolment one of the conditions upon which those gifts should be valid; but he had altered his views since, and had given their Lordships no satisfactory reasons for his change of opinion, or why the principle of enrolment should not be maintained; and his noble and learned Friend (Lord Romilly) had shown that such enrolment could be effected easily and cheaply. He (Lord Chelmsford) should certainly support any Amendment in Committee which would provide for the enrolment of those grants.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not rise to offer any opposition to the second reading — on the contrary, he thought that the object of the Bill was exceedingly good and laudable. He had ever been inclined to support measures proposing to effect the acquisition of sites for these purposes in the easiest and cheapest manner. But he wished to observe that the opinion of the country upon the subject did not appear to be so general or unanimous as his noble and learned Friend who moved the second reading supposed it to be. He should have thought that the various bodies throughout the country, who were proprietors of chapels built upon small pieces of land, would have been anxious to reduce to a minimum the expense attending the acquisition of sites. But he found that to be by no means the case. He had received a deputation from a Conference of the Methodist body, representing an enormous number of chapels throughout the country which had been built upon small pieces of land granted for the purpose. Their statement was remarkable. They said it was true that the object of the Mortmain Act originally was to prevent secret conveyances of land for religious and charitable purposes; but where a small piece of land was sold out and out to build a chapel upon it there was no reason to apprehend any mischief from the secrecy of the transaction. The Act had, however, in practice, answered a larger and more important purpose, inasmuch as it had brought about a system of registration of the trusts of small pieces of ground which had proved of the highest possible advantage. The Methodist body stated that they had not a regular stationary body of ministers in their chapels. They were men who went about from place to place. Consequently the deeds of those trusts were generally loosely kept, and some of them had been lost. The result was that all traces of the boundary disappeared, and encroachments were occasionally made which gave rise to disputes as to the exact nature of the trusts, and the obligations which were imposed upon the trustees. The enrolment was, however, attended with this great advantage, that they could procure from the Court of Chancery for a few shillings an office copy of the trust deed, if required. Although that was not the object of the Mortmain Act, yet as it had sprung out of it and proved to be beneficial he (the Lord Chancellor) thought they ought to consider whether it would not be well to secure it by a special enactment. It appeared to him that all practical objects would be secured if those trust deeds were required to be filed, like affidavits, instead of enrolled, and the expense of doing so would be very trifling.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday, the 22nd instant.

was whether the Convention which had been made should be carried into effect. He thought it better that the title to the fisheries off the coast at Arklow should not be discussed; but, at any rate, any jurisdiction that the Irish Fishery Board had exercised was exempted; and any fishery within the proper fishery limits of the coast of Ireland was also exempted.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that all the banks between England and France beyond the three miles were dealt with by the Convention. Why were not similar banks off the coast of Ireland dealt with?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the House was not asked to legislate territorially as to fishing rights, but only to give effect to an international arrangement entered into to the effect that the Legislature of each country should put some limit on the action of the subjects of those countries. If there should be a similar Convention as to Ireland the House would have to deal with a measure to give effect to it.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE repeated that, as no penalty was imposed in reference to the coast of Ireland, great injury would be done by oysters being taken in breeding time, and he should propose a new clause to remedy this evil.

EARL GREY said, that while he agreed that they could not by legislation affect French rights in places more than three miles from the coast, he thought that the objection of the noble Marquess had not been answered. The Convention secured to France and also to England all that each wanted; but it had neglected to secure what was necessary to protect the Irish fisheries; and the noble Marquess said that Parliament ought not to pass any Act until there should be a Convention to deal with Irish fisheries, and give them the same protection as was given to the French and English fisheries. It seemed reasonable that they should postpone legislation until that was done; because if by passing the Bill they gave France all she wanted it would then be idle to ask her for a fresh Convention.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that the noble Earl had not clearly apprehended the case. The Convention with France was already signed, but it was necessary to obtain the sanction of Parliament. It seemed to be forgotten that the object of the Commissioners, right or wrong, was to abolish close time altogether, and they had shortened it by six weeks. He had made inquiries, and could not find any case in which any person had been convicted for offending against the by-laws of the Irish Fishery Board at a distance of more than three miles from the shore; and the truth was that they had no power to make such by-laws.

LORD TAUNTON said, they ought not to pass this Bill without further consideration, and that they should place Ireland upon the same footing as was proposed for England and France. They ought, at all events, not to part with the Bill until they had come to an understanding that the matter should be thoroughly investigated, and that any real grievance that might press upon the Irish fisheries should be dealt with.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, there seemed to be some misunderstanding upon this point; the Convention was not in operation, and could not be until it was sanctioned by Parliament. He was inclined to think it desirable that the discussion should be postponed, because it seemed that the matter was not at present well understood. The Convention between England and France was confined to those two countries simply because they possessed the opposite shores of the Channel; but Ireland was in a different geographical position. It seemed to him that the Irish fishermen were labouring under a state of unnecessary panic. The French fishermen, he believed, had not hitherto gone to the Irish beds, which were too distant from them; and he did not see why it should be supposed they would now commence to go there simply because a Convention had been concluded between France and England affecting the Channel fisheries. It would, however, be a serious matter to allow the Convention to be set aside after France had been brought to agree to make undoubted concessions. He might add that he could not agree that the English Parliament had any power to make laws with respect to oyster beds which were more than three miles from the coast.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that an express stipulation was inserted in the Convention that it should not come into operation until an Act of Parliament had been obtained. He might remind the noble Earl of an exactly similar case which happened on the first occasion when he held the Seals of the Foreign Office. At that time a Convention was concluded between England and France, subject to the confirmation of Parliament; and a

DEVONSHIRE PLACE AND WIMPOLE STREET.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Bath, Whether the Metropolitan Board of Works is aware that Iron Gates are still continued at the end of Devonshire Place and Wimpole Street, being one of the principal thoroughfares between Oxford Street and the New Road, and that such Gates are refused to be opened to the public unless a gratuity is given to the Gatekeeper; and, if the Board are aware of it, whether they propose to take any steps with reference thereto; and, further, whether the road is repaired at the public expense or by any private individual?

MR. TITE said, this matter is but a portion of a large question which has been under the consideration of the Metropolitan Board since January last year. There are between 200 and 300 gates of a similar character in the metropolis, and thirty in the parish of St. Pancras alone. The Board first memorialized the House of Lords to refer the matter to the Committee inquiring into Municipal Regulations, but that was not attended to. They then applied to the Home Secretary, who, after considering the subject very carefully, replied that the case was surrounded with so many difficulties that he was unable to bring in a Bill on the subject. The particular cases referred to by the hon. Member for Chippenham are not peculiar. The Board know of no justification for charging anything in the shape of a toll, which would be illegal; but the gates belong in many cases to the owners of the property on which the streets are built, and the Board have no power to interfere. They hope, however, to be able to bring in a Bill next Session. The expense of repairing the roads where such gates exist is, in many cases, borne by the parishes.

LIBRARY AND MUSEUM OF THE PATENT OFFICE.—QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Government intend to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Patent Office of 1864, and of the Commissioners of Patents made at various periods, with regard to the Library and Museum of the Patent Office, and to find proper accommodation for them; and, if not, why not?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that the result of the recommendations of the Committee was that a room, ninety feet long and fifty feet wide, had been provided for the purpose of a library, and no complaints had been received of want of accommodation; though if it were found to be insufficient there would be no difficulty in increasing it considerably. The recommendations of the Committee respecting the Museum of Patents were not very clear, and the Government, for various reasons, did not intend to submit any proposals on the subject to Parliament.

METROPOLIS—IMPROVEMENTS IN PARK LANE.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT HAMILTON said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Upon whom rests the responsibility of the present impeded state of the thoroughfare in Park Lane; why the works have continued so long unfinished; and, how many men a-day are employed upon them, and when there is a probability of the works being completed?

COLONEL HOGG said, perhaps the noble Lord would allow him to answer the Questions. The Metropolitan Board of Works were at present engaged in altering the thoroughfare in Park Lane. Towards the end of last year their attention was drawn by the St. George's Vestry to the state of Park Lane. A Committee was formed, and, after various conferences between the First Commissioner of Works, the Committees of the Metropolitan Board, and the Vestry of St. George's, Hanover Square, it was agreed that a roadway should be formed of a minimum width of 40 feet, a footpath on the east side of a minimum width of 10 feet, and one on the west side of a uniform width of 8 feet. The deed was signed and deposited with the First Commissioner of Works on the 28th of January, 1868, and on the 31st the contractor was ordered to commence the work. He was allowed

IRELAND—CUSTOMS' OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. STOCK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the First Clerk in the Customs at Dublin should have a salary of only £400 a-year, his Collector's salary being £1,000, when the First Clerk at Glasgow had a salary of £450, although his Collector's salary was only £800?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH replied, that the hon. Member was misinformed as to the salaries of those officers. The establishment at Dublin and that at Glasgow were in precisely the same classification as regarded the salaries of the clerks. The Chief Clerk at each place had a salary of £350, rising by annual increments to £400. It was true that the Collector at Dublin had a higher salary than the Collector at Glasgow, because he was a sort of Surveyor General in Ireland.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he wished to ask an important Question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. He regretted that he had only been able to give him private Notice after he entered the House. The question he wished to ask was, After what hour he will not take the Suspensory Bill; and, whether, as the right hon. Gentleman can bring the matter before Parliament without the least delay, and without interfering with the necessary business of the country, he will, if he still persists in his present intentions, introduce the Bill at such an hour as will permit a full discussion?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have no difficulty in answering the question for want of Notice, because it appears to me to be simple in its character. The Motion which I have to make for the introduction of this Bill is a Motion which I believe, in conformity with the ordinary usages of the House, I should have been perfectly justified in making immediately after the Report of the Resolutions which passed through the Committee, and a Motion for leave to introduce a Bill under such circumstances, as far as my recollection goes, is uniformly acceded to as a matter of course. It was from motives which I explained on a former occasion that, in deference to the Crown, I did not bring in the Bill at that time. I trust I shall be allowed to put myself in as good a position as I should have been in if I had been able to proceed in the usual course, at whatever hour I may have the opportunity.

COLONEL STUART KNOX: We shall feel it our duty in this case to give the right hon. Gentleman a precedent for future occasions in regard to the introduction of Bills of such a nature.

BOUNDARY BILL—[BILL 78.]

(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. GLADSTONE: It is to be regretted, although I do not think it is matter of blame to anyone, that there was no discussion on the subject of this Bill when it was read a second time; because it involves consideration of a nature that can hardly be discussed in Committee, unless we consider broader questions than are raised by any clause on the Motion for postponing the Preamble. With regard to the principal provisions of this Bill, we are in a position of very considerable difficulty, and it is only by the disposition of the sections of the House to co-operate that we have any chance of getting out of that difficulty. I will endeavour to explain the difficulty. First, I may say, for myself and those with whom I have had the means of communicating, that no part of the difficulty arises from the conduct of the Boundary Commissioners. They had entrusted to them a difficult duty with regard to the alteration of the existing boundaries of boroughs, and with scanty guidance from the House. They were to inquire into the boundaries of all boroughs, subject to the condition that they were in no case to recommend the contraction of those boundaries; but the main object of their inquiry was to be to ascertain whether the boundaries should be enlarged so as to include within the limits of boroughs—

“All premises which ought, due regard being had to situation or other local circumstances, to be included therein for the purpose of conferring upon the occupiers thereof the Parliamentary franchise.”

We must all feel that the task imposed upon the Commissioners was a very arduous one; and there was no notification given to them on the part of Parliament of the principle on which they were to found their proceedings, beyond the general words, “All premises, due regard being had to situation and other local circumstances.” With these disadvantages the of the country in consequence of the provisions of the Act of last year, we ought to be very cautious about extending these provisions in cases where the inhabitants do not desire such extension. Further, I do not think that the Report of the Commissioners can be considered as final. I do not think we can conclude this from the Report of the Commissioners, because they themselves have brought into view the inconvenient effect of the regulation imposed on them, that in no case were they to recommend a contraction of the areas of existing boroughs. They refer to the case of Salisbury, and having some partial acquaintance with the borough, I can attest the truth of their remarks. Then I call the attention of the House to this fact, that the Commissioners, proceeding in this matter as they have done in all other matters, in a spirit of fairness and impartiality, report on the indisposition which they found in certain districts to be annexed to the neighbouring towns. I refer to the words of their Report—

“We found, in some cases, a general indisposition on the part of persons residing in the neighbourhood of a borough to permit themselves to be included within the Parliamentary boundaries—an indisposition which, in almost every case, was attributed to the fear of an extended Parliamentary boundary being followed by a similar extension of the municipal area, and that they would then be liable for the borough rates.”

Now, the fact is one thing, and the reason is another. The fact is one that requires our gravest consideration, and as for the reason I must say there is a good deal in it. I will not say that the extension of Parliamentary boundaries at all leads, as a necessary consequence, to the extension of municipal boundaries; but I think the plain tendency is in that direction, and if those who live within the Parliamentary and without the municipal boundaries feel that they are more likely to be drawn into the municipal net, they naturally object to being brought within the Parliamentary boundaries. But this frank declaration of the Parliamentary Commissioners as to the indisposition, is only to be drawn out of their Report. They tell us they have received all the memorials addressed to them through the Assistant Commissioners; but those memorials are not before us, and we cannot tell whether they include the whole or nearly the whole of the boroughs where an extension is recommended. [Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY made a gesture of dissent.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman says not the whole, and I was quite prepared for that statement, because I believe that in some cases there may be a great desire for annexation; but the other cases will require our serious consideration. As far as I am concerned, wherever there is a desire that the recommendations of the Commissioners should be carried into effect, or where there is a disposition to acquiesce in their recommendations, I think, in all such cases, we would do well at once to give effect to their recommendations. On the other hand, I own I, for one, am not prepared—I do not believe that this House is prepared—to over-ride, without any further examination the objections of the districts, where it may reasonably be presumed that there is a very divided state of opinion, or still more where there is positive aversion on the part of the inhabitants. To-day we have had some remarkable evidence before the House, in the shape of the various petitions and memorials that have been presented. I especially refer to the petition from Aston, in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, where it appears that out of 6,000 ratepayers nearly 5,000 have petitioned against being included in the Parliamentary boundaries of Birmingham. Now, it is impossible, I think, to refuse these parties a fair hearing of their case. That will not be acting against the judgment of the Commissioners; for the Commissioners have not heard them, not thinking themselves allowed to do so. I believe they were right, and that it was not the intention of Parliament that they should have any jurisdiction in the matter. The House, however, is entitled—nay, more, is bound to hear them. I may mention a case. My hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass) has put together, I have no doubt, with great diligence, all the names, [Mr. M. T. Bass: No!] —well, nearly all the names which he can collect, in which there is a decided feeling on the part of the inhabitants, or in which there is the manifestations of a divided state of opinion; and I should require that all those cases shall be reserved for further consideration. Our general position with reference to this Bill is very much like that in which we were placed in a debate twenty-four hours ago, when a Member rose at 30 minutes past 5 to continue a debate which he well knew would, at 45 minutes past 5, by the rules of this House, settle itself. I do not say that position was at all unreasonable; I use it merely for the purpose of illustration. If there be elaborate discussion and examination of details, followed by divi-

the duties of that Commission had been charged, that its recommendations should be finally disposed of by the Committee. The only function of the Committee would be to indicate what are the cases in which, in point of fairness and policy, it would be expedient to hold over, and not to attempt to dispose of by legislation during the present year.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman has succeeded in pointing out a great many difficulties which we shall have to encounter in considering the Report of the Boundary Commissioners; and I apprehend that no Bill of this extent, scope, and dimensions can possibly be brought under the consideration of this House without such difficulties being experienced. But I am fain to believe that with patience and temper we shall encounter no difficulties that may not be settled in a manner satisfactory to the large majority of the House, and, I hope, entirely satisfactory to the country. I was very much pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman take up a sound position with regard to the labours of the Commission—a position, indeed, which we should all expect from one of his ability and experience. I am glad that he did not impugn those labours. If we were to sanction the Motion of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) we should be taking a course which we should afterwards regret, and which would injure the character of Parliament. If we interfered in such a manner with the recommendations of eminent men, statutory Commissioners unanimously appointed by Parliament, whose duties were defined by Parliament, and who had fulfilled those duties most laboriously and conscientiously, it would be difficult to get any Gentlemen again to labour under such circumstances for great purposes of State. I was glad, therefore, to find that on this point the right hon. Gentleman took a position which one would expect from a Member of his standing and experience in this House. Then, let me say one word upon the nature of the Bill before us. It is really not in spirit a Government measure—that is, it is not a measure which has even been submitted to the Cabinet, because there was no question of policy upon which the opinion of the Cabinet was required. The Government have acted simply as the trustees of Parliament. They have taken the Report of the Commissioners, and have been careful to bring it under the consideration of the House in a businesslike and effectual manner. The House will recollect all the circumstances under which the Commission was appointed. It was a statutory Commission. I may say that virtually the chief Commissioners were named by this House. I certainly proposed some names, because it was well understood that unless some were proposed we should never arrive at any conclusion. But I said at the time that the feeling of the House was that which would influence the Government; and that there was nothing we more desired to avoid in a matter of such delicacy and importance than that the imputations should rest upon the Commissioners now that were freely thrown on the Commissioners of 1832. I believe that those imputations were unfounded; but we resolved to take such a course that there should be no ground for similar imputations in this case. I offered other names, some of which were not accepted, but they were names of hon. Gentlemen sitting on the opposite Benches, and distinguished not only for their abilities, but for their extreme Liberal opinions. Ultimately the five Commissioners were appointed by the House, and to the entire satisfaction of the House. ["No!"] All I can say is that I am in the recollection of those who took part in the proceedings of last year, and I think they will admit that the statement I have made is perfectly well founded. No objection was made to the five Gentlemen who were ultimately appointed; and the objections made to other individuals were immediately submitted to without any inquiry into their justice, because there was a general feeling that the Commissioners should be unanimously appointed. Then, with regard to the Assistant Commissioners, Her Majesty's Government had no connection at all with their appointment. It was at once announced, to prevent any misconception on that head, that the Assistant Commissioners should be appointed by the Chief Commissioners; and I only learnt the names of the Assistant Commissioners by reading the Report. It was therefore quite impossible that to fulfil these duties a Commission could be appointed which was more completely accepted by the House as its representative in this matter. The results of the Commission are now before us. I cannot for a moment maintain that the House has lost its power of revising the decision of the Commissioners. I do not suppose for a moment that the Commissioners consider that they have submitted to us a Report which could not should give certain precepts to the different overseers of the various parishes. If therefore the Members of that House were to fight in detail all the points which were now on the Notice Paper, it would be quite impossible for the Bill to pass in time for the Registration precepts to be given this year. But there was another strong motive for his proceeding, and it was that it would be quite impossible to get proper consideration for the Amendments on the Notice Paper if they were to be taken in detail. However strong each case might be it would have no chance, or but very little chance, of being successfully brought before a Committee of the House. He had therefore come to the conclusion that the only course open to him was to move that the 4th clause be omitted, in order to give further time for its consideration. But, in giving notice to that effect, he had no desire whatever to prevent the extension of the boundaries of those towns to which no objection was taken. In his opinion, it was a matter rather for the Government than any individual Member to propose a plan which would get over the difficulties. With regard to the Commissioners, he must say that, as far as he was concerned, he had no wish to impugn their decisions in any manner. He believed that they had fairly and impartially considered everything that was brought before them; but the House had given them very large, vague, and indefinite Instructions last year, and it was because of that vagueness that he held the House was justified in reviewing the proposals in the Bill. Those proposals, he felt, were not the proposals of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) had very properly stated that this was the Bill of the House of Commons; and therefore he did not impute any motives to the Government in what they had done. The Bill re-produced the recommendations of the Commission, and he did not suppose they had been in any manner altered. He felt bound, however, in duty to his constituents, to ask the House to give a real consideration to the objections entertained. It was upon these grounds that he had placed his Notice upon the Paper. He certainly had no party object in view; he was not a party man at all, and when he should bring forward his Motion he would not deal with it in a party spirit. He did not think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was at all satisfactory. He hoped the right hon.

Mr. Hibbert

Gentleman and his Colleagues would see that there was a real necessity for considering the proposals which had been submitted to the House. He had looked into them, and he knew that the feeling of the people in many of the towns to which they referred was of the strongest nature. As they were about to legislate, he hoped not for a few years, but for many, he trusted they would not lay down boundaries which would give dissatisfaction for many years to come. Unless the Government proposed some plan for meeting the difficulty, he should feel compelled to proceed with the Notice which he had given.

MR. GOLDNEY said, with regard to postponement, he wished to draw attention to what had occurred thirty-four years ago with respect to the Boundary Commission for municipal purposes. In that case the plans were prepared quite carefully for the enlargement of eighty-one boroughs, which was the exact number of boroughs which the Commissioners, in the present instance, recommended should be extended. The consideration of the Bill was postponed on the plea of want of time, and from that period to this no step whatever had been taken to carry out the Report of the Commissioners. One of the objections raised to the measure now before the House was that hon. Gentlemen would like to have the area of the Parliamentary borough extended, so that its limits and those of the municipality might be the same. But, inasmuch as the recommendations of the Commission on Municipal Boundaries had never been carried out, it would be impossible to adopt that course. He had endeavoured to gather from the petitions which had been presented, and the Notices placed on the Orders of the House, what the objections to the recommendations of the Commissioners were. In the discussion on the 31st clause of the Reform Bill, the question of Instructions to the Commissioners was very fully debated, and the right hon. Member for South Lancashire himself said that the municipal boundary ought not to be taken for the Parliamentary borough. Any one who had read the Report of the Commissioners would see that the Instructions given to the Assistant Commissioners had been most carefully prepared. They were to give notice in every town by advertisement, and they were not only to hear all the evidence brought before them, but to inspect in person the proposed boundaries. The Members of the House would probably particular cases in which strong objections are entertained to the recommendations of the Commissioners. In the majority of the cases there would be no difficulty in adopting the recommendations of the Commissioners; but in regard to the others, the House is not in possession of the objections that have been locally made before the Assistant Commissioners. I know cases in which memorials of the strongest character having been adopted unanimously, have been presented against the recommendations of the Commissioners. But these memorials are not before the House; and we are called upon to decide these cases without any knowledge whatever of the circumstances. The suggestion thrown out by my right hon. Friend is, not that the schedules should be referred to a Select Committee with a view to take further evidence and over-ride the decision of the Commissioners, but merely to report those cases in which time for further consideration ought to be given. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) says that there are but seven of such cases; but, judging from the Notices on the Paper, I should imagine that there are from twenty to thirty. I know cases in which memorials have been presented to the Commissioners urging grounds which are entitled to consideration, and which the House ought to be aware of. And if a Select Committee of six were appointed by the Committee of Selection, and if they have the memorials before them, they will be able to report whether there are any cases, and, if so, which they are, in which further time for consideration is required. Except in these cases the schedules might be passed, and the Bill proceed through Committee. The House is entitled to ask the Government to assist them in promoting this object, and in avoiding unnecessary discussion. It is desirable we should not take what will practically be the irrevocable step of extending the boundaries of these boroughs without any consideration of the grounds on which strong objections are made to the recommendations of the Commissioners.

MR. BRIGHT: I shall not, in any observations I may make, complain of what the Commissioners have done. But the House will recollect that last year I objected to the Commission—I mean to the names as they stood on the Commission. I did not say that they were not all very honourable men; but I thought I should have liked to see the Commission formed in rather a different manner. And the right hon. Gentleman will recollect also that I moved an Amendment—at least I gave notice of it, and the right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) proposed it to the House—that words should be inserted, calling upon the Commissioners to have regard in their proceedings to the local circumstances of the boundaries of municipal government. Well, unfortunately, as I think, that Amendment was not accepted by the Government: these words were not introduced. The House will see that at least I am free to discuss this case without being influenced in any way by the notion that the House was unanimous. I am quite sure it was not. But though there was no division on it, there was a feeling on this side of the House against the course which the Government proposed. The fact is, that the House did make a mistake, as we now pretty nearly all feel; because, although we gave the Commissioners powers to extend—apparently without limit—we gave them no power to contract, which they themselves now regret. We permitted them to extend, without any regard whatsoever to the opinions of the populations that were affected by the extension. Now, I venture to say that nothing could be more contrary to the practice of Parliament than that of bringing in a people from one constituency to another without consulting the persons affected—bringing people to the amount of 400,000 from the county constituency to the borough constituencies. That is a thing which Parliament has never placed in the hands of a Commission without regard to the opinions of the people affected. Because, when you propose to grant a charter of incorporation for a borough, you require that a majority of the ratepayers should present a petition in favour of the measure, and the Queen in Council thereupon sends down an Inspector who makes an inquiry, and unless a majority of the inhabitants are in favour of incorporation the charter is not issued; and I argue that the House of Commons would act very differently from its ordinary course if they brought 20,000, 30,000, 40,000, or 50,000 persons outside of the borough within its limits, contrary to the wishes of that population, and contrary also to the wishes of the inhabitants of the borough to which it was proposed that they should be annexed. Local circumstances surely should weigh something in a matter of this kind. The cases brought man would admit that the course which I am recommending would enable proper consideration to be given to points which were shut out from the view of the Commissioners. For the Commissioners were not allowed to entertain the local circumstances of a borough or the feelings of the persons affected by their recommendations. That is quite clear from the terms of their Reference; and it is also clear that when their Report comes before the House, the House may deal with it, as it does with Reports of Select Committees. How often are Select Committees appointed and their recommendations overruled, sometimes passed by altogether? We do not want to overrule the main objects of the Commission; but we find that there are certain boroughs to which, acting under their instructions, they were not permitted to do what we believe to be perfect justice. In the borough which I represent there are 350,000 persons at least, who ask that the boundaries of their borough shall not be increased. They say that there is land within the boundary of the borough, even now, which will contain 40,000 more houses, and they do not wish, with an existing constituency of 50,000, or, as it will be next year, of 60,000, to have 30,000 additional persons brought in, a large number of whom belong to another county, and about whom there is this further peculiarity—that, while the 350,000 within the borough are almost unanimous apparently in asking the others not to come in, the 30,000 proposed to be added are absolutely unanimous in wishing to remain out. The Commission were quite unable to take cognizance of the wishes of those persons; they were only to take account of the geographical circumstances of the locality, and they acted upon their instructions. It is, however, not only within the power, but it is the duty of this House to take into consideration the feeling of the district. And therefore the right hon. Gentleman, without feeling that he is doing any wrong or throwing any slur upon the Commission, might fairly refer this matter to a Committee of the House. I understand the right hon. Gentleman would be willing to refer the whole matter of the disputed boroughs back to the Commissioners; but I believe the Commissioners would not like to have it so referred, because, after the decision to which they came, they would find much more difficulty in going into the question with dispassionate minds, and in recommending a different conclusion than a select and fairly appointed Committee of this House would have. Now, I put it to the right hon. Gentleman, and I put it to hon. Gentlemen opposite, whether we, who differ from some of you in this matter, have not behaved fairly and honourably. You could have no fairer speech than that from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire—no more honest exposition of motives than that of the hon. Member for Oldham—no more rational or moderate proposition than that of the hon. Member for Derby; and you would find it difficult to have any more judicious advice than that which I venture to offer. [Laughter.] I should not have made that observation if I were not sure that it would meet with general acceptance. Having said this, I abstain from going into the particulars of these boroughs, because I am sanguine that after what has been said the right hon. Gentleman will not refuse to refer the case of these boroughs to investigation in some such manner as will be acceptable to the House. And I can promise him that if that be so, he will find upon our part a great disposition to forward the matter with the least possible delay.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that as allusion had been made by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) to the case of Aston Manor, which the Commissioners proposed should be joined to the borough of Birmingham, and as the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had also expressed his views upon the subject, he was anxious to state some facts connected with it. It was impossible to consider this subject without a reference to the wider question, of which it formed a part. In 1854 Lord Russell's Government proposed to make a large addition to the county representation. That was a wise proposal, for it would have increased the general representation of the country. As Member for North Warwickshire, for instance, he shared in the representation of from 400,000 to 500,000 people through the freeholders. He shared in the representation of Coventry and of half Tamworth, while representing 2,000 freeholders in Birmingham. The extension of the county representation was the plan which he (Mr. Newdegate) had desired; he had supported the Motion of the hon. Member for the Wick burghs (Mr. Laing) last Session, by which ten additional seats had been given to the counties;

MR. ROEBUCK: What I want to do is to appeal to the Government, and ask them what possible mischief can arise from acceding to the request made to them from this side of the House. What we all want to do is to make a satisfactory settlement of this question, and to do it rapidly. Can we have an inquiry in this House? I think that is impossible, there is such a multitude of little places; but in respect of this matter, which will affect our representation, for, perhaps, centuries, I do not think there can be so much party spirit among us that we cannot find a satisfactory Committee. If we have a Committee a certain result will follow. We can do what we want by means of a Select Committee more rapidly than in any other way, and without casting a slur on the Commissioners. They were appointed to perform certain duties; they discharged those duties, and did not step beyond them, therefore no possible slur can be cast on them. I hope that the Government, in the large and generous spirit which ought to actuate the Government of this country on such an occasion, will accede to the fair, honest, plain, and simple proposition now made to them.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY: Sir, as a Member of the Boundary Commission, I think it is due to the House and to my brother Commissioners that I should say a few words as to the principles upon which we acted in doing our work, and on the proposition now before the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has called attention to the instructions which we received from the House. It was from Parliament, and Parliament alone, that we received instructions. It gave us distinct instructions as to the course we were to pursue; and I believe we have acted faithfully up to them. I think I should bring under the notice of the House what were our instructions, not only in reference to the boroughs, the subject of discussion to-night, but also in reference to the boroughs to be created under the Reform Act. There is a remarkable difference in the language as regards those two different classes of boroughs. As regards the boroughs to be created, this is the language—

“They shall, immediately, after the passing of this Act, proceed, by themselves, or by Assistant Commissioners appointed by them, to inquire into the temporary boundaries of every borough constituted by this Act, with power to suggest such alterations therein as they may deem expedient.”

Mr. Monk

There was then no limitation of our powers whatever, either in regard to contracting or extending the temporary boundaries proposed by the Act. We were left to act perfectly as we thought right in the matter—to exercise our own discretion. But when we come to the other class of boroughs you will find that the instructions were very specific. The language is as follows:—

“They shall also inquire into the boundaries of every other borough in England and Wales, except such boroughs as are wholly disfranchised by this Act, with a view to ascertain whether the boundaries should be enlarged, so as to include within the limits of the borough all premises which ought, due regard being had to situation or other local circumstances, to be included therein for the purpose of conferring upon the occupiers thereof the Parliamentary franchise for such borough.”

We viewed this—and I believe we viewed it rightly—as an enfranchising provision. We looked outside the present boundaries of existing boroughs to see whether there were premises so situated that the occupiers ought to have a vote in the borough. We are told that is merely the transfer of a constituency from a county to a borough; but it is really a different matter. A large number of these persons would have no votes at all unless the borough boundaries were extended. What was the meaning of all we heard last year about the figures £6, £10, and £12, and what was the special charm found in the words “household franchise,” if it is a matter of no importance whether a large number of the people outside the boundaries are included in the assessment, whether they have a £15 house or a mere cottage? We did not look to the matter merely as a transfer from county to borough. What we looked to was whether there was not in places now without the boundaries of boroughs a large number of people who would be altogether excluded from the franchise unless they were included in boroughs. That was the principle on which we thought we ought to act; that was the principle on which we did act; and I rather collected from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire that he thought it the correct principle to apply in respect of these boroughs, limited as we were by the instructions we received from the House itself. It is perfectly true that the matter being now before the House, the House is at liberty to take other matters into consideration which the terms of our instructions did not allow us to consider. It may take cognizance sent petitions to the House, and which were very few in number—they had on the preceding evening amounted, he believed, to only thirteen, and not more than seven of these were important—should have their cases investigated by a Select Committee.

MR. DISRAELI: I believe it will be for the convenience of the House that I should again address them, and I hope that they will favour me with their indulgence during a few moments for that purpose. The obligations of the House and of the country to the Commissioners appear to me to be so considerable and so incontestable that I refrained from responding to the invitation of hon. Gentlemen opposite that I should express the views of the Government upon this subject until the Commissioners had favoured us with their opinions with respect to it. A considerable majority of the Commissioners who could be communicated with have expressed opinions similar to those we have heard from my right hon. Friend (Mr. Russell Gurney), and from the hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Crossley), and I have therefore no hesitation in saying, on the part of the Government, we shall be most happy to meet the wishes expressed. I have noted some points of detail as the discussion proceeded; and what we propose is that there shall be a Committee of five, to be appointed by the Committee of Selection; that it shall sit from day to day; that its investigations shall be limited to places that have already petitioned; that it shall have power to confer with the Commissioners, and that the evidence shall be purely documentary. These five points embrace all that I believe the House seeks. On the understanding that we take early steps to carry this arrangement into effect, I conclude the House will have no objection to go into Committee.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he objected to the arrangement if it would exclude Portsmouth, which had not petitioned, although Gosport had, the public meeting of Portsmouth being held that very night.

MR. STONE also stated how Portsmouth and Gosport would be affected by the understanding come to.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that although the inhabitants of Reading had not presented a petition, they had held a meeting, and objected to the proposal by which they were to be affected, and he thought their case ought to undergo further investigation.

Sir Francis Crossley

MR. OSBORNE: The Boundary Bill is, with the exception of the Reform Act, the most important measure that has for many years come under the consideration of Parliament, and yet we have not, down to this moment, had any discussion of its principles. My constituents have not addressed any memorial to the House, and I will not say anything about my individual seat. To the instructions which were given to the Commission, and to the principle on which it has reported, I altogether object. Before the House, in its haste for co-operation and legislation, consents to shuffle off this question, let us consider whether it is better not to pass any Bill at all than to pass a bad Bill, which will not give satisfaction, and which it will be one of the first Acts of the next Parliament to repeal. I want to know what we are going to refer to a Select Committee, and whether we are going to refer merely the petitions and memorials from large towns, or whether we are going to give it power to do what the Commissioners were debarred from doing—namely, to contract the areas of boroughs. They say that in some cases there are anomalies which cannot be rectified without reducing the areas of boroughs. I want to know whether the Select Committee is to have the power to reduce the area of boroughs, and to correct these anomalies. It is very material that that should be stated. If the Select Committee is merely to rectify the boundaries of Nottingham, Portsmouth, and other boroughs, it will be of no use whatever. I will say one word with regard to the constitution of the Commission. We have heard a statement this evening from the hon. Baronet the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Sir Francis Crossley). I regard that hon. Member as a most excellent man; but I objected altogether to his being put upon the Commission, for reasons which I do not choose to give now. I cannot fall in with the excessive compliments which have been paid to that Commission. So far from its Report having given general satisfaction in the country, it has given great dissatisfaction. The Commission was appointed in a House of thirty Members at the far end of a Session, completely worn out with passing the Reform Act; and I will venture to say that not thirty Members have gone through the voluminous Report of the Commission and the maps illustrating it. Before we appoint a Select Committee we ought to know exactly what boroughs which were affected by the Report to send up petitions, but because he thought that their cases should not be determined without their being heard upon the subject. He presumed he was correct in understanding the right hon. Gentleman to consent that all boroughs which sent up petitions up to the day of the appointment of the Committee should be heard. [Mr. DISRAELI: No!] He could not suppose that the right hon. Gentleman intended to steal a march upon those boroughs which had not sent up petitions by deciding that night that they should be excluded.

SIR JAMES SIMEON asked, whether the Committee would have the power of considering questions such as limiting boundaries, on the application of petitioning boroughs, which the Commissioners had?

MR. DISRAELI: They will have that power; but I may state that if the House would allow us to go into Committee I should not be forced constantly to break our rules by answering questions, because I could then answer every question put to me.

MR. GLADSTONE: I should prefer that we should wind-up this conversation at once, rather than that we should commence another debate. ["Order, order!"] If the House would indulge me for a few moments, perhaps the discussion might be shortened. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to consult the House as to the order of our proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister made a speech in which he introduced a proposal of an entirely new character—namely, the question of referring the matter to a Select Committee. It may be the opinion of the House that the right hon. Gentleman, having already had an opportunity of expressing his opinion upon that question, other hon. Gentlemen who feel an interest in it shall also have the opportunity of speaking upon it?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am anxious that we should arrive at a clear understanding upon this subject as soon as possible. My distinct opinion is that there is so great a disposition in all quarters of the House to come to an agreement upon this matter, that nothing but a little time and consideration are necessary to enable us to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion with regard to it; but, at the same time, we must not come to a premature decision upon it. The general sense of the House appears to be in favour of the appointment of a Committee. I do not quite understand from the right hon. Gentleman whether he intends that that Committee shall decide what cases shall be reserved for further inquiry, or whether the Committee shall finally dispose of all the cases which may come before them. My own opinion is that the Committee should report what cases should be reserved for further consideration. ["No, no!"] I do not make this proposition as one by which I should wish to be finally bound; but my object is to prevent the Committee being deluged with endless details, while at the same time I think an inquiry should be made in bond fide cases. In the first place, I think that all petitions which have been already laid before the House should be referred to the Committee, and it appears to me quite necessary, in the interest of all parties, that those boroughs which have presented memorials to the Commissioners should likewise go before the Committee. In point of fact, the memorials would be far more likely to represent the general diversity of opinion than the petitions to Parliament, and there can be no difficulty in receiving them as long as we keep to documentary evidence. Another point to which I desire to draw attention is this:—Some communities, instead of exercising their right of petitioning, have relied upon their Members to bring their cases before Parliament, and in several instances Notices of Motion have been given with that object. I think it is impossible to exclude such cases from consideration, even although neither petition nor memorial has been presented. In such cases a Member ought surely to be allowed to present such documentary evidence to the Committee as might have been laid before the Commission.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I admit that it is very desirable that we should arrive at a fair understanding as to what has been settled. As I understand, the majority of the House has agreed that a Committee shall be appointed, and that that Committee shall be chosen by the Committee of Selection. ["No, no!"] Then, I will only say that it has been agreed that a Committee consisting of a small number of Members—say, of five—shall be appointed, which shall have referred to it all cases in which petitions have been presented to the House and are now on the table. It must be remembered that the memorials have not been presented to the House, but to the Commissioners, applied for restriction of its boundaries without referring others which had not made similar applications, in the belief that the Boundary Commissioners had refused to consider them.

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY said, that inasmuch as the evidence before the Select Committee was to be of a documentary character only, it would be only fair that Members representing a borough that considered itself aggrieved by the Bill should have the opportunity of making a statement in writing to the Committee, for it was quite possible that the matter could be brought forward more clearly and fully in that way than by memorials and petitions, and the Committee enabled to decide in a more satisfactory manner.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Upon consideration, inasmuch as there are a great many questions which will arise and must be discussed, which will have to be discussed again after the Report of the Select Committee, I believe that the best course for the Committee would be immediately to report Progress. I do not think it would save any time if we were to attempt to go on at present. I only wish to say that the proposal we shall make to the House will be this, that in naming the Select Committee we shall also name the places we propose for their consideration. We shall put the names on the Paper, and if any hon. Member should wish to add to the list he will have an opportunity of stating his case to the House. [Cries of "What time?"] I hope to give Notice to-morrow, and to move on Monday.

SIR GEORGE GREY: If we had before us the memorials presented to the Commissioners it might be of advantage in guiding us as to the cases to be sent to the Committee. The Commissioners state in their Report that those memorials were in their hands.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: My right hon. Friend must understand that we object to go into all the cases upon which memorials were presented. But we will go into cases as to which petitions have been presented to the House, and it will be in the option of any hon. Member who thinks any borough improperly excluded to move that it should also be referred to the Select Committee. The memorials to the Commissioners are of the most bulky character, and it would be an extravagant use of public money to print them.

Mr. Darby Griffith

MR. WALDEGRAVE - LESLIE inquired, whether the right hon. Gentleman's list would include the boroughs the petitions of which had been presented that evening?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: What I propose is that all boroughs from which petitions were presented before the discussion began to-night should be put on the same footing as those from which petitions were previously received.

MR. PEASE asked, whether the Notices of Motion already made will be included in the same category?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied in the affirmative.

MR. POWELL said, that memorials and petitions presented up to this time would probably contain ex parte statements, and to make the documentary evidence complete there ought to be an opportunity for the boroughs affected to put in counter memorials.

SIR GEORGE GREY: What the hon. Gentleman says is perfectly true. Memorials have been presented on one side, and unless memorials be received on the other the Committee will have but an ex parte statement before them. But if the memorials from both sides are presented, then the views of those who assent as well as of those who dissent will be known.

MR. GLADSTONE: I would like to present a point of some weight. Is the Report of the Committee to be final on the question of boundary, or only on the question of postponement? If the Report is to be final with respect to boundary, then its task will be much more formidable than if it was to report only on postponement. A serious difference of opinion will often justify postponement, but not a final decision.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: My proposition is that the Committee should report to the House the final decision, and that the House should take such course upon it as it may deem expedient. If they thought proper the Committee might receive documentary evidence on both sides, but not call witnesses.

MR. ROEBUCK suggested that the Committee should report to the House on what evidence it arrived at its conclusions.

MR. WALPOLE said, that he did not see how the Committee could have the full materials for forming a proper judgment before it. It should be clearly understood what would be the means at the service of the Committee to enable them to decide

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SEA FISHERIES BILL.—QUESTION.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he wished to ask a Question of the Vice President of the Board of Trade, or the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, in regard to this Bill. The Bill was very much objected to in Ireland, because it would leave the oyster fisheries on the Arklow coast, beyond three miles from the shore, exposed to the incursions and depredations of French and other fishermen during close time. Something ought to be done; and he wished to know what was proposed to alleviate the grievance, which was felt very strongly, upon this subject? He hoped he should receive a satisfactory answer.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, the subject had occasioned very considerable discussion in the course of the evening in the other House of Parliament, where the Bill was in Committee. The result had been that the Chairman reported Progress, and the Department of the Government responsible for the conduct of the Bill having had their attention called to the subject, he would state their determination on a future occasion.

NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE observed that an Estimate had been given of the amount of money required for the purchase of the site and other expenses for the new Courts of Law; and he wished to call attention, in connection with this subject, to the importance of providing suitable and convenient approaches to the New Palace of Justice. The Estimate for the site was £1,000,000, and for the buildings £2,000,000. Here was an outlay of £3,000,000; but what provision had been made for the approaches? None. The Courts of Law at Westminster and in the City of London would eventually be concentrated on this spot; and the amount of traffic when the new Courts were in action would be immense. It was therefore the duty of the Government, who had the management of this affair, to see that, if these magnificent buildings were placed in the centre of London, sufficient approaches were provided. There was a sort of Middle Row in the Strand between the two churches east of Somerset House. That block of buildings ought to be removed. Again, from the north and north-east the whole traffic must come through Chancery Lane. The gentlemen of the law had drawn a sort of cordon across London which much impeded the traffic of the metropolis; for the Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn, occupied nearly the whole space from the River Thames to the King's Road, the only openings for traffic east and west being Holborn and Fleet Street. No doubt it was said it would be time enough to make suitable approaches when the Courts were completed; but the buildings required to be pulled down would be trebled in value by that time. The House could not too soon admit the fact that it would be necessary to make large and wide approaches to these Courts. The only approach to the building that would be adequate would be from the Strand; but even this approach could not be reached from the west without passing through the narrow portion of the street caused by the encroachment of Holywell Street. A wide street ought to be made on the west side of the new Courts from the Strand to Lincoln's Inn Fields, and continued to Holborn through Gate Street and Little Turnstile; and another street formed into Holborn through Great Turnstile. He trusted that the Government would not leave these approaches to be considered at the last moment. A comparatively small expenditure now would save a large outlay hereafter; for the public would not be satisfied that the new Courts of Justice, erected at an outlay of between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000, should be surrounded with narrow lanes and impassable streets.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he quite agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for London. In compensation cases for improvements where railways or new streets had been made, the owners of houses always expected three, four, or five times as much as they would previously have been glad to accept. He thought at first that the site of the new Courts of Justice was admirably chosen; but this advantage was now likely to be more than counter-balanced by the difficulty of access to the Courts. When it was proposed to put these Courts in a given position, one of the first questions should have been—How are you to get at them? Parliament should not only have provided for the conhe had understood was to be submitted to the House before its final adoption?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had not made any explanation in moving the Vote, because it was really almost a matter of form after the Act that was passed in 1865. That Act provided that certain sums of money, which should ultimately come out of the Suitors' Fund in the Court of Chancery, should be temporarily advanced from the Exchequer, and be re-paid from the interest of that Fund. Authority had also been given by the Act to purchase what was known as the Carey Street site; accordingly, the properties there were being gradually bought up; and each Session a Vote was proposed to enable the Treasury to advance the money, which was to be re-paid in the manner he had described. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bentinck) had correctly stated what had previously occurred in the House on that subject. In answer to a question put to him, he had said that the Treasury having great doubts whether the decision of the Judges of the Designs could be held to be an award in any sense, the matter had been referred to the Attorney General. All the parties had received notice of that fact, and had an opportunity of representing their case to the Attorney General. He understood from the Attorney General that he had given his opinion on the point within the last day or two; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not aware that it had yet reached the Treasury. As soon as they became acquainted with his hon. and learned Colleague's opinion, it would be the duty of the Government to consider what course should be taken in the matter, and then the House should be duly informed on the subject. In reference to the subject named by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) before the House went into Committee, he begged to say that the importance of it was recognized by the Government, and it should receive every consideration.

MR. PEASE said, that in August last he put to the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works, without receiving any very satisfactory reply, the question, whether the Judges of Designs had made a Report to the Treasury without waiting for the Report of the gentleman to whom a fee of 500 guineas had been paid for investigating the estimates? He afterwards heard that this gentleman's Report, with reference to the two designs most highly thought of, showed that in one case the architect had under-estimated the probable cost of his building by £400,000, and in the other that the discrepancy amounted to £300,000. Under these circumstances, the whole thing was now at a dead-lock—not a very creditable position for all parties concerned.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £3,000,000, Abyssinian Expedition (beyond ordinary Grants of 1868-9).

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £102,905, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the Maintenance and Repair of Public Buildings; for providing the necessary supply of Water for the same; for Rents of Houses for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments, and Charges attendant thereon.”

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN observed that there was in the Vote an item of £1,470 for the erection of a house for the Professor of Theology in King's College, Aberdeen, and for the rent of a house during the erection of the new house. He regretted the absence of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun), and of the hon. Member for Buteshire (Mr. Lamont), who had lately expressed so much hostility to the granting of money out of the public funds for theological purposes. He certainly thought they would have watched this Vote, and saved him from the necessity of asking for any explanation with regard to it. He wished the Government to inform him, whether it was the fact that the Committee were now asked to grant money out of the public purse for the support of a Professor of Theology in the University of Aberdeen, and for the building of a house for that professor, and for the rent of a house until the new house was built?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that a sum of £1,885 was granted last year for the same purpose, and the present Vote was required to complete the undertaking, to which the sanction of the House had already been given.

MR. POWELL, remembering what had been said in the course of Wednesday's debate (upon the Oxford and Cambridge Universities Bill) about Jewish, Parsee, and Roman Catholic theology, said it would be interesting to ascertain what kind of theology was taught by the Professor at the University of Aberdeen. It was the quired. The separation of these Offices was not only productive of inconvenience to Members, but of great expense to the public. He knew these complaints had often been made before, but they did not appear to produce any effect.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that this matter had engaged the earnest attention of the present Government, as well as that of their immediate predecessors. The late Government appointed a Treasury Commission to consider how all the great public Offices might best be concentrated in the neighbourhood of Whitehall and the Houses of Parliament; and since the present Government came into power its investigations had been continued. Three or four days ago his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury laid that Report on the table; and when it was printed—which it would be in a few days—the Committee would see that it had entered most fully and minutely into the question. The House of Commons had yet to consider whether it would sanction the recommendations of the Commission for the concentration, in the most convenient manner, of all the public Departments and their subordinate Offices. In answer to the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Alderman Lusk), he stated that £1,500 of the increase arose from the necessity of providing increased accommodation for the Poor Law Board; two other items, formerly placed under another head, amounted to over £1,000; and the charge for Westminster Bridge was this year increased by £2,500 to provide for its being re-painted and gilded. These sums would account for the excess referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE suggested to the noble Lord the Chief Commissioner of Works, that Glasgow Cathedral should be thrown open to the public; the last year's fees for admission amounting only to £106 17s. 10d., as against £256 1s. for the staff of attendants.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £13,000, to complete the sum for Furniture in Public Departments.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK complained that the Vote had increased £1,500. He contended that the head of each Department should make his own expenditure on this account, and be responsible for it; if a Minister could not undertake the duty he was not fit for the place.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that past experience had shown that it was better to place the furnishing of the public Offices under a responsible Minister, rather than leave it to the heads of the various Departments. The increase in this year's Vote, he added, was occasioned by the contemplated removal of the Board of Trade to the temporary Foreign Office, which would be vacated in a few days.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £122,524, to complete the sum for Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked if steps had been taken, as proposed last year, to throw open Constitution Hill to the public, especially when the Queen was absent from town?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in the absence of the Home Secretary, said he was not aware that any change had been made in that way.

MR. LABOUCHERE observed that there was a sum of £49,000 included in this Vote for St. James's Park, the Green Park, and Hyde Park. Now, there was a good deal of discussion last year about the Parks, and it was then stated that these Parks belonged exclusively to the Sovereign and not to the nation. If that were so, he should like to know why the nation was called upon to pay £49,000 for them. There were a great many items in the Vote referring to money expended on Hyde Park. Though they talked a good deal about liberty in this country, it was almost the only country, he believed, in which cabs were not allowed to enter the public Parks. If they went to Vienna or Paris they found that the inhabitants of those cities were permitted to drive in cabs in the Parks there. The noble Lord might say that the roads in Hyde Park were not wide enough to admit of cabs and carriages together travelling upon them. But the Champs Elysées was not so large as Hyde Park, and yet the road was made sufficiently wide to admit cabs as well as carriages to travel upon it. They were advancing, he would not say in democratic views, but in independent views and in common sense—as the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) had just said—both in that House and the country; and it was time that a person who had not a carriage should be allowed to go into Hyde Park in a cab. To prevent persons driving in the Park who could not ride in their own carriages was to restrict its use to some 10,000 persons. He had received a good many representations on this subject from

In Regent's Park, for instance, there was an expenditure of £8,000 or £9,000, which was to be incurred in consequence of the deplorable accident that took place there the year before last. Those works were now being pushed forward with great rapidity, and would, of course, be made once for all. He might congratulate the Committee that this would be the last year that a Vote would be proposed for the Chelsea Hospital. The charge for the maintenance and watching the Hospital grounds would be transferred to the Hospital, whose estate had lately sufficiently improved to allow of the transfer being made. £700 was to be spent in connection with the old wall in Kensington Gardens, which had to be removed to prevent its falling down, and that, together with £300 for painting, might be regarded as exceptional. An expenditure of £700 had resulted from placing the watching of Hyde Park under the direction of the police, and though the change had resulted in a larger expenditure, it had, he believed, given general satisfaction. An hon. Gentleman (Mr. Pease) had expressed a hope that the temporary road in the neighbourhood of Prince Albert's Memorial would be converted into a permanent road. It would be seen from the Estimates that the formation of a carriage road was proposed, and if the Vote were sanctioned by the Committee, it would be at once commenced. His attention had been directed to the subject of the road at the Roehampton Gate, and he had been in communication with the joint-stock Company to whom the road belonged. He had every reason to believe that, either by some such suggestion as had been made that evening, or by some other plan, a result might be attained which would be satisfactory to those who desired an alteration in the present condition of those roads. As to the grazing in Hyde Park, he did not see any reference to a particular item of that nature; and, with respect to Battersea Park, he might say that property in the neighbourhood was increasing in value, and there was reason to believe that the original Estimate would be borne out.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK wanted to know if the Estimates were to go on increasing from year to year; because, if so, where are we to stop? Since 1866 there had been an increase of £40,000; and last year, as now, the Committee were told that many of the items were exceptional, and would never occur again.

Lord John Manners

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked that there was always a tendency to increase in the sums required for the parks. Claims for additional public accommodation, and additional public enjoyment, were continually being made, and such claims could not be met without increased expenditure. The hon. Member, while complaining of the increase in the expenditure, had at the same time appealed to him for more attention to the flowers—a matter that would, of course, involve the outlay of more money. The mere fact of placing Hyde Park under the control of the police had led to a considerable increase; but a far greater expense had been incurred in connection with the railings which had been torn down.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER expressed a hope that the gates of the Marble Arch at the end of Oxford Street would be thrown open, instead of being kept closed, as they were now.

MR. M. CHAMBERS trusted the noble Lord would not sacrifice, by hasty leasing or sale, the surplus lands of Battersea Park.

In reply to Mr. SANDFORD,

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that if the public were not allowed to have access to Richmond Park, through the private road alluded to, it would be for the Department to consider whether they would not recommend the closing the gate altogether.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £47,936, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the Buildings of the Houses of Parliament."

COLONEL FRENCH said, it would be in the recollection of hon. Members that the original Estimate for building the Houses of Parliament was £750,000; and up to this time they had voted £2,250,000, and after all this expenditure there was not, in the entire building, one good room. As a Member of the Refreshment Committee, he called attention to the narrow, low, ill-ventilated dining-room, and to the necessity of providing better accommodation. A common dining-room for Lords and Commons had been proposed, and some Peers to whom he spoke rather approved the project, but it was not acceded to. The average number of those who dined in the House of Commons in the course of a Ses-gard to what was put down in the Estimates as "the balance of the contract for one statue for the chronological series of statues of British Sovereigns now in course of execution."

MR. LAYARD said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Osborne) was not quite correct as to the case of Mr. Maclise, for he (Mr. Layard) had the honour of bringing his claims before the Committee on a previous occasion. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend that Mr. Maclise had not been fairly treated. Mr. Maclise, with a delicate sense of honour, made no application, but left his case in the hands of the Commissioners; but that was not the way that others had acted. Other artists had not completed their work, and a recommendation was made that they should get an increased sum, and it was voted to them; but it was not voted to Mr. Maclise, on the ground that he had completed his work, which was as much as to say that because he had done his duty he should get nothing additional, while others who had not done their duty should have additional pay. He regretted that Mr. Maclise had never been authorized to carry out the series of frescoes for which he had been directed to make designs. Now, he affirmed that there were no frescoes so remarkable, so important, and so likely to be interesting to future generations as those of Mr. Maclise; they had been executed with the greatest possible care, and they were a faithful record of two great events in English history. Therefore they were far more important and interesting than mere works of imagination. Mr. Maclise, however, did receive some extra sum; but he (Mr. Layard) would cordially support a farther grant to him in order to continue his frescoes.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) in what he had said about the statues in Westminster Hall. He would venture to say that anything more incongruous than to put into a hall of the reign of Richard II. statues which were in the worst style of art of George III. could not be imagined. He was sure the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) would not allow them to remain there; but he should like to hear him say so. As a matter of art he should be sorry to see the statue of Oliver Cromwell placed there, though irrespective of that he should have a word to say against such a proposal. So also would the Irish Members, for if ever there was a tyrant and oppressor in regard to Ireland it was Oliver Cromwell. With respect to the House itself he did not think they could find in Europe a building worse adapted to the purposes for which it was required. There was at the back of the House of Lords a space about four times the size of that House, which was entirely wasted. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) as to what he had said about Mr. Maclise's frescoes. They were too crowded. He did not believe that when Wellington and Blücher met they had to walk their horses over dead bodies. [MR. OSBORNE: They never met at Waterloo at all.] Then that disposed altogether of the remark of the hon. Member for Southwark as to the value of the frescoes in an historical point of view. The Speaker's house was most inconvenient, all the rooms being too small, while there were no rooms attached to the House of Lords for consultation, for counsel, or for witnesses in attendance upon a great Court of Appeal. Then, again, where was there another Assembly in the world the Members of which were unable to properly perform their duties because they were not provided with seats in their Chamber? What was the use of electing Members of Parliament if sufficient accommodation was not afforded them for the performance of their duties? It was absolutely necessary that the House of Commons should be enlarged. Then there was that miserable "cage" in which the ladies were placed. The accommodation afforded them was most discreditable to that House. The ladies should have a decent refreshment-room provided for them; the place now placed at their disposal would not hold more than two persons at a time. It was most disgraceful that the ladies should be cooped up behind a grating which ought to be removed. A grating was not found to be necessary in the House of Lords, and why should it be required in that House? The question of the enlargement of the sitting accommodation of that House was a most serious one. It was probable that when they were returned by the reformed constituencies hon. Members would be more regular in their attendance and more zealous in the discharge of their duties, and then it would be impossible to attempt to squeeze 658 Members into a room that was only calculated to hold about 350. Even now it was frequently impossible for Members to hear a debate or even the question put, and they had to run from the smoking, appropriated to that object. Mr. Barry was requested to draw out a plan, and the Kitchen Committee approved of the plan; but the corresponding Committee of the Lords objected they could not afford to lose the Committee accommodation which it would entail. The Lords having thus put their veto upon the scheme, it fell through. The right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) proposed, about that time, the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the entire arrangement of the House of Commons. That Committee, after sitting the whole of last Session, were re-appointed early this Session, and had just concluded their labours—their Report, he believed, being now on the table. It was therefore inexpedient to go into the question raised by them until the Chairman of that Committee had had an opportunity of calling attention to their recommendations. The hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne), in one of those facetious speeches with which he often amused, and perhaps instructed, the House, had asked what was the history of the arcade which was about being completed in Palace Yard. Now, he believed it originated in the desire of a considerable number of Members that when the railway works had been completed they should be able to get to the station and to the Thames Embankment without crossing Westminster Bridge Road. The Vote for that purpose had been sanctioned in former years, he himself having no responsibility for the work. It was now nearly completed; and, when the difficulties which had impeded the railway company were removed, he had no doubt the arcade and subway would be found a great convenience. The hon. Gentleman had also criticized the Vote of £4,000 for warming and ventilation, and had complained that the result was not at all satisfactory. He, however, could not see how it could have been more satisfactory had the £4,000 not been expended. [Mr. OSBORNE: The thing was badly done.] He did not agree that this was the case. One of the most eminent men connected with this class of subjects had given his unremitting attention to this extremely difficult duty, and as a more frequent attendant than the hon. Gentleman, he was bound to say that he did not think the ventilation and warming of the House, or of its rooms and corridors, was such as had been described. With regard to Mr. Maclise's claims, they had been considered by the Treasury Commission appointed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) two or three years ago, and if they had not been fairly dealt with he was very sorry for it; but this was the first complaint he had heard on the subject. The hon. Gentleman had also referred to the experimental position of the statues in Westminster Hall, and the hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) had urged that it was quite incongruous to place in a Gothic hall, erected in the time of Richard II., statues which would disgrace the reign of George III. Now, the discussion of statues or pictures always led to unlimited controversy; but, if it were true that these statues represented the worst style of art in the reign of George III., the artistic taste of the present reign must be in a very melancholy condition, for they had been committed to the most distinguished sculptors of the day. He, however, did not concur in the criticisms which had been levelled at them. Whether they were properly placed in Westminster Hall or no was a different question. The fact was this—When some of the statues were placed in the Royal Gallery, it struck everybody who saw them that they were too large for the site for which they were intended. His right hon. Predecessor entered into communication with the architect of the Palace upon the subject, and called on him to suggest some site where they would not be out of proportion. The architect suggested, as an experiment, that some should be placed in Westminster Hall, in order that the public and the House of Commons might be enabled to form some opinion respecting them. Temporary pedestals were therefore prepared, and the statues were placed in the Hall. He believed public opinion was extremely divided on the subject; but he was bound to say that if those statues, which were the property of the public and had been paid for, were to be removed, he, for one, should be sorry to see them re-placed in the Royal Gallery, for they would certainly have to be moved away again. This was a question on which the fullest expression of opinion should be given; and he hoped no hasty decision would be arrived at respecting them. With respect to the erection of a drinking-fountain in Palace Yard, to which his hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck) had referred, he had only to state that, as a considerable number of cabmen frequented that spot, it was considered advisable that they should have ready access to the most left to dilettante Members of that House who did not know what they liked.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY challenged the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) to take a division on the item, for he believed that a very large majority of the Committee would be in favour of leaving the statues where they now stood. Though they might not be so fine as the statues in the corridor leading to the House of Lords, they were extremely well placed, and the public received pleasure from viewing them.

MR. OSBORNE accepted the challenge of the hon. Member (Mr. T. Hankey), and moved the omission of the item of £330 for pedestals for statues in Westminster Hall, for iron gates to the Royal Court, and for a drinking fountain in New Palace Yard.

COLONEL W. STUART asked the hon. Member for Nottingham whether he objected to the drinking fountain?

MR. OSBORNE: I leave the drinking to you.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the Item of £330 for Pedestals to Statues in Westminster Hall, for Iron Gates to Royal Court, and for a Drinking Fountain in New Palace Yard, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Osborne.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 76; Noes 234; Majority 158.

MR. LAYARD said, he understood that there was an intention to place the statue of Lord Palmerston at the back of the statue of Sir Robert Peel in New Palace Yard, so that the two statues would be back to back. He wished to know whether there was any such intention. With regard to the statue of Sir Robert Peel he would venture to say that any statue so discreditable to the art of this country had never been raised, and that something ought to be done either to improve the statue or remove it.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the hon. Gentleman would find on the Votes of tomorrow night a Motion for the removal of the statue of Sir Robert Peel.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that business of great importance remained to be transacted, especially the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) for the introduction of a Bill on the subject of the Irish Church. He therefore moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Mr. Locke

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, there were several Votes which would be agreed to without discussion, and after they were gone through there would be no objection to report Progress.

MR. OSBORNE said, the hon. Gentleman might withdraw his Motion, for he believed the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) was not in the House to move for the introduction of his Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,135, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the Maintenance and Repairs of Embassy Houses Abroad."

MR. LABOUCHERE objected to the Vote, and asked, whether it was intended to re-furnish the Embassy House at Paris, on which a very considerable sum had been expended?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that when Lord Lyons went to Paris there were some necessary changes in the furniture at the Embassy which had occasioned some expenditure.

MR. LABOUCHERE understood that when Lord Lyons went to Paris he received a sum of £2,000, a portion of which was to be devoted to the re-placing of furniture at the Embassy. He moved to reduce the Vote by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £135, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the Maintenance and Repairs of Embassy Houses Abroad."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH explained that the Embassy House at Paris was the property of the Crown. The furniture was very dilapidated and absolutely required replacing. Lord Lyons received no such sum as that stated by the hon. Member for any such purpose.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, if he could confirm that statement?

LORD STANLEY said, an Ambassador on going to his post received an allowance for personal outfit; but this was apart ated truths of the Church of England, will never be overthrown by a House of Commons. It cannot be destroyed, except by the vote of a recreant senate and an apostate nation."

MR. GLADSTONE: What is the hon. Member quoting from?

COLONEL STUART KNOX: I am quoting from the right hon. Gentleman himself in 1835, speaking in the House of Commons upon the question of the Irish Church, in opposition to its persistent foe, Lord Russell. I move, Sir, that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Colonel Stuart Knox.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that, when on the previous day he had called the attention of the House to the fact, that it wanted less than ten minutes to six o'clock, and that no time consequently remained for the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) to give any explanation of the contents of this Bill, he pursued no unusual course. There was an analogy between the manner in which what was termed the private business of the House—that which related to matters of detail, to personal or local matters—was conducted, and the practice of the House in Bills of the most important character. The 26th Standing Order related to matters touching such property as that affected by the Bill, when affected in detail by Private Bills. The 26th Standing Order directed that—

"Previously to the deposit of a petition for leave to bring in a Bill relating to the Crown, Church, or corporation property, or property held in trust for public or charitable purposes, before the first reading of any such Bill brought from the House of Lords, notice in writing of such application to Parliament shall be served upon the owners or reputed owners of such property, and the lessees or reputed lessees of such property, holding leases for a life or lives, or for any term of twenty-one years or upwards."

And further in certain cases by a subsequent Standing Order the publication of notice in the Gazette was necessary. These safeguards were insisted upon in the case of Private Bills, and they showed the deliberation, with which the subject ought to be approached. The Controller of the Household had scarcely had time to make his obeisance or to turn round after bringing up Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, when the right hon. Gentleman got up and gave Notice of this Bill. In taking the course he was doing with reference to the right hon. Gentleman's proposal he was only following Parliamentary precedent. His object was to obtain information as to the scope and purport of the Bill. He should like to know whether it was proposed in the Bill to deal either with the Coronation Oath or the Act of Union, both of which had ever been regarded as fundamental portions of the Constitution? He should also like to know, who was to appoint to any incumbencies that might become vacant during the period that the Bill was to be in operation? [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Nobody.] He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire intended that the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk should answer for him. He rather thought that was a more direct inspiration than the right hon. Gentleman would like to accept. He wanted to know, supposing any vacancy should occur during the operation of this Bill, either in a bishopric, cathedral, or in an incumbency, who was to appoint either to the bishopric, the chapter, or the parish? Again, was the person appointed to be put in the full enjoyment of the income and emoluments of the bishopric, chapter, or incumbency? He wished further to know, for what period the Bill, as it was to be temporary, was to remain in operation? He wished to know whether it purported to bind a future Parliament? He thought that in justice to their successors, who would be their legitimate children—the House should know for what time the Bill was to be in operation. Lastly, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman when he proposed to take the second reading? These were questions touching statutes of a fundamental character, touching the Constitution, the tenure of the Crown, and the duties connected with that tenure. There were some Members of the House, at all events, who did not think lightly of interfering with these fundamental statutes.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, before answering the Questions of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, I wish to make a reference to the supposed quotations of the hon. and gallant Member for Duncannon, made from what he says was a speech of mine. I was desirous that without the least delay the hon. and gallant Gentleman should give me an opportunity of verifying those quotations; but he was unable to give me any information that would enable me to do so.

COLONEL STUART KNOX: I have reason to believe that the first part of my quotation was from the speech made by Act referring to bishoprics to be abolished and benefices to be suspended, he will find that the framework of legislation is already in action, and only requires to be extended in order to meet the case with which we have now to deal. There are subsidiary provisions in respect of minor offices in the Church in Ireland—lay offices of a minor character. Persons taking such offices are to take them subject to the pleasure of Parliament. I think I have now described the provisions of the Bill. If I decline to enter into arguments on those provisions at present, it is because I think I am consulting the convenience of the House by so doing, as I believe hon. Members will be better able to discuss the Bill when it is in their hands than they can be now before it is laid on the table.

MR. VANCE said, that although the right hon. Gentleman had thrown a doubt upon the accuracy of the passage quoted by the hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon, yet he could not deny that he had made the strongest appeals from time to time, to that House, in favour of the Irish Church. He thought that the course now adopted by the right hon. Gentleman cast a grave imputation on his consistency. He believed that if the right hon. Gentleman had been in Office the House would not have heard of any attack upon the Irish Church. He believed that had Lord Derby been in Office they would not have heard of it. He believed that its object was to crush the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), who had risen to the post he occupied by his own talent and industry, and to prevent his obtaining a fair trial from that House. According to precedent, they had every right to oppose, if they pleased, the first reading of the Bill. They knew its contents; and its contents were such that he apprehended they were entitled to oppose it. He remembered that more than once a Bill for securing vote by ballot had been successfully opposed on the first reading. This was, therefore, not an unprecedented and unusual course. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire state that, after the reception of the Queen's Message, he had a right to introduce the Bill; but, at any rate, the right hon. Gentleman had introduced it, and they had a right to treat it as they pleased. As they had not seen the Bill, and as it was desirable they should be in possession of that most pernicious document, he should recommend his hon. Friends to reserve their opposition until the second reading. ["No, no!"] Then he should recommend his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stuart Knox) to take any course he thought proper.

Question put, and negatived.

VISCOUNT INGESTRE said, he thought in this important crisis he should be warranted in moving that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire should be read by the Clerk at the Table. [,"Oh, oh!"] He was sure the House would give him credit for saying that he would not do anything factious, or in the spirit of party. It would be most advantageous to hon. Members—anxious as he believed they were, on both sides of the House, that the Bill should be fairly discussed—to know what were the motives of the right hon. Gentleman in bringing forward the Bill. A perfect understanding of what was about to be done would very much facilitate matters. He did not know that he was quite in order in moving that the Bill be read by the Clerk at the Table; but many of those who were accustomed to pin their faith to the principles of the maintenance of Church and State peculiarly advocated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) would be glad to know why he had changed his opinions.

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the noble Lord to move that the Bill be read by the Clerk at the Table.

VISCOUNT INGESTRE again rose to address the House, but being met by loud cries of "Order," resumed his seat.

MR. NEWDEGATE complained that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his Question as to when he proposed that the second reading should be taken.

MR. GLADSTONE said it had escaped him to answer the Question; but he might now state that, presuming he obtained leave to bring in the Bill, as the Bill was short, and as he hoped it would be in type to-morrow, he proposed to fix the second reading for Friday, the 22nd.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. GLADSTONE, Sir GEORGE GREY, and Mr. LAWSON.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have to ask the permission of the House to make an explanation of a matter which has occurred in the course of this debate. ["Hear, hear!"] Aided by my Friends—for I, also, have Friends as well as the hon. and to be allowed before the second reading. Members had a right to know what it was, and he claimed the right to have the Bill read.

MR. SPEAKER: I have already stated that the House itself has declared the practice to be exploded; but, if an hon. Member makes a Motion to the effect that the Bill be read by the Clerk at the Table, and it is seconded, it will then be for the House to dispose of that Motion.

The Motion, not being seconded, was not put.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

Bill, "to prevent, for a limited time, new appointments in the Church of Ireland, and to restrain, for the same period, in certain respects, the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland," presented, and read the first time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he proposed to take the second reading of the Bill on Friday, the 22nd. Feeling fully sensitive of the courtesy that had been shown him by hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House, he wished to inform them that it was not his wish, nor the wish of those with whom he had been in communication, to make any unfair use of that disposition to bring forward hurriedly the further consideration of this Bill. But how stood the matter? The substance of the Bill was in complete correspondence with the second Resolution, which had been before the House for a lengthened period. There were no proposals of a political character in it, nor one involving constitutional privileges, nor any elaborate amplification of detail which differed materially from the second Resolution. That being so, and the Bill being very short and perfectly well understood, and embracing no novel principle, and as it would have been introduced in usual course but for the respect shown to the Royal Prerogative on Thursday of last week, giving fully a fortnight or fifteen days before the day he now proposed for its second reading, he hoped the House would acquit him of any undue haste in the matter.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the right hon. Member for South Lancashire appeared to have forgotten his position as Leader of the Opposition, and to have assumed the functions of a Cabinet Minister without being in Office or properly a confidential Adviser of the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman had no right to be acquainted with the substance of the Reply from the Crown until it was read at the table; other Members of the House had no such previous information. The right hon. Member had carried four Resolutions touching the Irish Church, and might have based his Bill on all or any of them. The Bill was based on the second Resolution only, and he had said enough to show that hon. Members of the House might well feel doubt as to the extent and the purport of the Bill. Under the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman ought not to refuse the usual ten days or a fortnight for the consideration of the measure by the Members of the House and their constituents.

Bill ordered to be read a second time upon Friday next, and to be printed. [Bill 117.]

UNCLAIMED PRIZE MONEY (INDIA) BILL.

On Motion of Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Bill for the appropriation of certain unclaimed shares of Prize Money acquired by Soldiers and Seamen in India, ordered to be brought in by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Sir JAMES FERGUSSON.

NEW PEER INTRODUCED.

Sir John Benn Walsh, Baronet, having been created Baron Ormathwaite of Ormathwaite in the County of Cumberland—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT, 1866.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD, in rising to call the Attention of the House to the Operation of the Contagious Diseases Act, 1866, and to ask, Whether it is the Intention of Her Majesty's Government to extend it to London, and to make it more effective by increasing the Hospital Accommodation? said that the necessity for this Act at the time of its introduction a few years since was very great. The health of the Army and the Navy had greatly suffered from the ravages of contagious diseases, and the Returns had shown that an exceedingly large percentage of the men were continually under treatment. The follow-must answer the question by saying that they had no intention to undertake so large and onerous a duty. In a military point of view, he repeated, the greatest advantages had resulted from the operation of the Act. It was only that day he observed a paragraph in one of the morning papers containing a number of facts which seemed favourable to his noble Friend's views, and which showed that in several of the naval and military stations the percentage of disease had already been very considerably reduced. But when they came to consider the practicability of applying the provisions of the Act to the civil population generally they were met by very great difficulties. The greatest difficulty was the expense attending such a measure. His noble Friend behind him, the Under Secretary of State for War (the Earl of Longford) had informed him that so far as the War Department was concerned, the expense incurred was £15,000 a year. That expense was, beyond question, very profitably incurred. No doubt, it was, in an economical point of view, the interest of the public that the health of soldiers and sailors should be preserved, and it was most proper that the State should incur a certain amount of expenditure with that view. Although he was free to admit that there were very high and important moral considerations involved in the treatment of this subject, he thought that Parliament could hardly be legitimately called upon to deal with them. They must be left to private benevolence and religious principle. Parliament would, no doubt, be justified in dealing with the question from a physical point of view, and if it could be shown that disease of a contagious and dangerous character was at work among a large portion of the population, it might properly step in and appropriate a certain sum of money for the purpose of arresting the progress of the disease. But he did not think that, under present circumstances, the expenditure which was clearly justifiable in the cases of the army and navy, would be equally justifiable if applied to the civil population. Some idea of the expense that would thus be incurred might be arrived at from the Estimate that, in London alone, if the Act were extended to the Metropolis, about 500 beds would be required, at an expense of £25,000 a year; and if the Act were extended to other large towns, it was easy to conceive what a large expenditure would be involved. He believed that the noble Lord had not mis-stated the serious consequences of these diseases becoming ingrained among the population; but it was a well-known fact in medical experience that all the forms of the disease were not productive of the tremendous consequences which had been adverted to. However, in order to reach the most virulent kinds of the disease, it would be necessary to take under supervision a vast amount of other forms of the disease which were not attended with such serious consequences. This circumstance constituted one of the difficulties in considering how far the Act might be applied to the civil community; and he could not at present hold out any hope that it was the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to place the large expenditure which would be required to extend the Act to the civil community on the Consolidated Fund. At the same time, he thought that the working of the Act had not been sufficiently brought before the public. Its benefits were very great, and it was most desirable that more information should be diffused upon the subject. If the noble Lord thought that the subject was of sufficient importance to demand further inquiry, and if he would move for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Act, and how far it might be extended with benefit to the civil community, the Government would not oppose the granting of such a Committee.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that anyone who had been connected with the administration of the navy or army must acknowledge the great importance of this subject. The evil had reached to an enormous height. A ship which came into Portsmouth Harbour with her full complement of seamen, and in two or three weeks would hardly be capable of putting to sea. Therefore in 1864 the Department of the Admiralty, after communicating with the War Office, undertook to bring in the first Contagious Diseases Act. No doubt, the subject was one of great difficulty; but all parties in the House of Commons concurred in supporting the measure, and the Bill, after being carefully considered by a Select Committee, was passed. To carry into effect measures of this kind, it was requisite that they should have the assistance of local authorities, and the late Government would have made nothing of their Act had it not been for the exertions of officers and magistrates, and other benevolent persons at Portsmouth and else-

The deputation doubtless retired well pleased with the result of their visit. This startling statement of the Viceroy, if true, pointed out an easy way to put a stop to the atrocious human traffic; but when the speech made in Paris was known in Egypt, the truth of the assertions was impugned by the European residents with indignation and irritation. They knew, and the Egyptian Government knew, that numerous slave markets existed, and that these were entirely in the hands of Arab subjects. It was known to Mr. Reade—a gentleman looked up to by those who live under his protection as a valuable public servant, and who was acting Consul General in Egypt last summer—who visited the different slave markets soon after, and personally satisfied himself of the inaccuracy of the Pasha's statement. He did not know whether Mr. Reade made a report of his visit to the Foreign Office. It was natural the Egyptian Ministers last year should wish to raise the popularity of the master they served; but this was not sufficient excuse for an unwarrantable imputation to be cast on foreigners living under the protection of their Government. His Highness said that slavery had existed in Egypt 1,283 years, and was mixed up with the religion of the country. It was doubtful, owing to the existence of forced labour, whether the condition of the imported negro was worse than the born Egyptian in "that land of bondage." The state of society in the East was not such as to satisfy a champion of women's rights, and the social requirements of the country were sought for in the slave markets. His Egyptian Highness hinted it would require time to soften such a violent change. The ruler of a wild and fanatical people should receive every consideration under such circumstances. Should it be as the Viceroy stated he thought such powers of search and every facility should be granted; but if, as he feared, that was mere dust thrown into the eyes of Europe, he did not think any politic motive ought to be an objection to the production of such documents as would contradict the statement of the Viceroy that European subjects were engaged in the Egyptian slave trade.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, the Government had no Correspondence on that subject except that which was attainable by the noble Duke whenever he pleased. The last Correspondence relating to it between the Foreign Secretary and Consul Reade was printed at the end of 1867, and would be found in class B, pages 41 and 47. If the noble Duke referred to it he would see that Her Majesty's Government had done what they could to prevent the slave trade to which he alluded, and that Consul Reade had had some success in stopping the sale of slaves. After that, Lord Stanley had repeated his instructions to the Consul to proceed in the same way. Her Majesty's Government had attended to the matter, and he thought nothing more could be done in it at present. The noble Duke, when he read the Correspondence, would find that to be so.

REPORTS OF THE COMMISSION ON RITUAL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY asked the Lord Privy Seal, What are the Intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers in respect of the Two Reports of the Commission on Ritual? Nearly twelve months had elapsed since the Government appointed a Commission on Ritual, and two Reports from the Commissioners were now before the House. The country, although it had been very attentive and most anxious indeed on the subject, had, he believed, been disposed to make some allowance for the delay that had occurred; but he could assure the noble Earl that the public were now becoming exceedingly impatient, and were not inclined to make any allowance whatever for further delay. He, therefore, wished to ask the noble Lord what the intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers were in respect of the two Reports now before the House?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he thought the noble Earl could hardly expect Her Majesty's Government to take action on a question, which naturally involved a great deal of public feeling on both sides, until they had a perfect Report from the Commission to which the subject had been entrusted. As to the delay which had occurred, he regretted it as much as the noble Earl did, and he thought the greater the delay the greater would be the excitement; but Her Majesty's Government could not control the pace at which the Commission moved. That was a point which must be left entirely to the discretion of the Commissioners, who were men well fitted to deal with the important question that had been referred to them. At the same time he dispute were not disputed on account of their intrinsic value, but because they were supposed to be important as symbols of the doctrines to which they all attached the deepest value—it was for that reason that they had taken a deep hold of the feeling of the country, and had excited the earnest fears and apprehensions of his noble Friend; and it was on that account he was afraid they would excite fears and apprehensions on the other side, which would produce violent dissensions in the Church of England, if any incautious proceedings were taken. He ventured to press upon the Government, precisely opposite advice to that given by the noble Earl. This was a matter demanding the very utmost caution; and the Government were bound to see that no measure was introduced, except such as they would certainly be able to carry without producing divisions in the Church of England. He entreated their Lordships not to be excited by such an appeal as that they had heard from the noble Earl, to precipitate themselves into a course of hasty legislation. Were they to do so, they might suddenly find themselves on the brink of a great crisis—such a crisis as that which took place twenty-five years ago in the Church of Scotland. Therefore he earnestly counselled the Government not to be precipitate in inviting legislation.

LORD LYTTLETON deprecated the application of such phrases as “trembling in the balance” to the state of the Church of England. It generally happened, if the noble Earl’s (the Earl of Shaftesbury’s) wishes were not acted on, that he at once declared the Church of England was lost. He had no part in such fears.

LORD TAUNTON said, that a question like this, in which so much controversy was intermixed, required the most cautious and deliberate treatment; and it was most unfortunate that when the public mind was so much agitated nothing should be done authoritatively to guide it. In his opinion it was not in the least necessary to wait for the expected Report before the subjects already reported on were brought under the notice of Parliament. The advice given by the Commissioners was moderate and complete, and he saw no reason for delay.

LORD EBURY said, he would not say a word in defence of his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) who was very capable of defending himself. He (Lord Ebury) was not aware of the feeling of his brother

The Marquess of Salisbury

Commissioners, but his own expectation had been that the Government who appointed the Commission would immediately follow up the recommendations of the Commission by legislation. Had the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) merely stated that the condition of Public Business would not permit of immediate legislation, he would have rested content; but the announcement that Government did not intend to bring in a Bill until the Commission had reported on the whole of the subject before them had positively alarmed him. Considering the state of religious feeling in the country, and the numerous and influential signatures attached to the petitions that had been presented to the House, he did not wonder the noble Earl near him (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had spoken strongly; he wondered rather at the noble Earl’s great patience up to this time. He himself was exceedingly anxious on the subject, and predicted that great danger would result to the Church if things were left in their present unsatisfactory state. He held it the duty of the Government to act as speedily as possible with a view of putting an end to further contention.

EARL STANHOPE said, he must confess himself very much disappointed by what had fallen from his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal. It was not to be expected that the Government should declare authoritatively its intentions so soon after the second Report had been presented, and he thought it wholly premature to address any question upon it at the present time; but his disappointment lay in this—that he understood from his noble Friend that the Government was waiting till the third Report was produced before any legislation would be instituted on the subject. He heard that declaration with utter astonishment, and he could not yet think that such was the deliberate intention of the Government. Speaking for himself—and, perhaps, for others as well as himself—he could see no reason why they should wait, before proceeding to legislation, for the third Report, which had no connection of subject with its predecessors. The third Report would take a considerable time in preparation; and he asserted in the presence of some of his brother Commissioners that it would not add an iota of information or any one further point of recommendation on the specific topics that had already been reported on. The case was this—The recom-

was surrounded would be surprised at the time the inquiry had occupied. It was unfair to complain that the Government had not yet announced the course they intended to pursue, because the subject was one which required a great deal of deliberation, before action was taken upon it.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I can only express my regret that I should have been misunderstood—for it is impossible that any of your Lordships should misrepresent another, unless there was misunderstanding—and I desire to offer a few words in explanation. What I said, or meant to say, was, that in consequence of the delay that has occurred in laying the Reports before this House—the last Report only having been printed two days ago—it would be impossible for the Government to take any action in the matter, at least, until after the presentation of the third Report. I thought it would be surplusage, and perfectly puerile, to tell your Lordships, who know everything which passes in the country, that it would be impossible for the Government to consider so important and exciting a subject at this period of the year, and in the face of the difficulties which, I am free to confess, we are labouring under, in the other House of Parliament. Let us look at things practically. Does the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who thinks everything possible which he undertakes, believe that I could bring forward a Bill this Session, and pass it through both Houses? If he does believe that I could have done so, pray let him try to do it himself. No one doubts his sincerity, and it is not necessary for him to bring in a Bill to prove his sincerity. But it is equally unnecessary for the Government to defend themselves against the insinuation of the noble Lord (Lord Overstone) that it is our fault in any way that this question is not ripe for legislation. What action could we have recommended that would have hastened the inquiry? We have patiently waited for the Report, which has only been put in a shape to be read by us two days ago. It is, of course, my own fault, if I have been misunderstood; but what I meant to say was that, in the present state of things, it is impossible that any action could be taken until the time when the third Report will probably have been laid before your Lordships. I hope, after this explanation, that the astonishment and the disappointment expressed by the noble

The Earl of Harrowby

Earl behind me will diminish. The noble Earl opposite (Earl de Grey and Ripon) said, that the Government is changed—that it has no longer the same head that it had.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON: I said, the position of the Government had changed.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: The position of the Government has changed, and I do not think it was expected, even by the noble Earl himself, considering the state of public affairs—that the change that has occurred would have been effected this year, until a fair field had been prepared and opened, for the final decision of the country, as to which of the two parties should govern. In consequence of circumstances, into which I shall not enter—but which are due to no fault of ours—our position has changed; but I beg leave to differ altogether from the noble Earl, when he says that we have no longer the confidence of Parliament. Parliament does not consist of one House only. It has not yet pleased the House of Commons to declare that it has no confidence in the Government, nor have I any recollection that any vote, either during the present or during last Session, which at all tended in that direction, has been agreed to by your Lordships. Therefore, I cannot help thinking that the noble Earl opposite went out of his way to give us what is called “a slap in the face.” I may add that the noble Earl’s statement, on this occasion, was not made with his usual accuracy.

LORD OVERSTONE explained that he had only intended to complain of the postponement of legislation upon this subject to a future Session.

sum, and a further reduction from that one-half before a comparison could be made between the remuneration paid to the Cunard and Inman Companies respectively. The hon. Gentleman was right in saying that £30,000 was the sum put down in the Estimate, and from the information he had received it will probably be sufficient for the purpose. A messenger had been sent to Washington in consequence of the approaching termination of the Postal Convention between this country and the United States. The Government regretted that it should have been necessary to send him so early in the year; but much inconvenience had resulted from contracts having been entered into so late last autumn.

JUDICIAL PATRONAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is true that the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas has appointed his son, Mr. William Bovill, last year a Lieutenant in the 16th Lancers, to be Clerk of Assize on the Western Circuit, with a salary of £1,000 a year; and, if it be true, whether there is any precedent to justify his appointment to such office; and, whether any or what legal qualifications are regarded as necessary for holding such appointment? He found the office of Clerk of Assize thus described—

“He is Clerk of the Crown for the respective counties included in his Circuit; is (with others) associated to the Judge in Commissions of Assize; and is, by Letters Patent, constituted a Justice of gaol delivery; he is also the Keeper of all the Records relating to the criminal proceedings of the Circuit. He cannot act as Counsel to any person on his Circuit.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, the Clerkship of Assize on the Western Circuit having fallen vacant in consequence of the sudden and unexpected death of Mr. Chitty, it devolved upon the Senior Judge of the Circuit, Sir William Bovill, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, to appoint a Clerk of Assize. The Clerkship of Assize is an ancient office, the constitution and the emoluments of which were altered by statute some time ago, and a fixed salary is now received by the Clerk in lieu of fees of considerable amount which were formerly paid to him. In performing his duties the Clerk of Assize is assisted by a Deputy Clerk of Assize, a Clerk of Arraigns, and a Clerk of Indictments, all of whom are officers perfectly well known, and whose salaries are paid by the Treasury out of the Consolidated Fund. The duties which devolve upon the Clerk of Assize are, in my judgment, rather of a ministerial character and offices of organization and routine than they are offices of a legal nature. And I may say that, according to my judgment, a person of the highest eminence at the Bar would not find much advantage from his legal knowledge and profound learning in the discharge of the duties which fall upon a Clerk of Assize. The duties are chiefly to correspond with sheriffs and gaolers for the purpose of having the calendars made out, in order that the periods may be fixed at which the Assizes shall be held; to attend the Judges during the Assizes, and to act as Associate in the Nisi Prius Court, and as either Clerk of Arraigns, or Clerk of Assize, or Taxing Master in the Crown Court, and to do other duties of that description which require no special legal knowledge. As to the question of precedent, if the hon. Member means to ask whether I know of any instance in which a gentleman has been appointed Clerk of Assize on the Western Circuit who was last year a lieutenant in the 16th Lancers, I really cannot mention such an instance. But if, as I assume, he intends to ask whether there are instances of Judges having appointed their sons or near relatives to those offices, I may state for his information, without specifying names, that I believe that, from the time of Lord Tenterden to the present day, there is not a single office of Clerk or Deputy Clerk of Assize that has not been filled by a Judge's son or by some near relative, and there is no instance in which any complaint has been made of the manner in which the duties of those offices have been performed. The duties of the Clerk of Assize involve also the duties of Associate, and when I am asked if there is any precedent for the appointment of gentlemen who are not either barristers or solicitors, I believe I may state that the offices of Associate in the three Superior Courts of Common Law are held by three gentlemen, two of whom have been students for the Bar, but were never called, and the other was at the time he received his appointment either studying medicine or had actually been admitted as a physician; and I would appeal to anybody who is in the habit of attending the Superior Courts whether their duties are not most efficiently performed by Mr. Campbell, cases, there was a compensation for delay. An opportunity had been thereby afforded of eliciting public opinion on the subject. The organs of public opinion both in Ireland and this country had almost unanimously pronounced in favour of his Motion. There was another respect, too, in which the delay had been advantageous. It enabled a contradiction to be given in the most marked manner to the statement that the Irish people were steeped to the core in disloyalty, and did not wish the Royal Family to visit them. Within the last few weeks the Prince and Princess of Wales had visited Ireland, and anyone who was present or took part in the proceedings there must admit that nothing could be more successful than that visit, or prove more strongly the feeling of loyalty that still existed in the minds of the Irish people. Some persons outside the House had objected to the Motion, as involving matters in which the House of Commons ought not to interfere, but he did not agree in that opinion. He thought that everything concerning the welfare of the Empire should be considered in that House; and, believing that it would be for the welfare of the Three Kingdoms to have a Royal residence in Ireland, he felt justified in bringing the question before the House. He trusted he should say nothing disrespectful to the Queen. He had a right to exercise the privilege of speech in that House, and he was sure Her Majesty would be the last person to take the slightest degree of offence at anything said in that House in a dutiful and respectful manner. The question was totally independent of party politics, and he would endeavour to avoid irritating topics. It was admitted on all hands that the present state of Ireland was not satisfactory. No one would venture to say that the relations between Ireland and England were as satisfactory as the relations between England and Scotland. It was the duty of the Estates of the Realm, as far as possible, to remedy that state of things, so as to endeavour to conciliate the Irish people and make Ireland really an integral part of the United Kingdom. The realm consisted of three Estates, and he was anxious for the co-operation of the first; and he was sure that if Her Majesty would graciously establish a Royal residence in Ireland, that would tend greatly to produce good feeling, peace, and contentment among all classes. It was no novel complaint for Ireland that her Sovereigns had no residence there. The great evil of Ireland had been absenteeism, and the Sovereigns had been the greatest absentees: 250 years ago Sir John Davis, who was sent over to Ireland by James I., wrote a valuable State Paper upon its then condition, and inquired how it was that, though for 400 years English monarchs had borne the title of Sovereign Lords of Ireland, the country had not been thoroughly brought under subjection to the Crown; and he said that the main cause was, first, the absence of the King; and next, the absence of the great Lords. He pointed out that since the Norman conquest, only three Kings—Henry II., John, and Richard II.—had visited Ireland; that on the occasion of their visits the Irish chiefs and persons of authority hastened to take the Oath of allegiance; and he added that many causes of discontent would have been removed by the more frequent presence of the King or the King's son, because the natives of Ireland, both of English and Irish descent, liked to be governed by some great personage. The present complaint of the absence of Royalty was not, therefore, a novel complaint. Sir John Davis, by the way, declared of the Irish—

“That there was no nation under the sun who loved equal justice better than the Irish, or would rest better satisfied with the execution thereof, even against themselves, so that they might feel assured of the protection of the law when upon just cause they did desire it.”

Was it “equal justice” that the Sovereign should be always an absentee from Ireland? In the last 250 years since Sir John Davis wrote had the relations of Royalty with Ireland become more intimate? How many times had Royalty visited Ireland since? He would not refer to the visit of Oliver Cromwell as that of an English monarch. Nor could James II., when he fled from England, or William III. when in pursuit of James II., be said to have “visited” Ireland. From 1690 till 1821 no English King ever visited Ireland; and after 1821 28 years elapsed before another Sovereign, Her present Majesty, landed on the Irish shores. In 1849 Her Majesty paid a visit to Ireland; but she remained only five days. In August 1853 the Queen renewed her visit, but only remained for the same period; and in August 1861 she again paid Ireland a five days' visit. Now, he did not wish to throw the slightest blame upon the illustrious Lady on the Throne; he only stated these facts to show how Ireland had been treated by English monarchs from

There were a few objections raised to the proposal he now made which he would like to notice. In the first place it was said that the Royal Family would not be safe in Ireland. Now, that was a libel which he indignantly denied. It was true that a fanatic at the other side of the globe had attempted the life of the Duke of Edinburgh; but that atrocious crime had been regarded with abhorrence by every man in Ireland, and he had no hesitation in saying that the life of the Queen would be as safe in Ireland as in any part of Her Majesty's dominions. Then there was another objection that there were a number of palaces already, and the cost of maintaining them was very great. But to that he would reply that it would be found much less costly to keep a Royal residence in Ireland than to employ the large number of troops that were now maintained there. Then it was said, if you have a Royal residence in Ireland, why not one in Yorkshire? But Ireland was a separate nation, and would remain so, and, therefore, the cases were entirely different. Even if Her Majesty could not at her time of life be expected so far to alter her habits as to spend a few months of the year in Ireland, there were other members of the Royal Family, the Prince of Wales, for example, might do so. The allowance to His Royal Highness at present might not enable him to undergo additional expense; but he had no doubt it might be left to the liberality of the House on a future occasion to make a Grant for this special purpose. No higher object could be achieved by His Royal Highness than that of rendering the Union not a mere parchment Union, but one of heart and soul; and to win the hearts and feelings of the Irish people would add more lustre to his name than were he to engage in wars of conquest and add new realms to the Empire.

Mr. PIM, in seconding the Motion, said, he advocated the establishment of a Royal residence in Ireland not merely as an act of grace and kindly feeling from which the best results might be hoped for, but also as an act of justice and fair dealing, and yet not in any degree as a substitute for the remedial measures which had at various times received the attention of the House. The people of Ireland had a just claim to their share in the smiles of Royalty, and might appeal with confidence to those motives of public policy which were founded on the duties that a Sovereign owed to his subjects. It would be in effect a recognition of the nationality of Ireland as one of the three kingdoms which constituted the United Kingdom. It would be a recognition that the Sovereign of England and Scotland was also Sovereign of Ireland; and that as she had noble palaces in England, and a Highland home, as well as ancestral palaces in Scotland, so she ought also to have a fitting residence in Ireland, which might show to the people that she looked upon Ireland not as a mere dependency of England, as it had too often been regarded, but as a country of which she was Queen in the same sense as she was Queen of England and Scotland. There were noblemen who had large possessions in Ireland as well as in England, and who while they passed the Parliamentary Session in London, yet visited their estates in the autumn, and thus became acquainted with their tenantry and acquired and preserved that influence which a landed proprietor would always have who made himself known to and was respected by his tenants. Similar reasons might well be expected to induce Her Majesty to visit and make herself personally known to her subjects, and thus preserve those feelings of loyalty and affection which were often created and always strengthened by personal intercourse. The bereavement which Her Majesty had undergone, had induced her to live in retirement for some years, and if her absence from London was felt so much, what must be the feeling in Ireland where she had been so rarely seen. A Royal residence would be an inducement for frequent visits, and not merely for a flying visit of a few days as the guest of the Lord Lieutenant; but for such length of residence as might suit her pleasure and convenience, and afford her the opportunity of becoming better acquainted with the country and with her Irish subjects. There were few things, apart from the redress of admitted grievances and the removal of positive injustice, which would tend so much to cement the union between Great Britain and Ireland, as would the frequent residence of their Sovereign in Ireland. Hon. Members might laugh at that as a mere sentimental grievance; but they knew but little of human nature, and certainly of Irish nature, if they supposed that sentimental grievances, as they were called, did not exercise a powerful influence on the feelings and conduct of a sensitive and warm-hearted people. Such a residence would be appreciated as a mark of confidence, and as a parison, and asked whether there would have been no turbulence and ill-blood in Scotland under circumstances such as those? Would there have been no mutual distrust and hatred? Would there have been no agitation? Might there not even have been riots and bloodshed? Would none of the energy which had produced the agriculture of the Lothians, the manufactures of Paisley and Dundee, and the commercial enterprize of Glasgow, have been devoted to party politics? Finally, would the Scotch be animated by any very fervent love of Englishmen, or any very devoted loyalty to British institutions? It might appear to some that this had little to do with the question now before the House, but, in truth, it had a great deal to do with it; for the bad name which had been given to them, the insecurity which was attributed to society among them, the slowness of their material progress when compared with England and Scotland, were so many discouragements in the way of the proposition now under consideration. Treat them as Scotland had been treated and similar results would follow. The Scotch were once disloyal. That had passed away and had been succeeded by a thorough union of two nations still possessing their distinct national individuality. Why should they fear their nationality? Could patriotism exist without it? There was certainly no necessary antagonism between a love for Ireland or Scotland as their native land, and a full appreciation of the benefits derived from the Constitution under which they lived, or the warmest interest in the fortunes of the Empire of which they formed a part. They could not make them into Englishmen. Nature was against it. The sea which divided them forbade it. It was only by recognizing and acknowledging, and even cultivating their nationality that they could make Ireland loyal. Above all, let their Sovereign appear among them as if she were really the Queen of Ireland — not the mere visitor from a foreign country. To the mass of the people of Ireland she was a foreigner—the Queen of a country for which they entertained no very warm affection. Yet they had always discriminated between the Sovereign and the Government, and on every occasion of their visits their Sovereigns had been warmly welcomed. They could not feel loyalty to an abstraction. Let the people see their Queen living among them—let them see and visit the abode of Royalty. Even the outward show and circumstance of Royalty had its use, and especially with a sensitive and imaginative people. He knew there were many who thought that, in asking the Sovereign or the Royal Family to visit them they were requiring from her the performance of an irksome task. He did not believe it would prove to be such. But even if it were, the French aphorism was applicable — noblesse oblige. If the country be worth retaining, the Queen should see her subjects, and allow them to see her. Danger of insult or injury there was none, no more than in England or Scotland—notwithstanding the late insane and wicked attempt in Australia. In former times the Prince often risked his life when leading his subjects in war. The duties of a King now were more peaceful, but not less real; and it was not less incumbent on him to perform them properly. If the affections of the people of Ireland were worth having, some exertions and some sacrifices must be made to obtain them.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly representing to Her Majesty that it would conduce to the advantage of the Crown and the good Government of Ireland, and tend to allay jealousy and discontent in that country, if Her Majesty had a permanent residence in Ireland, and that this House, feeling deeply its importance, will cordially co-operate with Her Majesty in any steps She may be graciously pleased to take to carry out so desirable an object,"—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he was unwilling to trespass on the attention of the House, but he wished to express the great pleasure he derived from being able for once to agree with the hon. Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen). The proposition made by the hon. and learned Member was so evidently advantageous to Ireland that all must agree to it; and he for one was not disposed to allow hon. Members opposite to claim all the loyalty in the country. The present time was appropriate for bringing this subject forward, because it would be difficult for any private individual to follow the present Lord Lieutenant. Whenever the period should arrive, and he trusted it might be far distant, when the present Lord Lieutenant should resign a dignity land, but no such provision had been made for Ireland, notwithstanding the fact that Ireland, in proportion to her means contributed more towards the National Exchequer than even England did. Even the Isle of Wight was honoured by a Royal residence, and England had eight or ten, but poor miserable Ireland had not one. Ireland was called the sister country, but she ought to be called a step-sister, for she was treated like one. If the people of Ireland were treated like those of Scotland and of this country, there would be little to complain of. Nothing would do more to cement the union between the two countries than the establishment of a Royal residence in Ireland. It would save thousands of pounds to the Imperial Exchequer by stimulating the loyalty of the Irish people. Of course the Queen could not reside there for any long period at a time, but at all events one of her numerous sons might remain in Ireland, if not permanently, at least for a season every year.

MR. HADFIELD said, he cordially approved of the hon. and learned Baronet's (Sir Colman O'Loghen's) proposition, and should support it if it were pressed to a division, believing that the expense which might be entailed by the terms of the Motion would be as nothing compared with the gain of the hearts of a people. The Royal Family seldom visited the Black Country, and the great city of Manchester had been visited only once. The people there did not complain; but the enthusiasm with which Her Majesty's visits to those districts had been hailed showed what might be expected to follow in the case of Ireland.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I quite agree that there is no influence more beneficial than that which proceeds from personal relations between the people and their Sovereign. But in listening to the complaints which we have heard from various parts of the United Kingdom, arising from the absence of Her Majesty and of her predecessors, I would observe that this was largely to be attributed to the great difficulty of communication that for a long time existed between the various kingdoms over which Her Majesty rules. But the tendency of the age in which we live is very much to diminish those difficulties, if not to make them disappear altogether. And if we take a general view of the subject I think there is some evidence of a very much increased inclination on the part of the Royal Family to visit those portions of the country which for so considerable a period have not been blessed by the presence of our princes. Indeed, the hon. Baronet who brought forward this Motion, and complained that Ireland in the course of two centuries had only been visited for a certain number of days—which have been calculated by a herald—must admit that the greater number of those days have been contributed by Her Majesty herself. And we cannot for a moment suppose that there is any want of sympathy between the Queen and her Irish subjects; because the hon. Baronet has himself alluded to the written record of Her Majesty's feelings to which everybody who has read them must have fully responded. We must remember also that the position of Ireland is in this respect no worse than the position of Scotland was until very few years ago. Scotland, I think, was never visited for any time by one of our Sovereigns from the time of James II. to the reign of Her present Majesty. [Cries of "George IV."] I am speaking of Sovereigns who resided in the country. But during all those years the principle of Sovereignty at least was represented in Ireland, while it was not so represented in Scotland. And though it may be easy to talk in depreciating terms of the office of the Lord Lieutenant, I am myself persuaded—not merely from the experience which we all have at this moment, but from other instances which we may remember—that a man of ability and splendour filling that office may effect a great deal of good, and is something more than the nominee of any Minister. We must recollect, then, that during this period Scotland was as little visited by the Sovereign of this country as Ireland, and that Scotland has not had the advantage of an institution which, when well administered, is in my opinion extremely beneficial. It is impossible not to have been gratified—every Englishman must have shared the feeling—at the manner in which their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess of Wales were received during their recent visit to Ireland. And I may be permitted to say that their visit afforded Her Majesty the greatest gratification, and that she has been pleased to express her wish that the visits of the Royal Family to Ireland shall not be infrequent. With regard to the specific Motion before us, I trust the hon. Baronet will not ask the House in the present instance to decide upon it. There are many reasons upon which it is now unnecessary

they recommended the designs of one architect for the exterior, and of another architect for the interior of the building, advising that the work should be given jointly to the two so recommended. He believed that there was nothing in the Instructions to the Committee to compel them to select any plan; and the terms on which the architects competed, so far as he was aware, gave none of them the right to complain of being dismissed. The two architects so chosen consented to act together; but another difficulty arose as to whether the sum required for the building, according to their plans, would not exceed the original Estimates. The Report of Mr. Gardiner, the surveyor, upon that point, showed that none of the architects had come within the estimated figure. He should be glad to know what was the cause of the dead-lock which appeared to have arisen in the matter. When the House met in November, questions were asked on the subject, and it was stated that a hitch had arisen. The Judges had made their Report, and it was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown. Questions were again asked in February as to what was the real difficulty; but it was only last night, as he understood, that the Opinions of the Law Officers had reached the Treasury. He hoped, therefore, that now some information would be given as to the cause of the delay. Private individuals occupying houses adjoining the site of the proposed building had been put to considerable risk and inconvenience by the uncertainty in which the subject was involved. As far back as the year 1866, the inhabitants of Bell Yard had received notice that their premises might be required for the purpose of that structure; but they had no means of knowing whether any use would be ultimately made of that notice; and they were in consequence carrying on business at a loss, which could not be made matter of compensation, except by special legislation. The Suitors' Fee Fund, out of which the money would ultimately come, also suffered, as the money was, in the first instance, advanced by the Treasury, and large amounts of interest were accruing, which would have to be repaid by the Suitors' Fee Fund. A notion was gaining ground that the Government had some intention of abandoning the proposed site, between Carey Street and the Strand, and of erecting the building at some other and less convenient spot. It was rumoured this was a hobby of the late Prime Minister and the present Lord Chancellor, and that there was some desire to take advantage of the difficulty which had arisen to throw the whole matter over and get some new site. He should be glad to receive some distinct assurance that there existed no ground for such an impression. The vacant site would be a disgraceful spectacle if there were any undue delay in occupying it; for the purpose for which it had been turned into was for the present no better than a wilderness.

Mr. Denman

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would take upon himself the duty of answering the Questions of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Denman), as the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works would have to answer another Question. The subject had been mooted in the House so often during the last few months, and he had answered so many Questions upon it, that he hoped to be excused from following the hon. and learned Member in all that he had said. In the explanation he was about to give he must speak from memory. The Judges of Designs were appointed jointly by the Treasury and by the Courts of Justice Commissioners. If he remembered rightly, the Treasury were to select the design, with the advice and concurrence of the Commissioners, and it was thought by the late Government that such a concurrence could be best obtained by the appointment of a Committee of Judges of Designs. After the Committee was appointed, and chiefly in consequence of representations made in this House, two professional gentlemen, Messrs. Pownall and Shaw, were added to the Judges. It was expected by the Treasury and the Commissioners that the Judges of Designs would have selected one architect, and the memorandum relating to the competition rested upon that supposition. The change of Government occurred after the Judges were appointed and the Instructions framed. When the Judges of Design sent in their Report to the Treasury, they stated that they had been unable to select any one architect, and they recommended that Messrs. Barry and Street should be employed to prepare a joint plan, considering that the design of one of them was best in point of arrangement, and the other in point of external architecture. It had been previously agreed upon between the Treasury and the Judges that a gentleman should be appointed to go through the estimates submitted by the architects, and give a professional opinion awerable for the circumstances in which it had originated.

MR. COWPER said, the delay had not been justified on the part of the Government. He admitted that the Government, as well as the Judges of Designs, had been placed in some difficulty by the course which the competition had taken. The designs showed great excellence, originality, and some sparks of genius. But the difficulty the Judges felt was in deciding which of these designs, under all the circumstances to be taken into account—internal arrangement, exterior design, and appropriateness—was absolutely the best. At last, finding themselves unable to agree upon the superiority of either of the designs which they specially favoured, the Judges thought it best to bracket the two architects and make a double award. He admitted that the Treasury were thereby placed in a difficulty; but he could not admit that this difficulty was one which it required four months and a half to solve. As to the expected Report of the Judicature Commission, he did not think that was a reason why an architect should not at once be appointed and a beginning made. Great efforts had been made to hasten the purchase of the ground, to clear the site, and to urge forward the competing architects, and he hoped that there would now be no further delay.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE wished to say a few words on behalf of the architects who had entered into that competition. With some almost infinitesimal exceptions, the voice of the educated architects and amateurs of England united in praise of the remarkable architectural talent, the broad conception, and the admirable execution which characterized that noble series of drawings. There was no doubt it would be felt as a cruel wrong by the architects and the public if the difficulties and delays were to have the effect of throwing aside those designs. He appealed to that (the Ministerial) Bench, or to the Bench opposite, whichever of them ultimately should have the carrying out of the plan, that when the time came the architect should be chosen out of that noble eleven that had competed, and that he who had long been fielding, should hold the bat and have the innings which he deserved. Otherwise there would be a controversy to which the present Pugin controversy and other controversies would be but a trifle.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that a number of his constituents in Bell Yard

had got notice that their premises would be required, and they had to carry on their business without knowing when they should have to leave their houses. What he had to ask was, that the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works would say a word of comfort to those poor people, and let them know when their premises would be required, and compensation given them. They ought not, in order to do a public good, do a great private evil, and he hoped the case of the occupiers of shops would be considered at once, so that they might know what position they were really in.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he had only one remark to make in reference to an observation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. His right hon. Friend had said that he was not aware until last night of the growing feeling that a mistake had been committed in the proposed site of the Law Courts. He could assure his right hon. Friend that that was a growing feeling, and that it was very generally felt that the proper site was the Thames Embankment. He would put it to his noble Friend the First Commissioner of Works whether, as a good deal of money was to be spent, it ought not to be laid out in the most judicious manner? One thing was certain, that on the embankment the Courts would occupy a most beautiful site, quite near the Temple, and one which was far preferable to the site now selected. It was not yet too late to change the plan.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he did not think that the answer given with respect to the competition was a satisfactory one. None of the eleven competitors had been successful. He ventured to say that there had been too much inclination of late years to make captivating plans, and he thought that the origin of that error was to be found in the choice of a captivating plan for the Houses of Parliament, which had greatly deceived the profession. The honest competing architects who exhibited their plans in Westminster Hall had been unjustly treated. The sum originally proposed to be spent on the Houses of Parliament was £750,000, and architects who honestly confined themselves within the prescribed limits of expense, and prepared their designs according to that Estimate, were placed at a disadvantage. Every architect who saw the plans said at once that the captivating and admirable design of Mr. Barry could not be executed for the amount proposed. He could only suppose that that plan was put forward for LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the opinion of the Attorney General on the matters referred to him had only just been received at the Treasury, and the Government had as yet had no opportunity of considering it. All he could say was, that the suggestions which had now been made should be carefully considered, and that no time should be lost.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS ACT—
DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he wished to call attention to the Registration of Voters Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, and the other legal provisions for the registering of Voters, and to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take to shorten such proceedings so as to enable Parliament to be dissolved in the autumn? About a week ago they were told that Her Majesty's Ministers had been advised that the House of Commons should have its existence terminated at as early a period as the state of Public Business would admit, with a view to the opinion of the new constituencies being taken as to the conduct of public affairs. The First Minister of the Crown stated that he had been advised that certain steps might be taken with the co-operation of Parliament to enable the opinion of the constituencies to be taken in the course of November in the present year. Now, the House was probably generally aware that by a provision in the Act of last year no Election could be held previous to January 1, 1869, under the arrangements made by that Act. There was also a clause introduced into that Act having reference to the Reform Acts already in existence, providing that the registration of voters should come into operation a month later than usual—namely, that the registration of voters of the new constituencies should come into operation on the 1st of January, 1869, instead of as usual on the 1st December. Therefore, as the law existed, it was illegal to have a dissolution and an appeal to the new constituencies until the beginning of next year. It might be said that these were mere paper impediments, which were created by Act of Parliament, upon consideration more or less deliberate and wise with reference to the circumstance of the case, but which Parliament might in its wisdom think proper to remove. But the question behind that was one of considerable importance—namely, whether these constituencies could be formed so as to take their opinion at a much earlier period than that so arranged. The existing Act of Parliament regulating the registration of voters had been framed after very considerable deliberation and experience, and after the matter had been considered both in the House and upstairs. The First Minister of the Crown conveyed to the House that it was necessary, in order to facilitate these arrangements, that the Government should abandon a great part of the Business now before them; and before he went to the Registration Acts he wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman and the House that, unless the existence of the House of Commons could be terminated at a very much earlier period than anyone supposed, the abandonment of the Business before the House would not, in the least, contribute to the object at which the right hon. Gentleman aimed. By no conceivable pressure that had been suggested in any quarter could a dissolution occur much earlier than the end of October or the beginning of November, and no one could contemplate that the Session of Parliament for the completion of the various matters submitted for the consideration of both Houses would be prolonged until the end of September or the beginning of October. It was therefore clear that the mere abandonment of the Business before the House had nothing to do with the appeal to the new constituencies, but that, as far as the continuance of the Session was concerned, the length or brevity of the proceedings allotted to the current Session had nothing to do with the facilitation of the dissolution or taking the opinion of the new constituencies. He must, therefore, express his surprise that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it necessary to introduce so wholly irrelevant a topic. The main question was, whether it was practicable or not, by any arrangement, so to abbreviate the present process of registration and of getting a perfect list of voters as to enable Parliament to be dissolved before November, and arrive at a decision on the questions of policy to be submitted to it before Christmas? He did not wish to commit himself to a decided opinion on the subject, but he had acquired information, as he supposed, in the same way as the right hon. Gentleman—by conversation with gentlemen conversant with the subject—and he was told it was nearly impossible successfully to abbreviate the process of regis-was given to it in ordinary circumstances. He would not undertake to say that could not be; but he must say it appeared to him a paradox, which would require a considerable degree of authority and proof to satisfy him of its accuracy. Well, they thus got to the 31st of October; and now came the question of the final completion of the register, which was no ordinary matter. It seemed to be supposed that when the Revising Barrister had completed his functions there was an end of the matter, and they could have a General Election the next day; but that was far from being the case. He would not go into the case of appeals to the Common Pleas, but he was told that under the existing Act the notices of appeal must be given within the first four days of Michaelmas Term—that was to say, between the 2nd of November and the 4th of November. That would make appeals an impossibility. But even at present the appeals in the Common Pleas had often to be deferred till the following Term, from want of time to deal with them. Appeals, therefore, must be left out of the question. The clerk of the peace now came in, and he had finally to make up the register. He was required to arrange all the names alphabetically in the different parishes, with their separate numbers, involving an enormous amount of mechanical labour—at all times very considerable, and on the present occasion immensely increased—which could not well be disposed of under three weeks or a month. Indeed, he was told that as things now stood the clerks of the peace had often the greatest difficulty in making up the register by the legal term; but the mechanical difficulty of making it up would now be greatly increased. Allowing only a fortnight, however, that brought them to the middle of November. The ten days he had previously named were the only period by which the work of registration could be condensed. But the right hon. Gentleman forgot the period which the law required to elapse between the proclamation of dissolution and the meeting of the new Parliament. The 15 & 16 Vict. c. 23, provided that thirty-five days should elapse between the proclamation of dissolution and the meeting of the new Parliament. Of course Parliament could undo what it had done; but if there was to be a General Election in the most inclement season of the year, that period could not practically be reduced, considering that it would be requisite to provide for polling in the Hebrides and the Orkneys, and that they would afterwards have to get together the representatives of the people from all parts of the country. This period of thirty-five days, as far as he had been able to make out, making all the possible reductions in time, would carry one on to the 10th of December; and all that could be thus done was to reduce, perhaps by forty or fifty, the number of days within which under the existing laws the new Parliament might be summoned at the earliest possible period—that Parliament might meet in the middle of December instead of early in February, as it might according to the present Act. He therefore wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, after all the consultations on the subject, the whole difference was that, instead of Parliament under the Act of last year meeting early in February, it might meet on the 10th of December? Was that the result of all the deliberations in the Cabinet, and of the conference with the highest Personage in the realm? If so it was not worth the right hon. Gentleman's while to have taken the trouble, for the sake of those two miserable months, to have gone down to Osborne and tendered advice to the Sovereign. He had left out of his observations any consideration of the Scotch requirements with respect to registration. There were in Scotland analogous requirements as to proper notice of claims to vote and of objections; and there would be arguments before the Sheriffs in Scotland, who stood in the position of Revising Barristers. Time must be allowed for the completion of correct lists of voters. He wished, then, to know what steps the right hon. Gentleman intended to take to accelerate the dissolution of Parliament? Was it merely the case that he contemplated dissolving Parliament late in the autumn instead of in January? The right hon. Gentleman had informed the House that he had the authority of the Crown to dissolve, and the House was entitled to know what steps were to be taken to abbreviate those proceedings, rendered necessary under existing Acts, so that at the new Election the new constituency would be able to exercise their suffrage. Without wishing to pry into Cabinet secrets, he should also like to know who were the advisers, of legal knowledge and experience, to whom the right hon. Gentleman had recourse before he gave the advice which he tendered to the Sovereign. People were accustomed to believe that new claims on the list were unobjectionable unless time was given for inquiry?] They would know it really in the parish within the shortest time. The list would have been published, and he could not see how the fifteen days were practically required. Of course it was open to anybody to say it would take fifteen days for a solicitor to get ready his opposition to or support of a claim; but, as he had been assured by experienced authorities and as he himself believed, that time was, practically, not necessary. Consequently, instead of the Revising Barristers' Courts commencing on the 15th of September, they might practically begin on the 21st or 22nd of August. [Mr. BOUVERIE: How are you to get your Barristers then?] The time now allowed the Revising Barristers for their work was from the 15th of September to the 31st of October, and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) said he had been informed by men of experience that it could not be done in less time. For himself, however, he must state that he had never known a Revising Barrister to take more than three weeks.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he had mentioned the time fixed for the revision under ordinary circumstances, and that there would be an extraordinary amount of business this year.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, if the House were really desirous that the revision should be advanced and hastened, it must be content that further assistance should be afforded and that the number of Revising Barristers should this year be increased. He ventured to say that no dearth of available Revising Barristers would be found; and that, by increasing the number, he had no doubt the revision could be completed in a month, or between the 22nd of August and the 22nd of September. Then as to the subsequent operations; by the existing Registration Acts the town clerk had, he knew not for what reason, to number the entire register from beginning to end in regular consecutive order. The Government thought that was an unnecessary proceeding, and that if the names in each parish were numbered, and the parishes stood in alphabetical order, it would at the polling have all the same result, because when the voter went to the poll he would say his name was on the list of such and such a parish, and that his number was one, two, or three in that parish. The effect of numbering the whole list consecutively from beginning to end was that they could not commence to put the lists into print until they had the whole thing complete. But by the plan he had suggested of having the parishes separately numbered and put in alphabetical order, a great deal of time might be saved in the process of printing, and even the enlarged register might be got ready within the period which used to be allowed for the smaller one. Probably, the town clerk or the clerk of the peace would require to obtain additional assistance for that purpose, and, if so, he must be paid accordingly; but the result would be that if they got the revision completed by the 22nd of September, the register itself might be completed by the 20th of October. No doubt that would involve considerable difficulty and would require a considerable effort; but he believed it might be accomplished, and then they could have an election any day after the 20th of October—that was to say, the register would be ready. The right hon. Gentleman raised an objection in regard to the proclamation on a dissolution, and the period of thirty-five days between it and the meeting of Parliament; the point had taken him somewhat by surprise, but he apprehended there was nothing in the law to say there should be no proclamation issued before the registration was completed. [Mr. BOUVERIE: It could not be done; there would be no constituency.] If the law was as stated by the right hon. Gentleman, which he did not admit, then it was clear it could be altered and the period diminished. The right hon. Gentleman was very anxious to hasten the dissolution. Then, instead of trying to put in the way every suppositious difficulty, which, probably, after all, would be found none practically, let him assist the Government in accelerating it. According to the Registration Acts the register was to be ready by a given day, and it was enacted that whatever election occurred after that register was complete, must be based upon it. Therefore, he said, and said with confidence that there was nothing in the proclamation statute or the Registration or Reform Acts to make it necessary that the register should be complete before the issue of the proclamation of dissolution. At all events they might have an election at the end of October, and by shortening the thirty-five days a meeting of Parliament in November. Before that he could not see how it could practically be done. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Sir Robert Collier) the other night referred extricating themselves from the present abnormal state of affairs by an autumn Session. But he could not help thinking that the Solicitor General had made a material omission in his calculations. He admitted that the publication of the registration lists could not take place before the 1st of August. He would reduce the time now allowed for giving notices of new claims and objections, which was twenty-five days, to ten days. He (Sir Robert Collier) thought fifteen days at least should be given. But supposing the hon. and learned Gentleman to be correct, what followed? The hon. and learned Gentleman would give from the 10th to the 20th of August for the parish officers to make out the lists of claims and objections. The 20th of August would therefore be the first day on which the notices of the new claims could be published, and it was absolutely essential, before the lists were revised, that persons should know what claims were brought forward and who the claimants were. The law at present gave fifteen days for that purpose, which was not too much. But the hon. and learned Gentleman allowed not a single day or hour for the purpose; he entirely omitted from consideration that which, if the revision was to be a reality, could not be lost sight of—the importance of giving time to inspect the lists, to examine the claims, and to decide whether objections should be taken or not. If, however, the list of claims was only to be published on the 20th, and the revision commenced on the 21st, there would be no time to discover whether the claims sent in were valid or invalid; and therefore his hon. and learned Friend, in losing sight of this point, was altogether wrong, as he ventured to think. They could not give less than fifteen days for the purpose of examining the claims and preparing cases. The Solicitor General had somewhat sneered at the preparation of cases for the Revising Barrister; but, if the revision was to be a reality it was absolutely essential that persons should have time allowed them to prepare for coming before the tribunal, and to consider in what shape the case should be framed. His hon. and learned Friend gave the 25th of November as the time for the assembling of the new Parliament. But to attain this result he first omitted five days, and afterwards another period of fifteen days. Adding them together it brought them to the 10th of December, the exact period named by his right hon. Friend the Member for

Sir Robert Collier

Kilmarnock as the earliest period for the meeting of the new Parliament. It was extremely undesirable that the House should deceive themselves in this matter, however anxious they might be for the assembling of a new Parliament; and it therefore deserved consideration whether it was worth while having an autumnal Session this year at all or not. Upon that point he offered no opinion. There could be no question that the coming registration would be infinitely more difficult and burdensome than any which had preceded it, not excepting the first under the old Reform Act. Therefore, he supposed it was that a clause had been introduced into the Reform Act extending the registration from the end of November to the end of December. Yet the time now proposed for carrying it out was less than on any previous occasion. It could not be satisfactory to the new constituencies to find that the process of registration must be squeezed to an extent altogether unprecedented. Although he did not deny that the registration appeals need not be decided previous to an election, it certainly would be convenient to have them disposed of. The appeals under this new system would be numerous, and must involve many difficult and important questions, upon which it was possible that several of the Revising Barristers might hold different views. Take one point—whether payment of rates by the landlord is to be considered payment by the tenant. In point of law, he believed that no doubt whatever existed on the point; but possibly some of the Revising Barristers might decide otherwise, and such a decision, if it were given, must affect the franchise possibly of hundreds of thousands of persons. He, therefore, thought it extremely desirable that the judgments of the Court of Common Pleas should be had on the disputed cases before the list was finally made out, though he did not insist on that as a sine qua non. If this question were not decided by the Court of Common Pleas it might come before Election Committees, where they would get different decisions, and not arrive at the truth without the expenditure of a great deal of time and a good deal of money. But if any dissolution could be obtained at a sufficiently early period for a working autumnal Session, he, for one, should not insist on having the decision of the Court of Common Pleas taken before the General Election. He did not make these remarks for the sake of obstruction, but simply to proof. The fears expressed in that House on the subject of registration were purely imaginary.

LOTTERY ACT.—QUESTION.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether he thinks it proper that the Penal Clauses of the Lottery Act should be enforced in respect to drawings of prizes for purely charitable objects? His reason for calling attention to this subject was his having received a letter from the Treasury warning him that he was liable to a penalty of £500 for being connected with a lottery. That was a thing which might abash most people. He was patron of a bazaar for charitable purposes, one of the attractions of which was a lottery or drawing for prizes, and that being so he considered it ought not to have been taken notice of in that strong official manner. The 12 Geo. II., c. 28 — after referring to the Act of William III.—was passed, according to the Preamble, for the more effectually preventing excessive and deceitful gaming; but how a raffle for a charitable purpose could come under that denomination he was at a loss to conceive. The fine of £500 was imposed under the 42 Geo. III., c. 119, and besides that the Act characterized every person who took part in these raffles as “a rogue and vagabond.” Another Act aimed at preventing the practice of setting up in places of public resort what were known as “little goes.” It also provided for the extinction of “little goes.” Now, when he was at Cambridge, he believed it was not considered dishonourable for those to take a “little go” who could not take a great go, and that it in no way interfered with taking high positions in after life. By the 6 & 7 Will. IV., which related chiefly to foreign and other lotteries, a penalty of £50 attached to the printer for printing and publishing the notices, and by the 8 & 9 Vict., which recites the 7 Will. IV., which was passed to put an end to actions brought by informers, the putting the terrors of the law into force was removed from them and placed at the discretion of the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and the Law Officers of the Crown. He believed that that discretion had been, on the whole, wisely exercised, but he was unfortunately the victim in a case which he believed was an improper exception to the rule. Those Acts were, in his opinion, framed for the purpose of stopping actual gambling — lotteries likely to ruin the people; but it was never intended that the law should apply to lotteries at bazaars for charitable purposes. It was well known that the movers in most commendable plans for encouraging art were amenable to the law as it originally stood, and a special Act had to be passed exempting Art Unions from the penalties of the Lottery Act. On the same grounds, or rather on much stronger grounds, he contended that those who took part in schemes for aiding philanthropic institutions should also be exempted. The case in which he had been summoned was no uncommon one. The managers of the Shiffnall Roman Catholic Reformatory School—a school recognized by the Government and approved of by the Government Inspector—had incurred a debt of £2,000 for the purpose of better carrying out the regulations of the establishment; and in order to raise that sum it was proposed to hold a bazaar, and one of the attractions was a lottery, and it was because he was connected with this scheme that he had been stigmatized as a rogue and a vagabond. The school had hitherto worked well, and been of great public advantage; and it was too bad that those who took an interest in reforming juvenile criminals and thereby conferred a benefit on the public, should have this slap in the face in the shape of a threat of £500 penalty in carrying out so desirable an object. It was very singular that the patrons of this bazaar should have been singled out for the wrath of the Treasury. Some said that only Roman Catholic institutions were proceeded against on this account, he disclaiming any such opinion; but he held in his hand a ticket for a “Grand Volunteer Prize-drawing,” not 100 miles away, and he was not sure he had not incurred another penalty of £500 in having it in his possession. He found that the drawing was patronized by several mayors, three Members of Parliament, and one or two baronets; and he had been informed by one of the Members of Parliament that he had not received any warning from the Treasury. Lecturers had been going about the country propounding the most indecent doctrines to young men and women, under the auspices of a society which called itself an electoral union; and, although their path was bestrewed with indecency, although they produced bad feeling between different classes of people, and although their progress latterly had worth while retaining the statutes against lotteries it was almost impossible to prosecute, in a case that was thought to be a bad one, when people could turn round and say that a number of so-called charitable lotteries were overlooked. He could not express any opinion as to whether it would or would not be expedient to alter the law so as to legalize lotteries for charitable objects; but he was quite sure there was no partizanship on the part of the Government against Roman Catholic lotteries. Notice was given on all occasions that it was found the laws against lotteries were going to be infringed, whether the lottery was for a good purpose, or whether, as was too often the case, it was established to carry out a considerable scheme of fraud.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £32,760, to complete the sum for Public Offices' Site.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he rose to call attention to the manner in which the sites of public buildings were purchased. The practical result of the system was that the surveyors were restricted in the amount they had to spend, and the purchase of the land they had to deal with. The property was dealt with in sections, and as soon as section A was purchased section B was quadrupled in value. He thought it would be much better to vote the requisite sum and take the land at once, and suggested the propriety of postponing the Vote and bringing in a supplementary estimate.

MR. COWPER said, he thought it would be unwise to purchase and clear land that might never be wanted; and that it would be unfair to the tenants of buildings to get rid of them before the property was actually required for public purposes. He wished to know what immediate use was to be made of the site to be acquired; and also whether the architect had completed the buildings he had commenced; and whether the new offices about to be erected formed part of the whole design?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought the suggestions of his hon. Friend (Mr. Goldney) deserved consideration. He was not wedded theoretically to the present system of land purchases, but it was necessary under the existing mode of keeping public accounts, which was approved of by men of great financial ability. So long as the custom prevailed at the Treasury of taking back those portions of the Votes not really expended up to the 31st March, he did not see how the system advocated by his hon. Friend could be carried into practical effect. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper's) Question, the Commission had been at work up to the other day, and the final Report would be in print in the course of a few days. It was proposed to devote the open space at the Foreign Office to the Colonial and Home Offices, and Mr. Scott had been appointed architect to them.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK recommended the noble Lord to purchase whatever land would be required by the Government at once, and not in dribblets.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £11,764, to complete the sum for Probate Court and Registries.

(3.) £23,000, to complete the sum for Public Record Repository.

(4.) £44,000, to complete the sum for National Gallery Enlargement.

MR. LAYARD said, of all the architectural blunders which had ever been committed in this country that connected with Burlington House was the most considerable. In order to preserve the house entire, a large space of ground had been sacrificed, and after all the building itself would be so altered as to retain few of its original features. The House of Commons having decided that the new National Gallery should be built on its present site, it had been determined that rooms for the Royal Academy, for the London University, and for the learned societies should be built at Burlington House, but instead of building them in one group under one architect, and having one design, three architects had been employed, and there were three designs. The London University was in a fair way of being finished. The Royal Academy was nearly completed, and he believed that the annual exhibition would be held there next year; but the building for the learned societies was not yet commenced. It was now found necessary, in order to reconcile Burlington House with the buildings around it, that it should be made into something else. It was to have another story, and at the bottom an arcade, a ridiculous and absurd thing, after so great a sacrifice had been made to keep the building

The Attorney General

Committee whether a new story was to be added to Burlington House.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said there had been no alteration in the plans exhibited last year, which included the erection of an additional story.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £22,000, to complete the sum for University of London, Buildings.

MR. LAYARD inquired whether there was any intention of opening Vigo Street for carriage traffic when the building was completed? The thoroughfare was very much blocked up at present.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that all street improvements had been handed over to the local authorities by Act of Parliament.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE objected to public buildings being erected in situations which had no approaches to them. He disapproved altogether of leaving the question of approaches in the hands of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

MR. M. CHAMBERS also complained of the difficulty there would be of getting to the new buildings, and suggested that the different bodies interested should come to some arrangement for providing greater facilities of access.

MR. COWPER said, he could not allow the Committee to entertain the idea that the University of London would be placed in an inaccessible position. The fact was it was in one of the best positions to be found in London. It was not in a thoroughfare where carriages were continually passing and making noise; but that was so much the better. The way to get to it from Regent Street would be through New Burlington Street. With respect to Vigo Street, it was so narrow that scarcely any advantage would be gained by opening it. If this was a matter which concerned the general traffic of the metropolis, the making of new approaches devolved upon the Metropolitan Board of Works and the parishes, and not upon the Government.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that all the carriages coming either to the Royal Academy or the learned societies would approach through Piccadilly. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the London University did not require the same kind of access as other public buildings. In all the communications which he had had with the authorities of the London

Sir George Bowyer

University since the site was selected they had never suggested that additional means of access were required.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN remarked, that the University of London had had a Member given to it, and there might be a contested election.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £8,000, to complete the sum for Chapter House, Westminster.

MR. DILLWYN said, he wished to know what use would be made of this Chapter House for which so much money was wanted?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the building when restored would be used as a Chapter House.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK inquired, whether any public benefit whatever would be derived from this outlay, or was the money to be expended solely for the advantage of the Dean and Chapter? He had been told that this restoration would be a very elaborate thing, and he hoped the noble Lord would be able to explain what it was for. It was all very well to put their hands into their own pockets to gratify a peculiar taste; but it was a serious matter to put their hands deeply into the public purse for the purpose of decorating a fancy place like that at the cost of the nation.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that some years ago, before either the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Alderman Lusk) or himself had come into Parliament, there had been a good deal of discussion on this subject, and it had been determined to vote £25,000 for restoring the Chapter House as a work of art. The present Vote was the annual instalment of that sum. That being so, he did not think it competent for hon. Members to enter on the subject now.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN corroborated this statement.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £25,400, to complete the sum for New Palace at Westminster, Acquisition of Land.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that this land was to be acquired for the purpose of making a decorative garden at the end of the Palace. He hoped that the freeholds would be purchased, as tenancy would be objectionable. But as this might be termed a fancy Vote, he hoped the Government would give directions that the rest of the land should be acquired as the interests fell in very gradually.

But if it could not be preserved in its integrity it had better not be preserved at all.

MR. DENMAN said, he had very often passed an evening listening to discussions of this kind, though he had not taken part in them. He hoped that the noble Lord would be guided in the matter by considerations of economy, which did not seem to be much regarded by persons of æsthetic tastes. This very night it had been recommended that St. Margaret's Church should be pulled down; but it seemed to him that it would be an act of reckless extravagance to incur the expense of destroying that building merely because its appearance offended a few extremely fastidious eyes. With regard to Burlington House it would be extravagant to preserve it on æsthetic grounds alone and still more extravagant to tinker it. If, in either case, it was not fit for the purpose for which it was intended; if it should be found not worth retaining, he hoped that it would not be preserved merely from a regard for its reputation as a specimen of classical architecture; but, if well suited for the object desired, he did not see why it should be pulled down.

MR. BENTINCK said his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Denman) misrepresented him, because if there was one thing against which he continually protested, it was expenditure on æsthetic grounds.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the main suggestion which had been made in the discussion would be fatal to the whole scheme and absolutely impracticable. If he had the least idea that Burlington House would have been brought into the discussion he would have had all the plans and elevations brought down, in order that hon. Members might see what had been proposed and sanctioned last year. Before the Government took any Vote upon it they clearly explained what they proposed to do. As far as the Royal Academy was concerned, what was proposed was that they should at their own expense build rooms in the rear of Burlington House. The Academy had executed their part of the contract, and the buildings were nearly completed; and they would shortly enter into possession of Burlington House and the ground behind under a lease for a long term of years. The Royal Academy had undertaken to re-model Burlington House according to the plans exhibited in the Library last Session. As soon as the Royal Society could make way for the Academy, the latter would take possession. No money was being spent on Burlington House itself by the Government. The Committee were not asked to vote a single sixpence for that purpose. All the Government had undertaken to do was to build on the sides of Burlington House accommodation for the learned societies. There would be a fine archway in front, through which Burlington House would be seen from Piccadilly.

MR. AYRTON asked whether the Moorish brick buildings would be covered by the buildings proposed to be erected?

LORD JOHN MANNERS replied that when the new buildings were erected the brick buildings of which the hon. Member complained would be hidden.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £23,905, to complete the sum for Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland.

MR. DILLWYN complained that the sum asked was in excess of the Estimate. The original Estimate having been £103,000, £118,000 had been voted already, and £25,000 was wanted this year.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the Estimate had certainly been exceeded, but the Government had a strict eye on these works with a view to keeping down expenditure. The charge was undertaken because half the cost of County Courts in England is borne by the Consolidated Fund.

COLONEL FRENCH asked why Scotland should receive one-half the costs of these Courts, while Ireland pays the whole cost of analogous Courts?

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN hoped "the act of justice to Scotland" would be emulated in reference to Ireland.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH did not intend to represent the Vote as an "act of justice to Scotland."

Vote agreed to

(10.) £31,252, to complete the sum for Rates for Government Property.

(11.) £77,470, to complete the sum for Post Office and Inland Revenue Buildings.

(12.) £10,000, New Home and Colonial Offices.

(13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £20,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, of a Grant in aid of the New Buildings for the University of Glasgow."

MR. CRAUFURD said, that the proposal was in strict accordance with the principle upon which the Education Grant was distributed throughout the country—namely, in the encouragement of local subscriptions. In this case, munificent subscriptions had been raised in the city of Glasgow itself, and to reject the Vote would have very much the aspect of a breach of faith.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(14.) £3,200, to complete the sum for the Wellington Monument.

MR. LAYARD asked for explanations. He did not wish to say a word against Mr. Stephens, whom he believed to be a man of considerable talent; but it was plain, from the number of years that had passed, and from the amount voted in excess of the original Estimate, that there must have been considerable laxity when the contract was originally entered into. The original Estimate was £14,000; £22,800 had been voted, part of which, however, had not been spent.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was happy to be able to return a satisfactory answer to the question. Mr. Stephens was making very rapid progress with the completion of the work, and hoped in a short time to commence the necessary preparations in St. Paul's.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £1,000, to complete the sum for the Palmerston Monument.

MR. BENTINCK expressed a desire for information. What was to be the nature of the monument, and who was to be the sculptor? When they saw the lamentable memorials erected to the memory of such men as Mr. Cobden, Sir George Cornwall Lewis, Mr. Thackeray, and others, they could not help feeling uneasy as to the character of any proposed additions. Westminster Abbey was chokefull already; and the question really was, whether it would not be better to remove to a different site the memorials of all who were not actually buried within the Abbey precincts?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the House, upon the occasion of the lamented death of Lord Palmerston, gave expression, in a practical manner, to its desire that some fitting memorial of that statesman should be erected. No portion of the money then voted had been expended; and, accordingly, it became necessary to re-vote the amount this year. The artist selected was Mr. Jackson.

MR. LAYARD asked the noble Lord, having regard to the number of failures which had taken place in our public statues, to give an undertaking that a cast should be erected in Westminster Abbey before the statue itself was executed.

Vote agreed to.

(16.) £133,259, to complete the sum for the Public Buildings, Ireland.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said he had last year called attention to an item of £500 for "catching rats, inspecting fire-engines, and sweeping chimneys." This year the rats had disappeared, and all these items were put down under the head of "Miscellaneous Expenditure." He objected to this method of keeping accounts, as deceptive, and unworthy of a great Government.

MR. G. MORRIS, referring to the portion of the Vote applicable to Coastguard stations in Ireland, hoped that some improvement would be effected in these dwellings, the condition of which, in many instances upon the West coast of Ireland, was really disgraceful.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said that a larger portion of this Vote would be applied to the purpose referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. G. MORRIS said, what he complained of was, that no portion of it seemed to be intended for the Coastguard stations in the West of Ireland.

Vote agreed to.

(17.) £6,000, to complete the sum for the Queen's University, Ireland.

(18.) £4,300, to complete the sum for the Ulster Canal.

In reply to Colonel FRENCH,

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the Ulster Canal had come into the possession of the Government in consequence of those interested in the Canal having failed to pay interest on the sums advanced to them by the Government. He regretted to say that the attempt to induce the Canal Company to complete the canal works had been so far unsuccessful.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN observed that the sum now asked for was only part of an amount which had been sanctioned by Act of Parliament.

Vote agreed to.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought the Government had taken the wisest course in withdrawing a Bill which they had no hope of carrying this Session, and he congratulated the Lord President on the personal relief which he must feel. The Lord President (the Duke of Marlborough) had admitted the justice of the suspicion expressed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) and by himself that the Bill presented to the House was only a portion of that which was originally drafted for consideration, and was in fact only a portion of a much larger measure of education which must sooner or later be taken into consideration, and his sound judgment must make him feel the inadequacy of the portion embodied in this Bill to meet the requirements of those interested in the extension of education. It would, moreover, have been a difficult task to defend the majority of the details in the Committee. There were, however, some clauses to which no objection had been made, and against which no Amendments had been threatened, but which; on the contrary, had been generally approved by nearly all who had taken part in the two previous debates. Such were the proposals respecting "evening schools," "secular schools," and "building grants." But at the same time very strong objections had been made to embodying minute regulations such as these in a Bill, instead of embodying them from time to time in Minutes to be then submitted to Parliament for their sanction. But, whether these objections were right or wrong, it would be very hard, now the Government had withdrawn their Bill, that the promoters of schools should be deprived of the advantages which they would enjoy if, in accordance with the ordinary practice, these proposals had already been embodied in Minutes. He wished to know what course the Lord President meant to pursue on this point. There was also another question of greater importance. He was not going to inflict on the House the speech he might have made on moving his Amendment on the Conscience Clause; but he wished to point out the difficulty in which the Government were placed, and the only way in which he thought they could advantageously meet it. The principle of Conscience Clauses had been adopted by the Committee of Council ever since 1846; but it was the late Lord Salisbury and Mr. Adderley who first had the credit of practically applying it to a certain number of Church schools.

The Duke of Marlborough

They in certain cases refused to make Grants to schools unless the promoters agreed to insert in the trust deeds one of two Conscience Clauses. The same system was followed during the Governments of Lords Palmerston and Russell; and he believed, but was not sure, that no deviation had been made from it by either of the noble Dukes who since had presided over the Council. An important step, however, had been lately taken; the Bill which had been introduced by the Government contained a Conscience Clause, and the Bill was supported by the Archbishop of Canterbury chiefly because it contained that clause. Some of his (Earl Granville's) Friends had desired to divide against the Bill; but he ventured to dissuade them from doing so on its second reading, partly because it was not inconsistent with a much larger measure, but chiefly because it established the principle of applying a Conscience Clause to some Church schools. His Friends yielded to that argument, and no one objected to the construction he had put on it. That Vote, in his opinion, was fatal to all the abstract objections to a Conscience Clause. He had looked over the famous Seventeen Reasons against a Conscience Clause that very morning, and he had found that Vote was absolutely fatal to them all. None of their Lordships could pretend now that there was a compact between the Executive and the Church which could not be broken, or that no clergyman could receive a Conscience Clause without detriment to his conscience, and that no Government or Parliament could impose such a burden on a clergyman. All that now remained was a question of degree and expediency, and not of principle. The Government had abandoned the Bill. What course did they now intend to pursue with respect to a Conscience Clause? The great difficulty he had felt in answering the objections of those hostile to a Conscience Clause was to explain why he had not procured Parliamentary sanction for it. When examined before the Committee of the House of Commons the following Question was put to him by the present Secretary of State for War (Sir John Pakington):—

"May I take the liberty of asking why, as the head of the Department, you did not in the case of the Conscience Clause, as in the case of other important changes in the practice of the Office, place the question before Parliament?"

He (Earl Granville) answered—

of Commons, would facilitate the passing of the Education Votes. If questioned it would give the Government the luxury of finding themselves in an enormous majority, and it would tend more than anything else to arrest the current which was beginning to flow against a denominational system—and consequently against the Church of England—in favour of a purely secular one.

LORD REDESDALE said, that, so far from the clause having been generally accepted, as the noble Earl had stated, the schools of the National Society and nearly all the Church schools in the country were exempted from its operation.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that the Endowed Schools Act, on which the noble Earl (Earl Granville) so much relied, did not, in point of fact, contain any Conscience Clause at all. It merely laid down the rule, and left the particular form of Conscience Clause to be afterwards adopted. A form had been prescribed by the Education Department; and the Government, after due consideration, had proposed another, which they thought would be an improvement, and which, after consultation with the heads of the Church, had been accepted by them, and by others who were unwilling to accept that now in use, and who were equally opposed to that supported by the noble Earl. As, however, it was not possible to obtain the assent of Parliament to it, there would be no deviation from the present practice, nor was it intended that there should be any deviation from the principles at present acted upon by the Education Department, without the direct sanction of the Legislature. As to the proposal of the noble Earl that the Government should lay on the table of either House a Minute embodying his views, he could only say that Her Majesty's Ministers had no such intention. He could only repeat the regret that Government felt that they had neither the opportunity nor the power of legislating during the present Session on the subject of education.

After a few words from the Earl of AIRLIE,

Order for the House to be put into Committee on Friday next, discharged.

Earl Granville

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS BILL.

(The Duke of Richmond.)

(No. 95.) REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Amendments made.

Clause 14 (Fares to be posted in Stations).

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved an Amendment compelling railway companies to print on each ticket the fare for the journey for which it was issued.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND declined to assent to the Amendment, which he regarded as unnecessary. This very clause afforded the public sufficient protection, inasmuch as it provided that a list of fares should be exhibited at the various railway stations. For his own part he very much doubted whether passengers were often cheated in purchasing their tickets.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY supported the Amendment. He thought, amongst other advantages, it would tend to facilitate the keeping their accounts.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY trusted that their Lordships would support the Government in their resistance to an Amendment which could afford no additional protection to the public, while it would entail a large extra expenditure on the railway companies. As their Lordships could easily understand, the tickets were struck off in large numbers, and, as the fares were continually being altered, with each change the tickets not issued would have to be destroyed. On one occasion the Great Northern Railway Company, having made an extensive alteration in their tariff, had to destroy no less than 1,000,000 tickets, which had become useless from this cause. The constant tendency of railway fares in this country was to become lower and lower, and therefore it would be detrimental to the public interest were their Lordships to discourage railway companies from altering their fares. Upon what ground did their Lordships propose to fix this expensive regulation upon commercial undertakings of this description? Could the noble Lord who proposed the Amendment (Lord Stanley of Alderley) adduce any evidence to show that the interest of the public had suffered from the absence of such a provision, which, in his humble opinion, was he required. He did not believe that the public would be at all benefited by the adoption of the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl; and therefore he should adhere to the clause as it stood in the Bill.

EARL GREY had no hesitation in saying that such a statement as he required might be given by any railway company in four or five pages. There was a very general belief that certain charges on goods were made low between particular districts to conciliate private persons who had interest on particular Boards of Directors. If that statement was unfounded, it would be easy to contradict it; and no parties were so much interested in having the facts well ascertained than the railway companies themselves. There could be no real difficulty in affording all the information he desired.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he must confirm the statement of his noble Friend. Such statements had been made to him repeatedly; and when the Queen's highway had been practically superseded, when railway companies monopolized the traffic, and were tending to coalition instead of competition, the public were deeply interested in having at least such protection as publicity with regard to charges could give.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY thought that, especially in Ireland, where traffic was undeveloped, and frequent changes in rates must be made, the re-printing of voluminous statements would be attended with great expense, and would be of no value whatever.

LORD COLVILLE desired to draw attention to a statement which had been drawn up by one of the most experienced managers of railways in the kingdom, Mr. Seymour Clarke, for the purpose of showing the enormous number of items which must be comprised in the book of rates required on the Great Western system. The number of rates between the various stations would be 500,000, and on the London and North-Western system, with 600 stations, they would be 10,000,000. Great expense would necessarily be incurred by the publication of such statements and their frequent alteration, and he did not see what advantage could be derived from it.

LORD BELPER said, that this proposition did not in any way interfere with the management of railways. Railway companies at present could, within certain limits, make what charges they liked for the carriage of goods, and it was of great importance that publicity should be given to their rates. The public depended on them for the carriage of goods, and all that was wanted was that the public should know what the charges were. Public opinion would then be brought to bear upon them. It was a subject of universal complaint that these charges were very irregular and unjust, favour been shown to particular parties. If such complaints were unfounded no parties would derive more benefit from their contradiction than railway directors themselves. If, on the other hand, the charges were true, the best mode of providing a remedy against such proceedings was by bringing public opinion to bear on them.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY suggested to meet the objection on the ground of expense, that instead of adopting the clause proposed by the noble Earl exactly as it stood, it would perhaps be as well to require the Companies to publish in the first place a standard book of rates and charges, and subsequently to print only such alterations as might from time to time be made.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that no confusion arose from the present practice, for persons who wished to send goods by a railway had only to go and ask the station-master what was the rate charged at the time. On the other hand, if a printed book of the rates of carriage were published the rates might be changed at the end of a week, and then the book would either be useless to or would mislead the persons who had bought it.

EARL GRANVILLE thought that the argument in favour of the greatest publicity possible being given to the rates of charge by railway companies very strong.

LORD REDESDALE was of opinion that the adoption of the clause would have a tendency to cause railway companies to raise the rates of charge instead of lowering them.

On Question? their Lordships divided:

to consume its own smoke, the terms of the Act had been complied with, and quashed the conviction. He thought that it was desirable to alter the existing law as little as possible. He therefore should prefer leaving the law as it was, making it incumbent upon a railway company to have all their engines so constructed as to consume their own smoke; and he proposed that where an engine was so constructed, but failed to consume its own smoke through the default of the driver or person using it, every person guilty of such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. In every case in which the engine had not been constructed to consume its own smoke proceedings might be taken against the company.

EARL GREY hoped the noble Duke would reconsider the decision arrived at. If the penalty were recoverable merely against the engineers and stokers, how were the persons complaining to discover the persons guilty of the offence? Cases had been brought under the notice of the noble Duke in which persons had been exposed to great inconvenience; and their houses rendered almost uninhabitable by the continuing nuisance of engines vomiting clouds of smoke. Few people liked to be put in the position of prosecutors; but one gentleman, who had taken up the question energetically, thereby made himself obnoxious to the engine-drivers, who inflicted upon him every petty annoyance they could, so that his house became almost uninhabitable. Railway companies had a remedy in their own hands, for they had the power of dismissing their own servants; whereas the only remedy which the public could have lay in making the company responsible. In London the penalties against engines which did not consume their own smoke had never been enforced, till the duty of enforcing them was placed in the hands of the police, and the odium thereby removed from private prosecutors. The clause of the noble Duke really did not strengthen the law as it now existed at all.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, that the law was plain enough, but what was really wanted were facilities for carrying the law into execution. At present railway companies could afford to run the risk of an information being laid against them because they knew that, practically, persons would not take the trouble to do so.

LORD REDESDALE also thought it would be better to transfer the penalty

from the driver to the railway company, who would then take care that their servants attended to the fires; and that the penalty might be advantageously increased from 40s. to £5. In other respects he approved the clause.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the reason for putting the penalty on the driver instead of the company, was that it was the driver's fault if the smoke was not prevented; and, moreover, directed against the driver himself would be more likely to frighten him than one directed against the company. Their Lordships; however, must not suppose that they could succeed in all cases in preventing this. While a train was in motion it was perfectly feasible to prevent smoke from being emitted; but by a higher law than the omnipotence of Parliament, locomotives stopping still, when the fire at the same time required to be replenished, could not be prevented from sending out a certain quantity of opaque smoke. The wording of the clause suggested by his noble Friend opposite (Earl Grey) was of Draconic stringency, for the penalty was to attach "every time that smoke was emitted," meaning, he supposed, every puff.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there was a defect in the Railway Clauses Act of 1845 which clearly was never contemplated at the time it passed. It provided that every locomotive should be constructed on the principle of consuming its own smoke; but it did not go on to say that it should consume its own smoke whenever practicable. It was very desirable that this defect should be remedied, and the clause proposed by the Government would do so. Inasmuch as there was a difficulty in ascertaining the name of the driver of an engine, it would be much better to make the railway company responsible to the public, leaving the company to arrange matters between themselves and their servants, which they no doubt could do satisfactorily. The noble and learned Lord then suggested a clause to the effect that where the engine failed to consume its own smoke through the default of a servant of the company, the company should be guilty of the offence under the clause in question in the Railway Clauses Act.

Clause, as amended agreed to, and added to the Bill.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved the insertion of the following clause after

IRELAND—RELIGION OF CONVICTS.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that a prisoner in Mountjoy Prison, who declared himself a Unitarian, was ordered by the Governor to select his religion as Anglican, Roman Catholic, or Presbyterian, and that on his declining to do so he was sentenced to penal cell, with bread and water diet?

THE EARL OF MAYO: Sir, I presume the question of the hon. Gentleman refers to the case of a convict named John Brophy alias Pagan O'Leary, who was received in the Mountjoy Convict Prison on the 31st of July, 1865. With respect to this man the Governor applied for instructions under the following remarkable circumstances—and I may say it is the only case of the kind which has ever occurred—The convict stated he was of no religion, and had never attended a place of worship. According to a Return from another gaol in which he had been confined, it appeared he had not attended any place of worship since his committal, and refused to be instructed in any religion. Under these circumstances the Director in a minute to the Governor ordered the convict Brophy to select his religion immediately. The Governor sent for Brophy and told him what was required of him; but the latter objected to go to any place of worship, saying he did not believe in any religion, and would not select one. He was therefore put upon penal diet for three days, and on the 4th of August, two days after he had been put upon the penal diet, he was received into the hospital, where he remained for five days. After he left the hospital he was again placed on penal diet for three days, and then he selected the Roman Catholic religion. The prisoner was then sent to his task work. I may say that penal diet is not bread and water, though it is considerably lower than is given to the other prisoners. Since my attention has been called to this case, I have caused inquiries to be made as to what is the practice in other branches of the convict service, and I shall be able to state at some future period what rule—for I certainly think that some sort of rule is necessary—shall be made to govern such cases in future.

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN CATTLE.

QUESTIONS.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the restrictions on the importation of Cattle from Spain and Portugal to the Ports of Liverpool and Southampton having been removed, those restrictions will be continued against such importation to the Port of Plymouth?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied, that the Order in Council passed on Saturday last had been so framed as to meet the case of the hon. and learned Member, and to include Plymouth in the privilege. He would explain the Order more fully in reply to the Question of which the hon. Member for Cashel had given Notice.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he wished to ask, Whether there is any reason why the privileges now conceded to Cattle imported from Normandy, Brittany, Spain, and Portugal should not also be conceded to Cattle imported into London from Ireland?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied, that Irish cattle were in every respect on the same footing as English cattle. English cattle had no privileges which Irish cattle did not enjoy. As to French and Spanish cattle no privileges had been extended to them which were not possessed by English and Irish cattle.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he wished to ask, Whether the restrictions on the importation of Cattle from Spain and Portugal to the Ports of Liverpool and Southampton having been removed, these restrictions will be continued against such importation to the Port of North Shields?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the Order in Council of Saturday last had been so framed that it applied to the whole line of coast from the North Foreland to the South and West round to the Mull of Cantire, including Glasgow. The reason of this was that towns on this coast had in former years drawn their foreign supplies only from Normandy, Brittany, Spain, or Portugal. The towns, on the other hand, to the north of the North Foreland had in former years drawn their supplies from Holland and the Baltic provinces. The French and Spanish trades were not natural to them. Besides, as they had no cattle ships which plied exclusively to Spain, they could not fulfill the required conditions or enter into the bond which

MR. NEWDEGATE was pointing out that the Committee, as nominated, did not include a single English county Member, and urging the propriety of selecting one from each side of the House, when—

MR. SPEAKER said, that although he had put the Motion as a whole, yet its parts would afterwards be put separately. The hon. Member could not canvass the composition of the Committee until it had been agreed that a Committee should be appointed, and the names were put severally from the Chair.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, it would be invidious to object to the names of Members when they were submitted, but he would propose that the Committee should consist of seven Members.

MR. BRIGHT: I desire that we may understand the precise meaning of the words—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the Boundaries of the following Boroughs, as laid down by the Boundary Commissioners, and to report what, if any, alteration should be made therein.”

I merely wish to understand that these words are not to fetter the Committee. Are they to consider the boundaries proposed by the Commissioners, and the old boundaries, and anything between the two; and will they be at liberty to recommend that any particular borough or boroughs may be postponed for future consideration? I wish to understand that the words are not to be held to deprive the Committee of free action as to what they think should be done in regard to any particular borough in this list.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied that the Committee would have the latitude pointed out in the first part of the Question. The only point on which he was disposed to differ from the hon. Member was as to the Report not being final. He did not think it was meant that the consideration of the case of any borough should be postponed to a future period.

MR. BRIGHT: I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means by its being a final Report. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that the House is to have no option afterwards but to adopt it? [MR. GATHORNE HARDY: No.] Of course if they shall recommend that any borough shall remain as it now is, that would be a postponement for an indefinite period, and the Committee would be at liberty to make that recommendation.

MR. HIBBERT asked, whether the Committee would have power to give effect to the recommendations of the Commissioners in regard to those places the boundaries of which they would have contracted if they had not been prohibited from restricting any boundaries. They said that these places presented anomalies which could not be rectified in any other way. Salisbury was on the list, but Wilton was not, and as the former could not be enlarged without contracting the latter, there would be a difficulty in dealing with them. Again, Rochester and Chatham, and other places named by the Commissioners, were not in the list at all. Would it not be convenient if these cases were brought before the Committee?

MR. LOCKE KING moved the omission of the words “as laid down by the Boundary Commissioners,” with the view of giving the Committee greater power of action.

SIR JOHN SIMEON seconded the Amendment, in order to insure that the Committee should have power to contract the limits of certain boroughs.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words “as laid down by the Boundary Commissioners.”—(Mr. Locke King.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN suggested whether it should not be competent for the Committee to receive applications from boroughs which were not included in the list?

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That all Petitions presented to the House relative to the said Boroughs be referred to the Committee, and that the Committee have power to receive and call for Maps, Memorials, Reports, Papers, and Records concerning the said Boroughs, and to confer with the Boundary Commissioners and those employed under them in their inquiries." — (Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. YORKE said, that no question of the contraction of boundaries ought to be entered into by the Committee; for if the Commissioners had obtained power to go into that question they would have had to inquire into the cases of a much larger number of boroughs than was proposed at present.

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY said, when the question was discussed before he was under the impression that it was intended to refer to the Committee only such petitions as had been presented to the House, and such memorials as had been laid before the Commissioners; but the proposal was now much wider, and therefore it would not be necessary to move the Amendment which he had put on the Paper. He wished, however, to ask what was intended to be included under the word "Papers?"

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he apprehended the noble Lord or any other hon. Member might send in a memorial if he thought proper, but it would be left to the discretion of the Committee to deal with the memorials as they might think best. If they thought a memorial improperly sent in they might object to enter into the case to which it related.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, he had received representations from many parties who wished to lay statements before the Committee.

MR. BRIGHT said, that in the latter part of the Motion it was proposed that the Committee should be able to confer with the Boundary Commissioners, and those who had been employed under them. He thought the boroughs concerned and their representatives would be at a disadvantage if those gentlemen were to come before the Committee and defend the recommendations they had made. They all knew how stoutly gentlemen were apt to stand up in support of their own opinions, and Assistant Commissioners were no exception to the rule. He did not think, therefore, that it would be advisable to bring all the memorials and all the Assistant Commissioners before the Committee if no one else was allowed to be heard. Perhaps the House would think it desirable that the Committee should have power to confer with the Members for the boroughs affected, who might be able to give as good reasons for their views as the Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would suggest, in order to meet the views of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), that these words should be added—"And to take further evidence if to them it shall seem fit."

MR. NEATE said, it would occasion great disappointment and failure if the public were not to have a locus standi for the purpose of bringing before the Committee the case of any borough they might think necessary, as the Committee were to proceed in the matter upon the principle of private Bill legislation.

MR. DISRAELI said, the Committee were not bound to confer with the Commissioners or the Assistant Commissioners, but it was a power which was reserved to them if they wished to exercise it. And with regard to conferring with Members of the House, Committees had always that power, and were very willing to exercise it. Therefore to insert the words suggested would not be necessary.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he objected to the Committee conferring with the Commissioners and the Assistant Commissioners. He did not attribute the mistakes and errors which had occurred to the Commissioners themselves, but to the Assistant Commissioners, and unless hon. Members had an opportunity of answering them they would labour under a great disadvantage. So far as regarded Portsmouth, the Commissioners had decided contrary to the evidence. He had another objection to the course which had been pursued, and contended that the Prime Minister had no right to refuse to place the evidence before the House, for it was the property of the House and not of the Government. He suggested that one Member for each borough should have the opportunity of attending before the Committee and offering such explanations as he might consider necessary.

MR. MONK said, he would move, in accordance with the suggestion of the hon.

was quite immaterial whether they represented boroughs or counties. It seemed to him that five was a reasonable number, and that the Committee, consisting as it would do of Members of as great experience and as great knowledge as had for a long time sat in that House, was a very fair one, and he hoped the House would support the Government in restricting the number to five.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 29.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BAXTER, in rising to move "That it be an Instruction to the Committee instead of adding to the numbers of the that, House, they have power to disfranchise Boroughs in England having, by the Census Returns of 1861, less than 5,000 inhabitants," said, he should endeavour to state, as succinctly as he possibly could, his reasons for having taken this course. Her Majesty's Government proposed to provide for the necessary increase in the number of Members for Scotland by an addition to the number of Members of that House. His proposal, on the contrary, was that they should, instead of doing so, disfranchise the boroughs in England having at the last Census a population of less than 5,000. That proposition would not, he thought, require or justify an elaborate argument. He had to show, in the first place, that there were certain increasing constituencies in the northern part of this island requiring additional representation, which was not provided for in the Bill of last year. He had got to show that the proposal of the Government with reference to the increased representation of such places was not one that ought to be adopted, and he had also got to show that the scheme laid down in the Instruction he now moved was the best solution of the difficulty. He wished at the outset, however, to disclaim anything like a partizan or factious spirit in bringing forward this Motion. He, and he alone, was responsible for it. He informed his constituents last October of his intention to bring it forward, and though glad to find so strong a feeling on that side of the House in its favour, he would under any circumstances have proceeded with it. So far, indeed, from being actuated by party motives, he had to complain of the conduct of both parties in relation to the question, and he held both parties accountable for the present embarrassment. Government after Government—Liberal as well as Conservative—instead of treating this as a united Empire, had insisted on dealing with the three kingdoms in separate Bills, thus rendering it impossible to take a general survey of them for the purposes of re-distribution. When, in 1859, the present First Lord of the Treasury introduced a Reform Bill, he moved an Amendment condemnatory of that mode of procedure, though it was not thought desirable to press it to a division; and his hon. Friend (Mr. Bright), when some years ago he framed a scheme of re-distribution, proceeded on the principle of dealing with the United Kingdom as a whole. He had no desire to impede the passing of the present Bill, and he gave the Government credit for having adopted the course which they thought would be most satisfactory to the majority of the House. They were well aware of the existence both of Scylla and Charybdis in the course which lay before them; but in their desire to steer clear of the rock they had rushed into the greater dangers of the whirlpool. There might be a few Members who objected to a transfer of seats from one portion of the United Kingdom to another; but he believed a much larger body objected under any circumstances to adding to the numbers of the House. Both sides of the House and successive Governments had admitted the claim of Scotland to increased representation, and it would be a waste of time to quote any elaborate statistics in support of it. At the time of the passing of the Act of Union in 1707 and of the Reform Act in 1832, the proportion of Members allotted to Scotland was based on population and revenue. If that principle were insisted upon, Scotland would now require not ten as proposed in his Instruction, but twenty-five additional representatives. This might appear an extravagant assertion to those unacquainted with the advance Scotland had made, especially in wealth, during the last half-century, but Returns that had been laid on the table showed that whereas in 1710—three years after the date of the seats, to take Members from Scotland and give them to England, and, perhaps, to Ireland. He now asked the House to do what ought to have been done last year, in order to render the measure of the Government more complete. There happened to be ten places which he could scarcely dignify by the name of boroughs, but which were in fact small decayed villages, each of which returned one Member. The population of these places was in each case less than 5,000. The population of the ten boroughs was in the aggregate 39,704, the average being less than 4,000. The total number of electors in the ten boroughs was 2,874. Eight of these ten had greatly decreased in population during the last five years, and they were all situated in counties which were over-represented, and the Boundary Commission in their Report to the House say that it is almost impossible that under any circumstances they should ever increase in population. He would ask hon. Members whether it was not certain that if the present House of Commons refrained from disfranchising these boroughs it would be the first act of the new Parliament to disfranchise them in order to prevent the scandal of places that were merely hamlets returning representatives to Parliament. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley) proposed to amend the Instruction by taking a second Member from English boroughs having populations of between 10,000 to 12,000. He should approve such a proposition standing by itself, but, under the circumstances, he preferred his own scheme. Every one of these boroughs had, however, increased in population since 1831, the increase having been 32,000, equal to the total population of the ten boroughs which he (Mr. Baxter) proposed to disfranchise. If, moreover, they adopted the proposal of the hon. Baronet they would get into a difficulty with the Boundary Commissioners, because they proposed to extend the boundaries of those boroughs. He had only heard two objections to his scheme. The first was that it was totally contrary to the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government—namely, that no place should be totally disfranchised. But the allegation was incorrect, because, whatever might have been said last year, the Government this Session proposed to disfranchise six boroughs in Ireland, and he thought they had done perfectly right. These questions, however, of re-distribution and registration were not matters of principle at all but of detail. The second objection was that a similar proposal, when made by the hon. and learned Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee) last Session, had been rejected by the House. That proposal, however, was at that time a mere theoretical scheme of re-distribution, and it was not proposed to allot these seats in any particular way. The same objection might, in fact, be urged against the Amendment of the hon. Baronet, because the House had rejected a Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) which hit four of these boroughs. He would only repeat that he had brought forward this Instruction on his own responsibility and on constitutional principles. He thought he had made out a good case, and he appealed with confidence to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government and to the wisdom and justice of the House to affirm his Resolution.

MR. WHITBREAD, in seconding the Resolution, said, that of all the propositions which the present Government had made in regard to the Reform question not one had been more condemned both in and out of the House than that of adding to the number of Members of the House of Commons. The only excuse he had heard for that proposal was that it was a mere temporary measure, that some boroughs would be sure to be disfranchised for corruption by-and-by, and that Parliament need not enfranchise any other place until they reverted to the original number. But, did anyone suppose that when one borough was disfranchised for corrupt practices there would not be plenty of large growing towns coming forward as claimants for the vacant representation? Where was the increase to end? The Government had fixed upon the number of seven additional representatives for Scotland, but they said also that they were ready to add eight or ten or even any larger number. One thing was certain, that an addition of seven to the representatives to Scotland by increasing the number of the House would not be accepted as a settlement of this question. In point of wealth and numbers Scotland was entitled to twenty-five additional Members. It was one thing to take seven Members from England and give them to Scotland, and another to increase the number of Members of that House by seven. The concession in the latter case to Scotland on one occasion when he endeavoured to make the House take that view, the most eloquent defender of the small boroughs was the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone)—

“Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong, Everything by starts, and nothing long.”

As a Conservative anxious to put a stop to further agitation, he (Sir Rainald Knightley) was prepared to vote in the direction he had indicated. The object at which he had always aimed was to obtain more Members for the counties, which were most inadequately represented. Take the case of Tiverton, the population of which was just over 10,000, and which possessed twice as much representation as the whole county of Lanarkshire with 631,000. He was not a Revolutionist, and did not want to portion out the country into electoral districts; but, so long as these anomalies existed, he was convinced there would be cause for agitation. He now wanted the House to decide between two different schemes. The question was, whether it was advisable to totally disfranchise those ten small boroughs, for no fault of their own, while two Members were to be left to such little places as Tiverton, or such nasty corrupt little boroughs as Barnstaple and Bridgewater? He had spoken as if some concession ought to be made to Scotland; but he did not think that they ought so to apply the principle which he advocated as to give to Scotland all the seats that might become vacant. The question arose, whether some of these seats ought not to be given to England or to Ireland? The Government of Earl Russell, as well as the present Government, was prepared to give additional Members to Scotland; but the opinion of the House of Commons had never been directly tested upon this point. At present, however, all the House had to do was to determine whether it would accept or reject the proposal of the Government as regards the increase of the number of Members of the House. For his own part, he objected to it; and his objection was not merely confined to the great inconvenience which hon. Gentlemen would suffer in the small, dark, narrow, dreary, and detestable barn in which they sat. In his opinion they were already far too large a body to carry on the business of the country in a satisfactory manner. But it was said that the addition of twelve Members or so could not much matter. In his judgment, however, it would matter a great deal if an irrevocable step were taken in a wrong direction. As was said in the French proverb having reference to a lady whose virtue was supposed to be wavering—“Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coute.” If the House adopted the principle of giving away without receiving back, and of increasing the number of Members whenever fresh claims were put forward, he did not know when it would be possible to stop. Scotland candidly avowed that she only accepted this concession as an instalment, and a claim for forty additional Members had been set up for Ireland. He confessed that a cold shiver came over him when he reflected on the number of Members which ought on the principle to be given to the metropolis. And if it were asserted that the case of the metropolis was exceptional, and should be treated differently from the rest of the Empire, why should not the representation of Lancashire and Yorkshire be enormously increased? These were important matters, and might involve a change in the whole character of the House of Commons. Hitherto a seat in Parliament had been regarded as a distinction and eagerly sought for by persons of high rank and great wealth; but would that be so in the event of the number of Members being largely increased? Recent legislation had already done much to deter persons from seeking a seat in that House, for it must be admitted that canvassing the “residuum” was not a very agreeable occupation. Having mentioned the word “residuum,” he would venture to ask the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) what it really meant? Of course, its original meaning was “that which is left;” but did the hon. Member mean that the “residuum” formed the dregs or the scum of the population? He was thinking that the new electors in the borough of Birmingham might be very anxious to know what the hon. Gentleman really meant when he used that word. They would thoroughly appreciate the name either of “scum” or “dregs.” Only imagine what would have been said if his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) had made use of such expressions. He was remarking, however, that canvassing the “residuum,” either by pandering to their passions or by purchasing their votes, could not in any case be a very agreeable occupation; and things at once common and unclean were not usually sought after. He had made these few remarks in no unfriendly spirit to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. He did venture to say that there was much force in the historical argument which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government last year used against the disfranchisement of any single borough. Many of the places which were represented by two Members in this House were really inferior in importance to some which had only one representative. To deprive any place of the privilege which it had long enjoyed of returning Members to this House, and which it had not abused, might be fairly considered a hardship. But he saw nothing unjust or harsh in reducing certain small towns in England to the Parliamentary condition which was at present enjoyed or suffered by other towns of greater population and importance both in England and Scotland. He begged to second the Amendment of his hon. Friend, which he hoped would be supported by all the hon. Members for Scotland.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "power" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "to take one seat from Boroughs in England returning two Members, and having, by the Census returns of 1861, less than 12,000 inhabitants,"—

—instead thereof.

MR. CHILDERS said, the question before the House was one of a simple character, and that might be dealt with without any delay; but as his constituents were interested in the matter, perhaps he might be allowed to say a few words upon it. There was now no question that the number of Members of the House was not to be increased, and one of the two propositions before the House must be adopted. In respect of principle, there was nothing to decide; because, though the Head of the Government last year, in his speech at Edinburgh, said that no place ought to be disfranchised, the right hon. Gentleman had distinctly abandoned that principle in the Irish Reform Bill. In addition to the reasons given by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), he would state some reasons why the Motion of the hon. Member should be supported in preference to that of the hon. Baronet (Sir Rainald Knightley). For instance, a very large proportion of the boroughs with less than 5,000 inhabitants, were boroughs with a very large area indeed of land, as compared with their population. It appeared from the Returns of the Boundary Commissioners, that some of these places had two acres of land to one inhabitant, and in one instance there were nearly three acres of land to one inhabitant, so that they could hardly be called boroughs at all. Thus in Ashburton there were 3,062 persons to 6,966 acres, and in Northallerton 4,755 inhabitants to 10,380 acres. There was no such case among the boroughs of between 10,000 and 12,000 inhabitants. Again, it was proposed to diminish the number of Members for England, in order to make up the number for Scotland to something more in proportion to its population and wealth; but upon that basis it was desirable to see that the Members were taken from those places which were over-represented, and not from those places which were under-represented. Now, all the boroughs with less than 5,000 inhabitants were in counties which were already considerably over-represented, and which would be still over-represented when the Members were taken away from these small boroughs. The boroughs of Ashburton, Dartmouth, and Honiton were in Devonshire, which under the Act of 1867 would return one Member for every 29,000 inhabitants, and would still, after the three Members had been taken away, return one for every 34,000, while the proportion for the whole of England would be one representative for 41,000 persons. Lyme Regis was in Dorsetshire, which returned by the Act of 1867 one Member for every 17,000 inhabitants, and would still return, after one Member had been taken away, one for every 19,000, or more than double the number to which it is entitled in proportion to the representation all over the country. Thetford was in Norfolk, which, excluding Great Yarmouth from both sides of the calculation, would, by the new Reform Act, return one Member for 36,000 inhabitants, and would still return one for 40,000. Wells was in Somersetshire, which returned one Member for every 30,000 inhabitants, and would still return one for every 33,000. Arundel was in Sussex, which now returned one representative for every 23,000 inhabitants, and would still return one for every 25,000. Marlborough was in Wiltshire, which returned one Member for every 16,000, and would still return one for every 18,000. Evesham was in Worcestershire, which returned one Member for every 28,000, and would still return one for every 31,000. The North Riding, in which Northallerton was situated, returned one Member for every 25,000, and would still return one for every 29,000. What England than in Scotland to which those Members might be given? In that case it would be only fair to give them to English boroughs; but even then you originated a most inconvenient course of proceeding, for if the House were to re-open the Reform measure of last year upon this question where would legislation stop? Were they to have a Reform Bill every year? There was another inconvenience; for while applications came for additional representation from English and Welsh towns, there was actually on the Paper a Motion by a Member of the Emerald Isle to the effect that Ireland was inadequately represented, and required any Members which England might have to spare. The measure of last year had been called a "leap in the dark." Were they prepared to go further in the same direction? If you disfranchised these small boroughs you went a long way towards establishing electoral districts. Was the country prepared for that? He was not for taking away Members from any boroughs, believing that by the existing system you represented a greater diffusion of interests than would otherwise be possible. At the same time he preferred the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Rainald Knightley) to that of the hon. Member (Mr. Baxter), and should support the former. His votes and those of his predecessors in the representation of Arundel had always been given on the Liberal side, and he was not now going so to stultify those votes as to die, if he must die, without appealing to the House to pause and consider whether the day was yet come for his execution.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am glad to see that there is one point upon which the House seems now to be agreed—namely, that the representation of Scotland should be increased. At other times and in other Sessions I have heard controversies upon this subject; but on both sides it is now agreed that an increased representation of Scotland is desirable. Well, then, the whole question that now arises is how that increase is to be effected. There are some who are against entirely abolishing the representation of boroughs. They think it is wise that the representation should be distributed generally over the country; they think that if you merely represent numbers and property, located in places particularly flourishing, you may occasion a great monotony of representation, and that the varied interests which exist in an ancient country like this will not be adequately represented. To avoid the evils of dealing recklessly and ruthlessly with the ancient distributed representation of the country, Her Majesty's Government last year proposed that we should give this increased representation to Scotland by increasing the numbers of this House. That proposition, avoiding many of the objections urged against the other plan, and combined, as it was, with very extensive changes in the then existing representation, appeared one which might have been recommended successfully to the adoption of the House. I confess that I have never yet heard any argument against the proposal. Prejudices may exist, prejudices may be expressed, but hitherto no observations have been made which can for a moment be considered as sound arguments. The numbers of this House have been often increased, and the House after each increase has been more effective as a representative and legislative body. It has been considerably increased—far beyond what we proposed—twice in this very century, and on both occasions the House has increased in legitimate influence and legislative effect. I cannot, therefore, understand, so far as experience can guide us, that there are any sound objections on this ground to an increase of our Members. Then there is another class of observations—for I cannot call them arguments—made by Gentlemen who say that the House is too large at present. But is the House too large at present? I am not of that opinion. It is very easy to say that 600 or 700 men form too large a number for a deliberative Assembly; but what do you mean by a deliberative Assembly? This House is, as all assemblies which have legislative powers must be, deliberative in its character; but it has qualities and functions which go beyond that. It is essentially a representative Assembly; in a country with such a variety of interests, and interests so large to represent, it must and ought to be a popular Assembly; and it can never be a popular Assembly if it is to be limited in its numbers, and to ape the character of a Senate, instead of being what I trust it always will be—a House of Commons. It is said that when the ordinary business of the country is to be transacted Members do not appear, and that it is only on occasions of great interest that the Members are really assembled. Well, that is very natural, and is in perfect consonance with the feelings of the country. The ordinary business of the House is Friend the Member for Northamptonshire, secures any particular number of Members for Scotland. It may be open to the House afterwards to consider what proportion of seats Scotland is to obtain. It would be more satisfactory, however, if we had clearer views before us of what is to be done. I think we shall arrive at a better conclusion if we follow the plan indicated by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. With these general views, and trusting there will be no great delay, I shall give my support to the proposition of the hon. Baronet.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has very frankly placed this question upon a footing upon which at any rate it is easy for us all to approach it; but that only enhances our obligation to endeavour to give a decision according to the merits of the case. The right hon. Gentleman began by observing very justly that we were all now agreed that in some way or other the claim of Scotland must be satisfied. I must, however, congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the progress that he has made in this respect; because last year he in this House treated the claim of Scotland as a claim only to be recognized provided the House was willing to increase its own numbers; and upon a memorable occasion in the North he repeated the same declaration. But the force of facts, and the evident justice of the claim of Scotland, have placed this matter beyond dispute in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. And he has also made another great advance, because, although the right hon. Gentleman not unnaturally made an ingenious argument in favour of increasing the numbers of the House, he ended very fairly by admitting that the opinion of the House was adverse to him, and therefore he would consider that question also as settled. That is another step achieved. The claim of Scotland is to be satisfied, and it is to be satisfied otherwise than by an addition to the aggregate numbers of this House. I do not say one word upon the subject of the aggregate numbers—although I certainly differ very strongly from the right hon. Gentleman—simply because that is not a question that is practically before the House. The right hon. Gentleman expressed in mild terms, involving nothing unfair or inequitable, his preference for the Motion made by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley) rather than that of my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr.

Mr. Disraeli

Baxter). Let us consider the grounds of that preference. He says—"Twice the House of Commons last year decided not to disfranchise any place." I think he is in error in that assertion. Once, undoubtedly, the House came to that decision; but the question was not ruled by the House that it would not disfranchise under any circumstances whatever; it was ruled upon the ground that, under the circumstances in which we then stood, we did not think it necessary. I was one of those who did; but the majority did not think it necessary to give that large extension which was proposed to the scheme of re-distribution upon which we had entered. That really was the ground upon which the House then decided, and not the ground of the sacredness of these insignificant boroughs. There is not only no double authority, there is not even a single authority, in favour of any such principle as that wherever representation exists there it is to be maintained. While I was listening to the excellent speech of my noble Friend the Member for Arundel (Lord Edward Howard), I felt the advantage which we derived from having in the House men such as he; but I felt also that the constituency which he has at his back does not add one atom to the weight of the opinions he gives in this House. The truth is, that the towns to which the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) refers are not real towns. Now, whether we have a borough or a county constituency, it is time that we should have a real constituency. It is desirable that every man who speaks in this House—as my noble Friend does, with so much good sense and so much good feeling—should be backed and seconded by the consciousness that he represents some appreciable part of the public opinion of the country. I think the right hon. Gentleman did not hear or did not pay attention to—he certainly did not advert to—the short but very pregnant speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). That speech was appreciated by the House, and made an impression upon it. It was not delivered in support of this interest or that, but was founded upon the principle that equable division—some approach to equable division—is a thing desirable in your representation; and then when you are making a change you ought to make it in the direction of equable division. Abstract equality, exact mathematical equality, we do not ask; but my hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) showed of their peculiar value, and those boroughs ought no longer therefore to have an undue share in the representation.

MR. M'LAREN said, he believed the proposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Northamptonshire would on the whole work best. The very small boroughs would certainly be disfranchised on a much more extensive scale at no distant date.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS, who rose amidst loud calls for a division, regretted that, although he had risen on no less than six occasions at an earlier stage of the debate, and at a time when the House was less impatient, he had not been fortunate enough to catch the Speaker's eye. He promised, however, to be very brief if permitted to address the House. He had the honour to represent one of the oldest boroughs in the kingdom, which had returned Members to Parliament almost from time immemorial; and he should consider himself guilty of a gross dereliction of duty to his constituency if he gave a silent vote on this all-important occasion. He altogether objected to any infringement of the English Act of last Session. It had been settled by the Legislature, and generally approved by the country; and it was most unfair and impolitic to attempt by any political jugglery, and by a side-wind, to re-open a question which, by general consent so often expressed in debate last year, was to continue undisturbed on our statute books for at least a quarter of a century. Was it then fair that it should be broken in upon merely to serve the purpose of carrying out the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire? who, not satisfied with having opposed the Reform Bill most strenuously, and even factiously, at every stage of its progress last year, was now endeavouring, by the aid of his party, to make it imperative upon the Government to abandon their measures of Parliamentary Reform altogether, in order that he (Mr. Gladstone) might drive the Prime Minister from Office and pluck the laurels from the brow of one who, for his political services on the question of Reform alone—independent of other considerations—is so justly entitled to the everlasting gratitude of his fellow-countrymen. As the borough he represented was placed by his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire on the condemned list to lose one representative, he must say the case is one of peculiar hardship on several grounds. For historical antiquity it was one of the most ancient boroughs in the kingdom, returning two Members to Parliament from time immemorial. It had increased very materially within the present century, and especially since the Census of 1861; a large number of houses had been built, and the town did not depend for its prosperity on visitors, or any very extensive manufactories. It was the great agricultural centre and emporium of the corn trade in the East Riding. As the House well knew, Hull and Beverley were the only two boroughs in that division of Yorkshire which returned an aggregate of six Members for a population of 240,359—being at the rate of one representative for each 40,000 persons, as stated by the hon. Member for Pontefract. It was a very hard case that an endeavour should now be made partially to disfranchise a borough so distinguished as the county town—the capital of the East Riding of Yorkshire. It was his intention to vote against the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire, as well as the Instruction of the hon. Member for Montrose. He (Sir Henry Edwards) voted last year in the majority against a similar proposal by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, which was then defeated by a majority of 52 in a very large House; and he had no intention now of stultifying the vote he gave on that occasion by adopting a different course. He had presented a petition that day, very numerously signed by his constituents, against the partial disfranchisement contemplated by the Member for Northamptonshire, which he heartily endorsed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had only risen to point out that there was a great distinction between the two proposals. If they adopted the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), the effect would be that they would disfranchise a great number of persons in boroughs which they pledged themselves to maintain last year. The borough of Thetford, for example, was deprived of one of its Members, but it received an assurance that its 800 electors would continue to return one representative. The Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose would disfranchise 700 of these electors, while on the other hand the Amendment of the hon. Baronet would not disfranchise any portion of the electors, but only diminish the weight of the voters in returning Members to that House.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. M'LAREN said, he rose to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice. He thought it right to bring this question forward, notwithstanding the division which had just taken place, because it was in no sense a division in which Scotland was more mixed up than was Ireland. The question which had been just decided was not a party question, and he repudiated the idea that he brought this Motion before the House in any party spirit. He would be brief in stating his views to the House. It had been thrown out in the course of the debate that, even if the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) were carried, it did not follow that the Members thus obtained should be given to Scotland. Now, what he undertook to show was this—that even if the ten Members now at the disposal of the House were given to Scotland without qualification or limitation, they would be far too few to meet the just claims of Scotland. It had been proved a short time since by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) that one class of English constituencies had, on an average, a Member for 36,000 voters, while another class had only a Member for 40,000 or 46,000 voters. But what was the case with Scotland? Why, that the largest county constituency they were about to enfranchise had 199,000 inhabitants, and only one Member, while the smallest had 107,000, and but one Member. He would not go into general statistics, but wished to state a few facts which were of great importance in considering the present question. A Return recently made showed that Scotland contributed to the purse of the Chancellor of the Exchequer £8,289,000 annually, while Ireland contributed to the same purse only £6,300,000. The sums, however, voted during the same year for Scotch purposes amounted to only £552,000, while the sums voted for Ireland amounted to £2,250,000. In other words, while Scotland paid 35 per cent more to the National Exchequer than Ireland did, Ireland got 400 per cent more out of the Exchequer than Scotland. Surely, it could not be contended that the people of Scotland were to be mere hewers

the hon. Member for Edinburgh had constructed his argument. Scotland was certainly not entitled to the increase of Members demanded as against Ireland, either in respect of the proportion of revenue contributed by the two countries, or their population and the present amount of county and borough representation. In Ireland the number of county electors was about 122,000, returning sixty-four Members. In Scotland the number of county electors was 49,000, returning thirty Members. In Scotland the borough electors amounted to 55,000, returning twenty-three Members. In Ireland the borough electors amounted to 30,600, and returned forty-one Members. Altogether the electors in Ireland were much less in proportion than in Scotland.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, that the article of sugar which paid duty in Scotland and was afterwards sent to Ireland only amounted to £500,000 as was shown by the Customs Returns; but the excess of revenue paid by Scotland over that paid by Ireland was equally manifest in the Inland Revenue and the Post Office Departments. He did not wish to draw invidious distinctions between Scotland and Ireland—they were integral parts of the same Empire, and he hoped very shortly Ireland would be more united than she had ever been to this country; but he quite agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) that Scotland was entitled to an addition of fifteen Members. In fact, he held it to be a very small demand that was now made.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE would be very glad of some direction from the Speaker, or from any other quarter, as to where they stood and what they were engaged in. They were going into Committee on the Scotch Reform Bill, and it seemed to him that the Instruction which had been carried amounted to this—that there should be a provision in the Scotch Reform Bill to upset a part of the English Bill passed last year. That measure was to have been the conclusion of long fighting; it was to give satisfaction to both sides of the House; it was not the Bill of the Government or of the Opposition; it was the Bill of the whole House; it was a Bill, so we were told, based on certain principles, and among them was the preservation for England of its existing number of representatives, and the non-extinction of any centre of representation; but tonight in all these respects the English Reform Act was simply torn to shreds; the distribution of seats, which was settled last year, was to be unsettled, and ancient boroughs were to be extinguished by a vote of that House. They were to carry out that policy in Committee on the Scotch Reform Bill. If that was not so, was it to be embodied in a separate Bill? How was the House justified in respecting so preposterous a conclusion? They were told to expedite the registration, that there should be an autumnal dissolution and a meeting of the new Parliament before Christmas. That was all nonsense; it was equally nonsensical whether it came from the Treasury or Opposition Bench. They had been sitting more or less since November, and it was now the latter half of May, and they were now approaching Whitsuntide, and actually nothing was done—nothing done about the Boundary Bill, except throwing it into utter confusion; nothing about the Scotch Reform Bill; nothing about the Irish Reform Bill; nothing about bribery and corruption; nothing done but to throw the Irish Church and the English Reform Bill into confusion. Having adopted this Resolution, how would they stand? The Resolution in itself was, of course, worth nothing; it was not an act of legislation, but a simple expression of opinion, liable to be recalled or modified, in reference to one subject—that of the borough representation of England—which had, forsooth, to be embodied in a Bill relating to another part of the United Kingdom. They would be instructed in Committee on the Scotch Reform Bill to disfranchise places in England. As to the question of the enlargement of the House, he thought the Government had much too lightly given it up. For his part, he could see no objection to a moderate enlargement, provided only the mystical and too appropriate number of 666 were not hit. He had done his duty in calling attention to the perfect quagmire in which they were floundering—the ridiculous position in which the last old Parliament of England was placing itself by making the Scotch Reform Bill of 1868 the means of altering the English Reform Act of last year.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he had been about to put a similar question. They had passed an Instruction which involved a perfect absurdity. Was the House to go into Committee not only to consider the Scotch Reform Bill, but also to repeal a portion of a statute which received the Royal Assent last year?

any means for giving effect to that which it expressed. They had now resolved that the number of Members in that House should not be increased, and also, that a certain number of seats should be taken from English boroughs, if the Committee saw fit. The present Motion, if pressed, might, however, go far to counteract the generous feeling towards Scotland which the English and Irish Members had expressed. But there was an important point on which he wished to invite the Speaker's opinion. The Resolution being moved as an Amendment to the Motion "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," if carried, the Resolution would, he apprehended, prevent them from going into Committee on the Scotch Reform Bill at least that night. Nothing should induce him to vote for anything that would throw an obstacle in the way of their going on with a measure which had already been too long delayed; and as it was most important that they should proceed with the Committee, he hoped that his hon. Colleague, having elicited from the House an expression of opinion, in accordance with what he wished, would withdraw his Resolution.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if the Resolution of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) were passed it would prevent the Bill being proceeded with in Committee that night.

MR. P. ROBERTSON hoped the hon. Member for Edinburgh would not, under the circumstances, persevere with his proposal.

MR. LAING said, he distrusted abstract propositions as to the number of Members to be given to Scotland, in proportion to population and taxation, because he felt that London and some other places might on the same grounds claim a large increase of representation. He preferred to rest the case of Scotland on the specific claims of certain counties and towns to more Members; and to argue that Scotch counties and towns were entitled to be put on the same footing as regarded representation, as they would be if situated South of the Tweed. Proceeding on that principle, he thought that, in addition to the three counties of Lanark, Ayr, and Aberdeen, the county of Perth might also fairly claim to be divided, and to have two representatives. Then, if they turned to large cities and towns, they would find that Glasgow should be put on a par with Manchester. Manchester, with its appendage of Salford, would have five Members under the new Reform Bill; and certainly Glasgow, with its appendages, might put in a fair claim to four Members. Edinburgh, with its large population, and as being the capital of an ancient kingdom, might fairly claim three Members; and if it had been South of the Tweed, he believed, in the division of the representation last year, it would have received three. The claim of Dundee to two Members nobody would question, and the city of Aberdeen, a sort of provincial capital, with a population of 90,000, and a seat of learning, ought surely to have two Members. It possessed a population four times that of York. Again, in the great mineral district of Scotland, a number of boroughs had sprung up which might be grouped into populations of 40,000 or 50,000, and entrusted with Members. One or two Members might be fairly asked for those boroughs. Then as the English Universities were hereafter to have five Members altogether, he thought one Member for the different Universities of Scotland would be a very scant measure of justice. Therefore, ten additional Members would be a very insufficient number to place Scotland on the same relative footing as England; and he did not believe that fifteen would be an excessive number for that purpose.

MR. M'LAREN said, that, as he did not wish to prevent the House from going into Committee that night, he begged to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. REARDEN said, he apprehended that he would now be in Order to proceed with his Motion, the effect of which was, that with a view to an equitable representation of the entire people, the United Kingdom should be divided into 720 equal electoral districts, and that one Member should be elected for each such district, and that Scotland be not entitled to her seventy-five Members until Ireland had received her 145 Members.

MR. SPEAKER thought the hon. Member, on looking at his Resolution, would see a portion of it relating to Ireland, which was not in Order.

MR. REARDEN: Am I at liberty to move the latter part of the Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: We are on the Scotch Reform Bill, and we have instructed the Committee to take Members from certain boroughs of England; but I do not think the matter of Ireland in Order.

been introduced into the clause which would put Greenock in exactly the same position as other boroughs. In all other respects the clause had been framed in exact conformity with the clause in the English Act. He submitted that there was no valid reason why a departure should be made from the rule established for England, and that payment of rates ought to be made a condition of the qualification.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, that household suffrage pure and simple for Scotland was the only franchise which would be fair in that country.

MR. M'LAREN said, that by the Reform Act of 1832 a different rule was established in Scotland to that applied to England; and why, he would ask, should that rule be altered? To do so in the way proposed would be to make this a disfranchising measure; and what had Scotland done to deserve that punishment? They ought to take the real valuation of property as the basis for the franchise, and not the rating of it. An Act had been passed in 1854 for establishing a system of valuation greatly superior to that which existed in any other part of the United Kingdom. An officer was appointed in each county and burgh to make a personal valuation of all the property in his district. By this Bill they were asked to give a man a £12 franchise by rating in the counties; but why should they give it by rating, when they had the real rent itself? The rating was a mere deterioration of the value of the rent. There was no poor rate at present in some of the counties and burghs of Scotland, and it would be for the Lord Advocate to say why there should be one now. To carry this Bill into effect as it stood large expense would have to be incurred, and it would prove a vexatious, troublesome, and unworkable measure. Why should they undo the simple, common sense rule existing at the present time? He thought it was proposed by the Bill to turn a plain, common sense system into an artificial system, in favour of which no good argument could be adduced.

MR. ELLICE said, if they adopted the rule of rating, they would introduce into Scotland great confusion. There were the utmost possible inequalities in the system of rating. Some time since he had moved for certain Returns relating to that subject, and he was very much astonished on getting these Returns to find that there appeared to be a strange uniformity in the qualification. He found that it only ranged from £12 up to £15. That was to say, that the deductions allowed to occupiers before assessing for the poor rates, and producing a net rental upon which the poor rate was levied, varied from £3 to £4 a year. That statement—made on the authority of the Crown agent—was, however, wholly at variance with the fact. He had selected at random three or four constituencies only, and he had received communications which sufficiently proved the truth of what he advanced. For instance, in the city of Renfrew eleven parishes were made out in that Return to be subject to no deduction, and £12 was put down as the net rental, which would carry the qualification. He had, however, ascertained in five of those parishes that the occupier was only rated in some upon one-third, and in others upon one-fourth of the rental; and the consequence was, that in those five parishes the gross rental required to carry a vote would be in one £36, in another £45, in another £30, in another £36, and in another £48. ["Name."] The parishes to which he alluded were those of Cathcart, Eastwood, Inverscraig, Port-Glasgow, and another. Only the preceding day he had received a letter from a member of a parochial Board of the parish of Huntly, in Aberdeenshire, in which the writer complained that the Return was untrue, inasmuch as the deduction allowed to tenants in that parish was 6 per cent of the rental. He merely stated that to show that the Returns he held in his hand were quite fallacious. He hoped that the House would cut the knot of all these difficulties by assenting at once to the proposition of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and putting its foot upon this attempt to introduce a new principle, which would serve no useful purpose, but would introduce into the Scotch system the elements of unbounded confusion.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, that the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had suggested that they should take the plain common sense view of the question; and that was exactly what he himself wished to do. In England and in Ireland a man lost his vote unless he paid his rate; and he did not see why the same rule should not be applied in Scotland. It seemed to be a very reasonable provision; and if it were struck out of that Bill it would be impossible to maintain it in England or Ireland. If that clause were re-

Scotland was a most important argument in favour of a rate-paying franchise, though he might qualify that statement in one particular, because at £4 a year the house was clear of rates, the occupier paying none. There was no clearer or plainer qualification for the franchise than the payment of rates. It was not the case, as had been stated by an hon. Gentleman in the early part of the discussion, that the payment of rates was necessary, and, consequently, that every one who was not rated could not vote; because it was particularly stated in one of the clauses, with a view to meet just such a case, that inhabitants of a town where the poor rates were not levied should have votes. He asked the Committee to consider whether it was just that the principle which had been laid down for the whole of England and Wales, and which was applicable to every town in Scotland but one, should be maintained, or whether for the sake of Greenock alone, that principle should be abrogated. It was as unreasonable to complain of the extension to Scotland of the ratepaying qualification as it would be to complain of the ratepaying system now existing in London, because the rates varied in the different parishes. The hardship which might be entailed upon persons who had accidentally omitted to pay their rates was guarded against by a special section which seemed to have escaped the attention of some hon. Members. They were, however, discussing the question of the burgh franchise, and he understood his hon. Friend's arrangement to apply exclusively to the county rating; and when the clause applicable to county rating arrived he should be prepared to show that it was founded upon just principles. He could not understand why such an outcry should be made about the extension to Scotland of the principle of rating, remembering that it had been deliberately adopted last year in the case of England. He asked the Committee to consider what would be the effect of the proposal now before it. They had passed an Act which required in England that the fulfilment of a common local obligation should be necessary to the enjoyment of the franchise, and he ventured to say that the principle had been generally approved of as a sound one. ["No, no!"] Did that negative mean that the hon. Gentleman wished to sweep away the general enjoyment of the franchise which had been the result of that principle, or that the hon. Gentleman objected to the limitation imposed by rating? ["Hear, hear!"] In the latter case, what became of the argument they had heard so much of, as to the dangerous length which the Government had gone in admitting the residuum? Sweep away the ratepaying provision, which probably limited the franchise by one-half, and the residuum of nonpaying householders then admitted would be much larger and infinitely more formidable than the wide extension under the Act of 1867, which hon. Gentlemen opposite so strongly complained of. The present proposal was one virtually for the admission of persons below the £4 line, that was to say, of persons so poor that no attempt was made at present to levy rates from them. Upon those who were endeavouring to introduce so important a change let the responsibility rest. If the proposition were carried it would be carried more for the purpose of rendering this Act an absurdity than for the purpose of introducing a beneficial change.

MR. G. YOUNG said, the 3rd section of the 3rd clause—every householder to be entitled to a vote who "has been rated to all rates, if any, made for the relief of the poor"—seemed to him altogether superfluous and meaningless inasmuch as the 16th clause amounted to a distinct and imperative provision that each dwelling-house in Scotland should be separately valued and assessed to the poor rate. The real force was in the 4th section, the effect of which was that a man should be disqualified in case he failed to pay his rates. According to the law of Scotland the parochial authorities had power to exempt occupiers from the half of the rating, for which proportion only they were liable in the case of houses under £4 in value. The operation of the 4th section would be to disqualify every person exempted from the payment of rates, unless for political or other purposes those rates were paid for him. If this was to be the effect of the clause it would be most mischievous. For his own part he had never been able to see why the fact of being in arrear a few shillings to the rate collector should operate to deprive a man of his right to vote. An arrear of a few shillings in this rate was sufficient for this purpose, yet a man might owe £20 to his baker or butcher without any political consequences ensuing.

MR. DALGLISH said, it would be a wise experiment to maintain the present Scotch system, and if it worked well the House hereafter might adopt it in the case

Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.
 Ellice, E.

MR. BOUVERIE next moved to insert in place of the sections omitted the words—

“Is and has been for a period of not less than twelve months next preceding the last day of July an inhabitant occupier as a lodger of part of any dwelling-house, such part being of the annual value of £10 or upwards.”

The hon. Member said his object in moving the addition of these words was to clear away a doubt that might exist as to there being a lodger franchise in Scotland.

MR. DISRAELI rose, but was called to Order, as the Chairman had not read the Question before the House.

THE CHAIRMAN read the Question in the usual way.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not think there could be any objection to the insertion of the words. It was his understanding that the law of Scotland, as it at present stood, was in accordance with the words; but if there was any doubt, it was better that it should be removed.

SIR JOHN OGILVY thought £10 an excessive rental for a Scotch lodger franchise.

MR. KINNAIRD said, the figure was put at £10 to make the franchise the same as that in the English Act.

MR. POWELL said, that there was a difference between this and the English lodger franchise, which said that the lodging must be in the same dwelling-house; but this Bill said it might be in “any dwelling-house.”

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I rose some time back, but was anticipated by the learned Lord Advocate, to say that the House has come to a very important decision with regard to this Bill. There was a very anxious desire on the part of Her Majesty's with a large body of Scotch Members, and with the right hon. Gentleman opposite the First Minister of the Crown. He (Mr. Bouverie) would do the right hon. Gentleman the justice of saying, that in all matters connected with Scotland he has shown the greatest anxiety to consult the wishes and opinions of the Scotch Members, and, so far as he conceived it consistent with his sense of duty, he had acted in accordance with those opinions. He did not think the House had any right to complain of the right hon. Gentleman for the course he had taken; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would bear distinctly in mind that the decision at which a tolerably full Committee had arrived was to reject an innovation. The right hon. Gentleman had not resolved to continue an existing state of things, but to introduce a system which was repugnant to the great body of the Scotch people.

MR. LIDDELL said, he rose merely for the purpose of saying that he thought the Government had exercised a wise discretion, and he cordially approved the course they had taken in asking for time to consider the very grave position in which they were at present placed. He was anxious, if the House would pardon him, to say a few words on this occasion, because he had recently given expression to opinions which he knew had caused pain to some whom he was sorry to have offended, and some dissatisfaction to those whom he had the honour to represent. He had taken occasion in a recent debate to say that he disapproved the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in not having resigned on their defeat upon the question of the Irish Church. If, in the expression of such an opinion, he had given pain to any Member of Her Majesty's Government, he was extremely sorry; but he had spoken upon public grounds, and he appealed to recent events for his justification. Long habit and training in that House had inclined him to take a constitutional view of great questions, and he maintained now what he had said then,—that under the circumstances of a great defeat, confirmed by a subsequent vote with an increased majority, the duty of any Government, formed no matter how, could not be evaded, either with credit to themselves or advantage to the country. He had not spoken without thought. He knew at the time that there were great and difficult questions coming on for decision even in the short time the present House of Commons seemed disposed to leave to itself, and that upon those questions great differences of opinion would exist. They had now seen the boundary question re-opened and brought before the House, and, in his humble judgment, left as unsettled by the action of Parliament as it was before the Commission was appointed. They had seen, in the case of the Reform Bill for Scotland, Her Majesty's Government defeated in a serious division on an important point, and again in the division which had just been taken. Now, he would ask the hon. Members opposite to place themselves in the position of those who habitually supported Her Majesty's Ministers. The Government were perfectly right in pressing their opinions on the House; but the House refused to listen to those opinions, and, almost as a matter of course, whenever Her Majesty's Government proposed anything the House of Commons took a different view. The position of the Government was therefore the reverse of what it ought to be, and their whole policy was guided and governed by their opponents. That was a state of things which it would be extremely dangerous to continue, and he said so for the sake of the great party to which he belonged, and the influence of which he did not wish to see in any respect lessened. The Conservative party in this country, when accustomed, night after night, to defeat and humiliation, was not only powerless for good, but might become instrumental for evil. It was on that account he regretted that Her Majesty's Government should have thought fit on a recent occasion to retain power in the difficult position in which an adverse majority had placed them. The constitutional mode of proceeding in the case of an adverse vote was to take one of two courses—either to resign power, or to call on the country to support them. He regretted that Her Majesty's Government had not done one or the other, and he still more regretted the deplorable consequences which had arisen. He looked upon this question in a constitutional light alone, and he maintained that to carry on the Government of the country in the face of a great majority was full of danger, and could only be attended with disappointment and pain to those who attempted it.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL only wished to say that he earnestly hoped Her Majesty's Government would persevere in the course they had announced. They had got appeared to be disposed, relying upon their numbers and their majority, to carry on the business of the country in their own peculiar way.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he wished that there should be no mistake on the subject of the vote to which the Committee had come. When the Reform Bill for Scotland was introduced, the right hon. Gentleman had said, with great fairness and candour, that in these matters he would be greatly influenced by the views of the House, and that he would look to the opinions of Scotch Members especially as a guide in his proceedings. But in the debate which took place at that time, the Scotch Members pointed out in the most explicit manner that the rating principle would be productive of great inconvenience, and having since consulted together upon the subject, they placed their Amendments upon the Paper before Easter, so that the Government had had ample means of knowing what it was that they intended to insist upon. He thought the course adopted by the Scotch Members was perfectly justified, and he hoped they would continue in that course. It was their duty to make this Reform Bill as operative and as beneficial as possible, and whatever might be the result of their votes he hoped they would persevere in their present course. He could have no objection to the right hon. Gentleman taking time to consider the vote, and with the advice he would have, he would probably find that the Scotch Reform Bill had not suffered any great detriment through the omission of the rating clause, which enfranchised and disfranchised nobody.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he did not rise to oppose the Motion for Progress which, under the circumstances, he thought to be natural; but he did rise to reply to the observations of the hon. Baronet the Member for Berkshire (Sir Charles Russell). That hon. Gentleman might be justified in speaking the sentiments of the hon. Gentlemen who sat around him when he said that the struggle of that night and the struggles which had been going on for the last two months were for the purpose of placing in power one of the right hon. Gentlemen who led parties on either side of that House. Much as he respected and looked up to the right hon. Gentleman who led the party with which he had the honour of acting, he had, as an humble independent Member of that House, to disclaim such a motive as had been attributed to the Liberal party by the hon. Baronet. They were there to struggle for great principles, and not, as the hon. Member had avowed was the motive of his party, to struggle for the ascendancy of an individual. The course taken that night fully exhibited the correctness of the statement he had ventured to make on the night that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had stated the course which Government meant to take after the majority of 65 against them. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had then entertained the opinion that there were great questions remaining for that Parliament to consider—the Scotch Reform Bill, which they were first considering, the Boundary Bill, and the Irish Reform Bill. He had said then that they were about to proceed to their consideration with the millstone of a dissolution hanging round their necks. The observations of Gentlemen opposite proved that he was right in that statement. His opinion then, as it was before, was, that such a state of things was unconstitutional. They could not consider measures of such a character fairly under such circumstances. There were two courses for the Government to take—resign—that he would not believe they would do—or dissolve Parliament. The hon. Baronet, a distinguished military officer, knew that soldiers went into action ready to risk their lives for their country. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien), much as he and others on both sides of the House would dislike a dissolution, could not imagine that hon. Members would not be ready to risk their seats for great principles. Hon. Members opposite threatened them with dissolution; they—the Liberal party—were prepared for the issue; they believed that the country would give their opinions the seal of their approbation, and they challenged, not individual Members, but the Government to appeal to the country.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, he could not assent to the description which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Moncreiff) had given of the question on which the Committee had just come to a decision. He must remind the Committee that the question really was whether there should be in the towns of Scotland household suffrage, pure and simple? This was put most distinctly to the Committee, and it was not open to hon. Members to say now that it was any other question that had been under consideration. There had been no attempt on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to fill up the blank

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Kinnaird.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that Scotch Members on the opposite side of the House were not quite consistent. Early in the evening they had been anxious that Scotland should be regarded as an integral part of the Empire, but the hon. Member for Perth now wished Scotland to be treated as altogether distinct, and general Business to be stopped, for fear that the interests of Scotland should not be attended to. That the Scotch Reform Bill had not occupied the whole night was no reason for not proceeding with Supply.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that ten Scotch Bills had been put in the Paper for that night, and he wished to know whether those Bills would be proceeded with. He would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £163,776, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for Prosecutions at Assizes and Quarter Sessions, formerly paid out of County Rates, including Adjudications under the Criminal Justice Act, Sheriffs' Expenses, Salaries in lieu of Fees to Clerks of Assize and other Officers, and for Compensation to Clerks of the Peace under the same Act, and certain other Expenses of the same Class."

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to know whether the Attorney General had any further explanation to give respecting the duties of the Clerks of Assize? At present, after the explanation given by the hon. and learned Gentleman on a former evening, and which he heard with pain, he thought that these officers did not discharge duties for which a salary of £1,000 a year was requisite, and that it was incumbent on the Treasury to make inquiry into the salaries of all the offices in this Vote.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that all he stated the other night was that it was not necessary that a Clerk of Assize should be either a barrister or a solicitor. He would not go at any length into the duties of a Clerk of Assize; but it was absolutely necessary that there should be on every circuit officers to perform duties connected with the administration of justice. He had himself had to sit as a Commissioner on the Western Circuit, and there was sometimes a difficulty in getting a clerk to go into a third and fourth Court. He would repeat that a great portion of the business which devolved upon the Clerks of Assize was not such as to require legal knowledge. He had the control over certain officers, and had to conduct the correspondence with the sheriffs and gaolers, and to assist the Judges in the general arrangements of the business of the different Courts of Assize. He also had to keep an office in town. He would not retract what he had said the other night, that although some legal knowledge was required, it was not necessary he should be a barrister of seven years' standing or a solicitor in order to discharge the duties of his office.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite satisfactory from his point of view. The Attorney General had shown very clearly that some knowledge of routine and a certain aptitude of organization were required from Clerks of Assize, but it appeared to him (Mr. Childers) to be then undesirable that, taking into account the rates of salary in other departments of the Civil Service, £1,000 would be an excessive salary. He did not complain of Mr. Bovill's appointment, but if a gentleman who a year ago was in a dragoon regiment could in a few months qualify himself for professional duties of this kind, it would be very unfair to the Civil Service generally, that the present salaries should be maintained. He would therefore press the question which he had addressed to the Treasury—namely, whether they would undertake that the salaries of these officers should be re-considered by the Treasury?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the proposal of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) that the Treasury should re-consider the salary of these officers with reference to the duties they were called upon to discharge, was deserving of attention. Since the present Government came into Office their attention had not been called to this subject, but he had no hesitation in saying that the matter should be properly inquired into.

MR. FAWCETT moved that the Vote be postponed.

THE CHAIRMAN intimated that this could not be done.

MR. FAWCETT said, he felt so strongly that it was a gross abuse on the part of the Chief Justice of the Common scription ought not to be distributed, as a matter of course, among the personal connections of the Chief Justice.

COLONEL NORTH said, that, as neither the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) nor the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had made any inquiry as to the duties of these officers while they were at the Treasury, the zeal with which they now condemned the appointments was, to say the least, very curious. In his opinion, no blame attached to the Lord Chief Justice for following a practice which had evidently been approved by those hon. Members.

MR. CHILDERS said, that if, during the eight or nine months that he was Secretary of the Treasury, he had ascertained the duty, and compared it with the salary, of every officer of the Government, he must have been a man of superhuman power. He, however, never imagined that Clerkships of Assize were offices which did not require to be filled by persons of considerable legal attainments. If the Government were unwilling to postpone the Vote, he trusted that the Committee would accept the promise of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which he had not the least doubt the Treasury would faithfully perform. At the same time, he trusted that the House would never for a moment admit that patronage vested in any person in the position of a Judge, was something which was to be looked upon as property, and for which, if he was deprived of it, he was entitled, in some respect or other, to compensation. Any such idea was expressly excluded by a clause of the Act of Parliament which regulates the offices of Associate and Clerk of Assize.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he looked upon the legal profession as one of the safeguards of the Constitution, and if it were to go forth to the world that appointments of this description were to be made a slur would be cast upon the profession.

MR. FAWCETT said, he regretted that notwithstanding the appeals which had been made to him by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), and by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), he could not withdraw his Motion. He did not wish to raise a general question as to the revision of the salaries of clerks, whom he had no reason to believe overpaid. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had stated that the Amendment, if carried, would be a severe vote of censure on Chief Justice Bovill. Believing that the Chief Justice had done that which he ought not to have done, he (Mr. Fawcett) was anxious that the Committee should pass a severe condemnation upon him in this matter.

MR. HIBBERT regretted that after the assurance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the Amendment had not been withdrawn. He thought it would be much better that the House should lay down some rule that no person should in future be appointed to the office in question who was not of a certain standing at the bar, or a solicitor.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he wished to know whether any complaint had been made of any mischief arising out of this appointment? If an improper appointment had been made no doubt notice ought to be taken of it by the House, but he did not think that the present Amendment was the most dignified form. He was rather surprised to hear from the hon. Baronet the Member for Buckinghamshire (Sir Harry Verney), that a gentleman who had been engaged in the profession to which he (Sir Harry Verney) had formerly belonged was incapable of performing the duties of Clerk of Assize. All he could make out from the present debate was, that a gentleman blessed with a legal education was everything that was good, while there was nothing but inefficiency to be expected from a civilian or a military officer.

MR. CLAY said, that the hon. Member for Brighton had asked the Committee to pass a severe censure on the Chief Justice, and he (Mr. Clay) was therefore anxious to say that, entertaining a high respect for the Chief Justice—which he believed was shared by all who knew him—he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. If it was, very few Members, he believed, would vote for it. If there was any fault it lay not with the Chief Justice but with that House, which allowed highly-paid places to exist with very slender duties. As long as that was so, they might be sure that those who held the patronage would appoint their own relations. He thought the proposition made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer the more satisfactory settlement; it would save more money, and without selecting one instance, which was not worse than the others, would put the whole upon such a footing as was worthy of the House of Commons.

MR. HIBBERT said, that in the country the expenses of the Police Courts were defrayed out of the rates. In London they came out of the Consolidated Fund. He did not see why the metropolis should not bear some portion of the charge.

MR. LABOUCHERE called attention to the charges for the constabulary in Ireland. He did not see, considering that the population in the metropolis was about half that of Ireland, that the proportion was too much. It was really impossible to levy more money in the metropolis. The whole of the police charge of the metropolis was not charged on the Consolidated Fund; and many of the duties performed by the metropolitan police were not of a local, but of an Imperial character.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that one item of increase in the Vote was for improving the Police Courts of London, which everybody admitted were in a wretched state. It rested with the Treasury and the Home Office to decide when the police courts required to be re-built; and anyone who would take the trouble of looking into those Courts would admit that they were not such buildings as they ought to be. Although the sum was charged in a different manner, the fact really was that the proportion charged for the metropolis was just the same as in other parts of the country.

Vote agreed to.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN then moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, Progress could be reported when they came to an unopposed Vote.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen,)—put, and negatived.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £165,524, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the Metropolitan Police."

MR. AYRTON inquired when the Bill for the re-organization of the police system was to be introduced?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that he had given notice of the Bill, and proposed to bring it in on Thursday.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he objected to the amount of the Vote and to the entire want of details of the various items. He wished for an explanation why the police did not prevent the explosion at Clerkenwell House of Correction, seeing that they had previous warning of what was likely to happen, and the very day and hour was specified.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had on a former occasion given as much explanation as was in his power. The police were on the spot, but they did not anticipate the particular mode that was adopted for blowing down the prison wall. They were under the impression that the wall would be blown up from below, and took precautions against that, but not against the method that was actually adopted. They were more accustomed to the sight of barrels of beer than barrels of gunpowder, and thinking it was a barrel of beer that was placed against the wall they took no steps to remove it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Watkin.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must remind the Committee they were very backward with Supply this year, and he hoped, as there was then a good attendance in the House, they would be allowed to take a few more Votes that night. If the Committee was adjourned they must sit later to make up the time.

MR. WATKIN said, the Secretary of State had appealed to the Committee to wait till a Vote was reached which was opposed.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, there were other measures of the Government on the night's Paper; and he would suggest that Progress should be reported after this Vote was agreed to.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) £130,891, to complete the sum for Convict Establishments (Colonies).

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped that no more convicts would be sent to Gibraltar. It was an extravagant thing to send convicts there, and it was a bad place to send them to. The convict establishment there was bad in point of discipline.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that a reduced Estimate had been received from Gibraltar since the general Estimates were ally when in possession of the Report of a Commission than under the present circumstances.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD said, that he attached great importance to the question, and he had heard no objection of any weight offered against any of the clauses of the Bill which he had brought forward. Under any other circumstances, therefore, he should have been most reluctant to withdraw it. His object, however, had been gained to a great extent—first, by having brought the subject prominently forward, and having, as he believed, attracted the attention of a large portion of the public to this important question, and also in having obtained from Her Majesty's Government an intimation that they approved of the principle of the Bill and were not unwilling that a Commission should be appointed to inquire into the whole subject. Having that prospect before him, and believing that it would be an unnecessary waste of time if he insisted on pressing the measure under the present circumstances, he would adopt the advice given him by the noble Earl and withdraw the Bill.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that having presented a petition from one of the most prosperous friendly societies in the country, stating that the investigation they had made respecting other friendly societies and the experience of their own had convinced them that a general and searching inquiry into the subject was necessary; he desired to express his gratification at the prospect of a Royal Commission being issued; for he felt satisfied that the Commission would render important services to the cause of providence and self-denial, and would lead to securities for the diminution of pauperism, the advantages of which to the country could not be over-estimated.

Bill (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHYARDS ACT (1867) AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 16.)

(The Bishop of Oxford.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that the Bill which he now moved their Lordships to read a second time, proposed a slight alteration in the Act of last Session relating to this subject. That Act provided for the easier consecration of additions to churchyards, and enabled donors of land for such additions to reserve a certain portion of it to serve in perpetuity as a burial-place for their families. It was provided that the land so reserved should not exceed fifty square yards, or one-sixth of the whole land given. Now the legal authorities construed the clause as though the words "fifty square yards" governed the words "one-sixth," and to mean that not more than fifty yards could be reserved under any gift. That, however, was not the intention of those who framed the clause; and this Bill proposed to permit donors to reserve land to any extent, provided it did not exceed a certain proportion of the whole. That proportion, as he had stated, was one-sixth under last year's Act; but, thinking some of their Lordships might deem it inadvisable to allow so large a proportion as that to be reserved, he proposed to fix it in this Bill at one-tenth. At the same time he attached no great importance to this second point, and if one-sixth was thought better than one-tenth, he would not press his opinion either way. It had recently been thought well to render churchyards attractive by planting them, and he desired to give encouragement to donations of land for the purpose of enlarging them, by enabling the donors to reserve a portion as burial-places for themselves and their families.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Bishop of Oxford.)

LORD REDESDALE said, it would be as well to guard against making the reserved ground too large, because a donor's successors might neglect to keep it in order, and thus an eyesore would be produced in the neighbourhood of the church instead of an ornament.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE suggested that the provisions of the Act of last year should be extended to cemeteries. He had been recently reminded of the necessity of this by a case in his own diocese. The Burial Board of Kendal had made an addition to their beautiful cemetery; but when the case came to be inquired into it was found that the whole of the cumbrous legal formalities attending the consecration of a burial-ground had to be gone through before the addition could be used. For, on carefully perusing that Bill of last Session, which it was now proposed to amend, it was found that by no possibility could it be construed as applying to cemeteries. Indeed, they would seem to have been

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in conformity with the Notice which I gave several days ago, I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government What course they propose to take on the Second Reading of the Established Church (Ireland) Bill, which stands for Friday, the 22nd instant?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, as we look upon this Bill as the first step towards the disestablishment of the Church, we intend to give it the greatest opposition we can.

ILLEGAL PUBLICATIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that Publications, the sale of which has been condemned by a Court of Law, are now being openly offered for sale in the Streets of London, and such being the case, whether the Police have power to interfere?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I have made inquiries into the subject of my hon. Friend's Question, and I find that since the decision referred to that book has not been sold in the streets, though there is no doubt—for I hold one of the covers in my hand—that the cover is put on books in order to sell them, but within the cover the purchaser finds a book of a totally different character, and of a harmless nature. The attraction of the title appears to be great, as it is used for advertising and selling books of a very different kind. I am told that the Police keep a register of the books and pamphlets sold in the streets, and interfere when their interference is called for. As to the book referred to by my hon. Friend—for I presume his Question relates to The Confessional Unmasked—I find on inquiry at the dépôt from which it was issued that all the remaining copies have been destroyed, and that there are none now for sale.

ARMY RESERVE AND MILITIA RESERVE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR WALKER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to lay upon the Table the Regulations for the Army Reserve and the Militia Reserve?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied that he laid the Papers on the table of the House some time ago.

MONUMENT TO THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, What progress has been made during the past year with the monument to the late Duke of Wellington, and whether it is likely to be completed in the course of 1869?

the proper sense of the word as long as the purchase system lasted; for the very essence of a profession is first, that the man who pursues it should be able to live by it, and next, that he should succeed in it more or less in proportion to his professional merits. They showed that both of these essential conditions do not, and could not exist under the purchase system. They showed likewise that all attempts to ameliorate the condition of the officers of our army were rendered nugatory and almost ludicrous by a state of things under which every boon or privilege which we conferred upon the officer, by a certain and immediate process, raised the price which he paid for his commission by exactly the capitalized value of that boon or privilege. And they showed, as indeed has been subsequently borne out by innumerable letters, both addressed privately to Members—in my own case, ever since these Resolutions were on the Paper, they have been coming in at the rate of at least one every day—and inserted in the columns of the military papers, that there was commonly little foundation for the pet phrase so much in vogue at the Horse Guards, that the purchase system is especially dear to the poor officers.

And, Sir, in passing, it is worth observation that people in general do not sufficiently realize the reproach which is cast upon our army by the frequent use, whether at the Horse Guards or in society, of that very expression, "poor officers." In any other profession, when we talk of a person as poor or rich we refer to his success or failure in his professional career. When we speak of a poor barrister we mean one who cannot induce attorneys to give him briefs. When we speak of a poor author we mean one who cannot induce the world in general to buy his books. We do not insult civil servants or lawyers by constant allusions to the allowances which they receive from their fathers, or the legacies which they expect from their relations. But we are for ever throwing it in the teeth of many among the bravest and best of our soldiers that they are poor men—and rightly too—for their want of a good balance at their bankers is their professional fault and drawback, and they must be reminded of it at every turn, just as an idle apprentice must be reminded at every turn of his want of attention or industry. We come forward with our sympathy and compassion, instead of giving them the promotion which they deserve; instead of preventing anyone with money in his pocket from stepping over the heads of his elders and betters. What they want is not sympathy and compassion, but justice. Abolish the purchase system, and you will for the last time have heard any talk about poor officers. Well, Sir, during the debate last year these arguments, some of which I have briefly indicated, had their due effect, as was proved by the admission of the two Leaders of the House on army matters—the Secretary of State for War (Sir John Pakington), and the noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington). Sir John Pakington said—

"I am quite willing to admit, as the result of my own study of this question, that it is impossible to read the Report of the Royal Commission, the various correspondence of Sir Charles Trevelyan, and the pamphlets which he has published on this subject, without being convinced that there are great and serious anomalies in this system of army purchase. There are many things connected with that system which are fairly open to criticism, and which at least suggest very serious doubts whether, if we were to commence anew, we should found promotion upon the purchase system which now prevails."—[3 Hansard clxxxvi. 1814.]

The Marquess of Hartington said—

"I quite agree with the Secretary of State for War that this system of purchase is full of anomalies and objections; and I believe that there is no true friend to the army who would not be glad to see the system abolished if we could only devise a system without similar anomalies and objections."—[Ibid. 1821.]

Such a system, free I venture to hope from the anomalies and objections alluded to, I propose to lay before you to-night with all possible brevity and simplicity. And yet with all possible brevity I cannot be very brief, but must ask hon. Members to pay me the attention due not to the weight of the speaker but to the importance of the subject.

Now, Sir, there may be some hon. Gentlemen who hold, in a somewhat vague manner, that the present system ought to be abolished, but who regard the scheme on the Paper as too sweeping, too Radical, and, above all, as too expensive. They may think, as people at the first aspect of new questions are always inclined to think, that it would be better at any rate to begin with a partial measure. Now on this point I will quote the high authority of Earl Grey, than whom no one living has a keener and more correct sense of the defects of our military system; though, speaking with great diffidence and respect, I cannot but think that his Lordship is a little over cautious when the question relates to the remedying of those defects—

the Government abolishing purchase above the rank of captain, and now my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro has embodied the proposition in an Amendment. Now, Sir, army reformers will be thankful for any mercies, however small. We should not repudiate the concession: we should, indeed, think it a very great prize to have been won in so few campaigns. We should consider it to be a step worthy of the Ministry, which last Session did something considerable to improve the position and increase the comforts of the common soldier, and which, during the Vacation, ventured on a bold and a very promising attempt to vivify and adjust the administrative Departments of our army. But we must not be blind to the defects of the plan. If the Government recognizes purchase up to the rank of captain, it is only too certain that every commission throughout the service of every grade will continue to be bought and sold for what it will fetch. Notice what goes on now. At this moment the following Act is in force:—

“Every officer in Her Majesty’s forces who shall take, accept, or receive, or pay, or agree to pay, any larger sum of money, directly or indirectly, than what is allowed by any regulations made by Her Majesty in relation to the purchase or exchange of commissions in Her Majesty’s forces, shall, on being convicted thereof by a general Court-martial, forfeit his commission and be cashiered; and the Commander-in-Chief is directed to take measures for giving full effect to the penalties attaching to such offence.”

Does the Commander-in-Chief take those measures? No, Sir. When examined before the Royal Commission of 1857, he acknowledged, almost in so many words, that his policy on the subject was nothing but a lifelong connivance. Do our officers observe the law? Do they refrain from accepting, receiving, or paying any larger sum of money than is allowed by the regulations? Sir, I leave it to every hon. and gallant Gentleman here to answer that question to his neighbour. I leave it to every hon. Member who has a son or a nephew in the army to answer it to himself. What young officer is there who has not a purchase grievance connected with the fancy prices? I met one the other day whose regiment had been ordered to the West Indies, and who told me that the junior lieutenant, who had recently purchased his commission for £600 over the regulation price, was willing to dispose of it for £100 less than he gave for it. The senior ensign was down for purchase, and very willing to buy; but his father refused to allow his son to give over the regulation price, and accordingly promotion was stopped for all the youngsters in the battalion. And then he went on to say—and I must beg the House to mark this—that it was foolish to refuse such an offer, because the pay would be capital interest on the money invested. I asked him, if the pay was regarded as interest on the money invested, what the officer would receive for his services? and, from his difficulty in understanding the question, it was evident that the idea had never occurred to him that his services were worth anything at all. Childish as the story is, it surely is important as an illustration of the lesson inevitably learned by our young officers from the teaching of the purchase system. They regard their position as their own right, bought with their own money. They look on their pay as the interest of that money, and they cannot realize that they are the servants of the State. Well, Sir, if the penalties threatened in the statute do not deter officers from exceeding the regulation prices, while those regulation prices are legally recognized, we may be sure that, as long as you leave a trace or vestige of purchase, so long will everything in the army be bought and sold in spite of all our efforts to the contrary. Colonelcies and majorities will be for sale no longer in open, but in secret, market; just as now adjutancies in the Militia and Volunteers are notoriously objects of traffic, and purses are made up for retiring officers in the non-purchase regiments handed over to us from the East India Company. But abolish this system root and branch—train the public spirit of the army to nobler things—cease to place before the eyes of our officers the spectacle of commissions sold, like patent razors, with the stamp of authority upon them, and you may confidently expect to see the day when our military men will scorn such a traffic, just as it is now scorned by our civil servants, both in India and at home. Cease to legalize purchase, and you will put the Commander-in-Chief on his honour to suppress all surreptitious traffic in commissions. You will put our officers on their honour no longer to carry on that traffic; for, in spite of your official regulations, it is idle to say that they are upon their honour now. And when English officers are upon their honour we shall have a stronger guarantee than any written law, or ordinance, or Act of his officers had taken the trouble to make up a purse, preferring to wait his own time. By way of punishment, it was agreed that no one should deal with him when his own time came; and he was allowed to drift into a major-generalship without receiving a farthing back of all that he had laid out. The poor man is said to have lost at a stroke £17,000. The authorities not only winked at all this; but actually in some cases regulated their appointments to high and important commands abroad, by the success and failure of the candidates in this most unprofessional system of brokerage. General Augustus Spencer, giving evidence before the Purchase Commission, speaks as follows:—

“I have seen inefficient officers get promotion for the purpose of enabling old officers to realize their capital, perhaps on the point of death. I have seen superior officers appointed to high commands, from their not having been previously able to recover their capital through an unexpected brevet.”

Now, Sir, there are two capital objections always ready to be brought forward against any proposal to abolish purchase: first, that it will stop promotion, and fill the army with old officers; secondly, that it will give great scope to favouritism in high quarters, because it is maintained that under the present system, however the poor man may suffer, at any rate the rich have a fair field and no favour. But, Sir, if the Government is willing to carry out in all its details some scheme virtually the same as that now upon the Paper, both these objections will fall to the ground. For in order to obviate the first, in order to remove the apprehension lest the extinction of purchase should cause a glut in the channel of promotion, we must extend to the whole army the scheme of retirement with certain necessary modifications, pretty unanimously recommended by Mr. Childers' Committee of last year—a Committee in which there was a strong, and indeed, I may say, a preponderating military element. The main provisions of this scheme are the permission given to every officer to retire on a handsome maintenance after a certain number of years in the army; and the obligation to retire after he has passed the age at which he is fit for service in the field. Now, Sir, I know that the idea of cutting short an officer's career at any age whatever is exceedingly unpalatable to many military men; but the time is coming when in dealing with questions concerning the defence of the nation we must consult public utility and not private sentiment. We must propound this question to ourselves: Are we maintaining our army with a view to peace, or with a view to war? If the latter, we must look for our examples in the annals of war, and not in the annals of peace. We should endeavour to fashion our army after the model, not of what it was when it fought in the Crimea after forty years of peace, but after the model of what it was when it fought at Waterloo after twenty years of war. Sir, it has been stated, and as far as I can learn it has never been contradicted, that the Waterloo army contained only one officer over the age of fifty, and that officer was, indeed, a brilliant exception, for he was General Picton. But whether this sweeping statement be true or not, there can be no doubt whatever that active service soon clears the ranks of all the elderly subalterns and captains. And, therefore, for the sake of the efficiency of the service, and in the interests of the younger officers, we should do for ourselves what the first year of war would do for us. This is the view of one of our best soldiers, Sir William Mansfield, who says—

“I would place every captain en retraite at forty-five years of age, and every field officer at fifty, the latter being available for higher offices if specially suited to hold them.”

This has long been the view of the French military authorities, who oblige a captain to retire at fifty-three, and a lieutenant at fifty-two. But, Sir, if this scheme be adopted, besides those officers, who retire compulsorily at a certain age, who, in my opinion, will be very few, and those who are tempted into retirement by a liberal scale of annuities, which, in all probability, will be very many, there will be the vacancies caused by the great numbers of young men of good family who then, as now, will seek the army for a few years as a worthy and noble pastime. I know, Sir, that we are told that it is the purchase system which attracts these young men into our service—which statement, if it means anything at all, must mean that eldest sons, and men of rank join the army because the army is the only profession in which wealth will tell. Sir, in behalf of the younger men of this country, I utterly refuse to credit that aspersion. It is not the right of purchasing steps over their poorer comrades that fills our army with the pick of our gentry and aristocracy. It is the free life of adventure and travel—the pleasant genial fraternity of the authority in the world, especially on all matters relating to the tone of armies, says—I will read his words if the House will excuse an English public school accent—"L'avancement est soumis à des règles fixées par la loi. Il a conséquemment rien d'arbitraire." But, Sir, we are told that this is all very well in France, but that the English army would have no confidence in the manner in which the Horse Guards would exercise its patronage; and, strange to say, this language is most common in the mouths of those very men who always, whether within the walls of this House or in the Committee-rooms upstairs, most vehemently resent it when any audacious civilian speaks lightly or disparagingly of that very institution which they dare not trust with the powers so liberally placed in the hands of the French War Office. Well may the Commander-in-Chief say, "Preserve me from my friends." It is the more hard on him that he should meet with such treatment from his trusted allies, because in the last Queen's Regulations he has published very full and detailed instructions to the general officers who are to carry out our half-yearly inspections, which do not lose an atom by contrast with the instructions of the French War Office.

Now, Sir, these instructions afford an excellent substratum on which to found a solid and satisfactory system of selection. Though there is some danger lest hon. Gentlemen who remember the debate of last year on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for the Montgomery boroughs should receive what I am now going to say with the laughter of incredulity, it is the fact that, with some most notorious and unhappy exceptions, the promotions made by the Board of Admiralty give fair satisfaction to the service. And, Sir, if it be really the case, which I do not for a moment believe, that political intrigue, or aristocratic exclusiveness, or Royal partiality are so rampant in our public Departments that we must fly to a system which judges merit by the criterion of the longest purse, then indeed those time-honoured institutions of which we are so proud may be said to have been on their trial long enough. No, Sir, a high-spirited officer would surely far prefer some slight and occasional uncertainty about the justice of this or that appointment, to the miserable necessity of turning aside from the cares of his noble profession to the wretched huckstering and chaffering and bargain-making on which his career at present depends. Shortly after the debate of last year I got a very civil letter from an officer, whose name I do not recollect for I tore the letter up, and quote from memory, in which he expresses surprise that I brought forward Lord Clyde's authority against purchase, as Lord Clyde himself profited by purchase, and the writer went on to give his idea of what profiting by purchase meant. He affirmed that Lord Clyde, after waiting many years for promotion, obtained it at length by borrowing money from, if I remember right, a Demerara storekeeper and a Creole widow. Now, Sir, I do not vouch for the truth of this story; for in the first place I do not know the writer personally, and in the next place I have not got the letter by me. But it is worthy of note that any English soldier should believe that the greatest English soldier of our own time should have learned by such an experience to be enamoured of such a system.

Sir, I have no doubt hon. Members who wish to keep things as they are, will insist very strongly upon the ruinous expense which this proposed change would entail upon the country. The change unquestionably will be very costly. It will involve a considerable outlay, spread over a whole generation. For an economical army reformer it is an unsatisfactory reflection that, after the Crimean War, purchase might have been abolished at a comparatively trifling cost, on account of the great number of officers who held commissions which had been obtained without purchase, by death vacancies, and the other casualties of active service. At that period anyone who had contracted to buy up the saleable commissions for £1,500,000. would have gained by his contract. But the Horse Guards refused to take advantage of that most favourable state of the commission market, caused by a war in which the purchase system had confessedly broken down, to the shame and sorrow of the country; and, therefore, if the country should now have to spend three or four times the £1,500,000 which this most salutary and necessary operation would have cost it then, it is at the door of the Horse Guards and not at the door of army reformers that the unpopularity of the increased estimate should lie. If the Secretary at War came down to this House, or at any rate to the coming House, with a plan for the emancipation of our army from its ancient trammels, and asked us to pay the necessary price, is there anyone who doubts that a sign and a partial cause of the unprofessional spirit of our army. On the other hand the certain prospect of advancement would draw so many men of a better class into our ranks, that we should be both enabled and obliged to improve the condition and foster the self-respect of the common soldier. We should have such an accession of good recruits that we must then do what we ought to do at once, and that is, make it a point to get rid of all the bad bargains; and when the army is free from scamps and ruffians—when once, as now in the Police, dismissal has become the severest of all punishments—then all those degrading penalties, over which we fight so desperately year after year, will go with the consent of all parties in time of war and of peace alike. Flogging will be a thing of the past, and we shall have heard the last of that shameful stigma, the branding free Englishmen with the letters of shame. Why, Sir, when the Recruiting Commission of 1859 was told to make recommendations, by which the well-being of the English soldier should be increased, one of the remedies which they proposed was the more indelible marking of his back and shoulders—a proposition that was adopted by the Horse Guards with ominous alacrity.

I know we are told that the British soldier likes to be commanded by gentlemen. But I cannot forget that we are told so by the very same men who maintain that the well-conducted private soldier regards flogging and branding with pride and satisfaction. And, Sir, in the hour of need and peril the Horse Guards forgets its own favourite theories. During the stress of the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny it lost sight of the fact that our troops objected to be officered by any but gentlemen; and in the five years between 1854 and 1858 no less than 483 soldiers were raised from the ranks. But when the danger was over, we went back to our old ways, and slammed the door of promotion in the faces of our rank and file. In the years 1861, 1862, and 1863, respectively, the promotion from the ranks numbered three, four, and eight. We must do something to attract into our ranks the hard-working, well-to-do classes, whether those classes go by the name of upper, middle, or lower: those truly working classes which, in their different professions, trades, and callings, have made England what she is in commerce and in history. We cannot go on much longer officering our army from the froth, and manning it from the dregs of society. An hon. and gallant Member told us last year that if we promoted a ploughman or a linen-draper, because he happened to be smarter than his fellows, and because he could read and write, he would destroy the whole tone of a regiment. Not so thought Cromwell, when he applied himself to form the last army which has ever really represented the full fighting strength of the English people. No, Sir, to use his own language, he sent all the tapsters and broken-down-serving people about their business, and took honest, God-fearing men of recognized position and calling: paid them well, and chose their officers from their own body. Napoleon always looked back with regret upon his first Italian army, as the best force which he ever led; because, as he himself said, that army had been raised from all ranks of society, during the early enthusiasm of the Revolution. If, on the march, he wanted a secretary, he had but to call to the company which happened to be passing, and one-half of the men would start from the ranks; and it was from those very ranks that he selected the most famous fraternity of generals that the world ever saw.

Hon. Gentlemen will talk a good deal, as they have talked in times past, of the system which produced the army which triumphed at Talavera, and Waterloo, and Goojerat: but, Sir, these are not our first or our only laurels. No English army ever gained such successes against such odds as the little bands of heroes who fought in the early wars in France. Crécy and Poitiers and Agincourt were won by national armies containing, in their due proportion, all classes, from the Prince to the peasant. Sir, in the year 1818, Marshal Gouvion St. Cyr introduced the admirable system of promotion, selection, and retirement, which, to this day, prevails in the French army. Referring to that event, the Duc d'Aumale writes thus—"Then," he says, "France felt that she had recovered her army, and the army had got its charter." Sir, what the French can do, we can do. Of all the feelings which actuate the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite, there is none more honourable than that profound conviction which they entertain, regarding the innate excellence of the British character. At all Conservative banquets and public meetings, we are told that it is ignoble and unpatriotic to be for ever comparing ourselves with foreigners, to our own disadvantage. Therefore, Sir, I appeal to those hon.

another form. In an army lately done away with, where purchase was unknown, there existed the bonus system, which was nothing more nor less than a system of compulsory purchase without control, as against a system of purchase under control. A friend of his, Mr. O'Dowd, who understood the working of the system as well as anyone in England, had lately written a book, in which he described the purchase system as a "self-supporting retirement system by means of deposits." He trusted that the House would pause before they proceeded to revolutionize our regimental system by abolishing purchase. General Trochu stated that the part of our army system which was pre-eminently superior to that of any other country was our regimental system. The effect was to enable our officers to obtain more rapid promotion than in any other army. He had sat upon a Committee presided over by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) to inquire into the dead-lock in the non-purchase corps. What did the Committee suggest? A system of purchase by the State, so that, after a certain number of years, the State should buy the commissions of officers and get them out of the way. There were grumblers in all professions; but he ventured to say there was not a single officer in that House who would not say that the purchase system was popular in the army. Lately there had been twelve non-purchase corps added to the army. Things had lately come to a dead-lock in these corps, and he had been informed that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) had decided that, in order to secure a flow of promotion, an officer wishing to retire after a certain number of years should receive a sum of money out of the Indian funds. That would be neither more nor less than a system of purchase by the State. But then it was said that the purchase system was unpopular with the poor man, and the case of Sir Henry Havelock was cited. It was said that he was crushed down by the purchase system; and that if it had not been for the siege of Lucknow he would never have risen in his profession. But Sir Henry Havelock exchanged twice out of his regiments in order to get money under the purchase system, and he would have commanded a regiment long before he did if he had remained in his regiments. It was hard to attribute such things to a purchase system when they were acts done by a man himself in furtherance of his own views and objects in life. If the House should, notwithstanding, determine to abolish purchase, was it possible to abolish it in the lower ranks? His hon. Friend admitted that in the lower ranks promotion must go by seniority, and he believed that if he proposed to adopt the principle of selection in those ranks he would open the door to very great unfairness; for they could have in the lower ranks but small experience of the qualities of an officer, and it was not fair that promotion should go by selection. Depend upon it that if they adopted the principle of seniority they would have in one shape or other, a system of buying out. They might pledge an officer never to sell his commission; but what was to hinder him from selling his sword for £200, or his old cob for £500? His hon. Friend had shown a good deal of ingenuity in answering the question what it would cost to do away with the purchase system? His hon. Friend said it might have been abolished in 1856 for about £2,000,000; but he avoided telling the House what it would cost to abolish it now. He would submit to the House certain figures showing what the country must pay to buy up the vested interests of the army. Those figures were placed before the Royal Commission on Purchase issued soon after the Crimean War. Then there were many young officers who had served so short a time that they were not entitled to sell their commissions; but since then our army had been increased by two Cavalry and twenty-seven Infantry regiments. In 1856 the regulation value of the commissions was, in the Cavalry £1,335,290; in the Foot Guards £610,110; and in the Infantry of the Line, £5,180,630 — making together, a total of £7,126,030. But justice required them to pay not only the regulation price, but also whatever additional sums had really been paid under the system now connived at. Mr. O'Dowd had gone pretty closely into that matter in his pamphlet, and, taking first, in respect to the Cavalry, one of the most expensive and one of the least expensive regiments, he found that the average amount above the regulation price paid by a major for a lieutenant-colonelcy was £6,800 in the dearest regiment, and £5,075 in the cheapest. That gave a mean of about £6,000 as the average sum paid above the regulation price for a lieutenant-colonelcy. Thus, it would be necessary to pay to the Cavalry £1,735,000 above the regulation price;

tant, but would probably meet with less opposition than the other part. He proposed it because at the present moment non-purchase officers met with four obstacles in their career. He might call them the four turnpikes which barred their passage. They had to purchase from ensign to lieutenant, from lieutenant to captain, from captain to major, and from major to lieutenant-colonel. He proposed to do away with three of those turnpikes, and to reduce the regimental commissioned ranks to three—lieutenant-colonel, captain, and lieutenant. He could not see what objection could be taken to that proposition. There were only three kinds of duty in the regimental system. There was the lieutenant-colonel, who commanded the regiment; there was the captain, who commanded a company, and then there was the lieutenant, who was subordinate to that officer. He knew that he should be met with the objection that if the major were done away the second lieutenant-colonel would be made of the same rank as the officer commanding the regiment. That objection might easily be disposed of by giving the officer commanding some distinctive appellation, such as lieutenant-colonel commandant, and by placing him, consequently, in a superior position to the second lieutenant-colonel. He proposed that every major should, on a given day, become a lieutenant-colonel. This would not add considerably to the expenditure of the country, for those officers raised to superior rank might be treated as were officers in the Artillery, who did not get superior pay until they arrived naturally, according to the rota, at the superior rank, receiving only 1s. a day additional in the meantime. With regard to that part of his Resolutions relating to education, he thought that after the able manner in which the subject had already been discussed in that House, it was unnecessary for him to dilate upon it now. He proposed that the going through a course of practical professional training should be a preliminary condition to the acquisition of a commission in the Cavalry, Guards, or the Line; so that every officer should, immediately on joining his regiment, be able to do his duty. He next came to the great question of whether or not it would be possible to reduce the number of officers in regiments of the Line? One thing was clear—either that the Artillery was under-officered, or that our Cavalry and Line were very much over-officered. A battery of field artillery numbered 100 men, with 120 horses, besides guns, a very important command. There were five combatant officers—namely, two captains and three lieutenants to each battery. A battalion of the Line at home numbered 700 men, with thirty-four combatant officers, or double the number of the Artillery. A Cavalry regiment contained about 500 men of all ranks at home, with twenty-seven combatant officers, being also twice the number of the Artillery. The question, then, was whether a proportion of officers which was greater than in any army in Europe was necessary. The last portion of his Motion referred to the retirement; but that he was convinced would not be so expensive as its opponents anticipated. He fully understood that his hon. Friend who moved the original Resolution was actuated by a sincere desire to promote the interest of the army; but he believed that the system of purchase had become so overgrown of late years that the cry against it would never end until some reform was effected. He proposed that the House, if it should give its sanction to these proposals, should furnish the sums necessary for carrying them into effect, and he was sure that they would not shrink from the sacrifice which such a state of things would impose. He had trespassed at some length on their indulgence, and he then left the Amendment of which he had given notice in their hands.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the ground of complaint against the operation of the Purchase System in the Army would be greatly diminished, and the efficiency of the Service improved, by the abolition of Purchase above the rank of Captain in the Cavalry and the Infantry of the Line,"—(Captain Vivian,)

—instead thereof.

Mr. O'REILLY said, his reason for advocating the total and immediate extinction of the purchase system was that he believed every step towards it would not only more firmly ingrain it in the constitution of the army, but render it more difficult and ultimately more costly to abolish it. The speech of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) divided itself into two parts—first, a glowing eulogy on the system of the adjutant's statement. But what was the case? Why, that adjutancies in the Militia were sold every day, and that there were offices in which their sale and purchase were made. It was the same thing with the adjutants in the Volunteers. As a Member of one of the Royal Commissions, he was sent to the War Office to make inquiry as to the declarations taken by officers. A gentleman had informed him that as a rule no hesitation was shown by officers to make the declaration required of adjutants of Militia, but that some officers were too conscientious to take it. On his asking the gentleman how those who did make it could get over the matter, when it was so notorious that the office was one which every day formed the subject of purchase, he told him that some of them covered over the body of the declaration with a sheet of paper, so that they might subscribe their name without seeing what they were declaring to. The hon. and gallant Member for Truro would permit purchase up to the rank of senior captain, and what would be the effect of that arrangement when the lieutenant-colonelcy would no longer have to be purchased? Why, clearly, to make the senior captaincy worth so much more money in the market, and the removal of the three "turnpikes" in the lower grades would only have the effect of raising the demand of the two remaining to that which the five possessed before. The purchase system deprived the Commander-in-Chief of the opportunity of selecting the best officers for the superior ranks of the army. It might be said that the selection of those officers was well exercised. It was as well exercised as it could be under the circumstances; but the selection was confined within a particular pen. You could choose the best man out of those who had got in; but you could not choose the best man out of those whom your purchase system had kept out. Before an Army Commission which sat in 1857 it was stated that from 1817 not one officer had reached the rank of lieutenant-colonel without purchase. He believed that during the Crimean War two officers had reached that rank without ever having purchased, and that one or two had done so since the close of the Crimean War; but not one man had ever obtained the command of a brigade in the field, who for the previous twenty years had not purchased a step. General Havelock had purchased one step, or he would not have reached the command, and so had Lord

Mr. O'Reilly

Clyde. The fact that these men had only reached positions in which they did such service to their country in consequence of the accident of their having purchased one step showed us what men were left behind from want of the ability to purchase. Theoretically it was possible for a man to reach the rank of lieutenant-colonel by death vacancies; but the fact that not one officer had succeeded in doing so between 1817 and 1857 showed that practically the thing was not to be done. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief could appoint no officer to the command of a regiment of Cavalry who had not £16,000 more than the regulation price, and no officer to the command of a regiment of infantry who had not £4,000 or £5,000. A few months ago there was a case of an officer of Cavalry standing out to give no more than the regulation price, and immediately everyone cried out, "What a shameful thing!" As long as you left one turnpike you left the whole system. One was as bad as three. He cordially agreed with the hon. Member's last proposal to extend, enlarge, and liberalize our system of military education. For many years he had pondered over this question, and he ought to state that at the outset he had a strong feeling in favour of purchase in the army; but the more he considered it the more clearly he perceived that it led to evils which were never contemplated when it was originally introduced. He was, moreover, convinced that the system would be soon swept away, and he sincerely trusted it would be replaced by another system, under which we should obtain for our army a supply of gentlemanly and well educated officers. That desirable end could, in his opinion, only be attained by fixing a high standard of education. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that before long the gate of education, and not the gate of purchase, would be the entrance to our army.

COLONEL NORTH said, he thought his hon. Friend who brought forward the Motion (Mr. Trevelyan) could not seriously suppose its result would be at all favourable to his views. Was it likely that the Treasury and the country would be prepared to pay a very large sum of money in order to enable his hon. Friend to carry out certain fancies of his own against the general feeling of the army? Undoubtedly the operation of "purchasing over" was a very disagreeable one to the officers affected by it; but, nevertheless, he had no hesitation in declaring his belief that the genera

Member said ; and he knew an instance in which an officer refused to pay his quota. This system still prevailed in the non-purchase regiments in India, and if the purchase system was abolished here, what was to prevent officers coming forward in the same manner, and giving the value of his commission to the retiring officer ; the contributor knowing that he would receive back the value of his own commission when he himself retired : thus relieving the country from the payment of the value of the existing commissions ? What, then, became of this bugaboo, this bête noire of £10,000,000 that it was said would have to be paid if the purchase system were abolished ? No doubt, the change would be attended at first with some hardship in the lower ranks, but ultimately they would get the full benefit. If the purchase system was to be continued, in the name of all that was sacred, honourable, and just, he hoped they would not call upon a gentleman to make oath that he had not paid more than the regulation price for his commission when he knew that that was not the fact.

MR. H. HERBERT said, that there was no such oath.

COLONEL NORTH also said, that there was no oath of that kind, and never had been such an oath in the regular army.

COLONEL SYKES said, he was sorry that he had made a mistake ; but he had thought that there was some oath or declaration of that kind ; and his impression still was that some declaration was subscribed by officers appointed adjutants of Militia and Volunteers. In illustration of his argument that the purchase system prevented meritorious officers from rising, he (Colonel Sykes) would mention the case of an officer now senior subaltern, who had been born in the regiment, became sergeant-major, and for distinguished service and high character had an ensign's commission bestowed upon him by the Horse Guards. He saved enough money to buy a lieutenancy, and he had now risen to be the senior subaltern. The regiment being about to go to India, two extra companies had to be added to it, and it became accordingly necessary to have additional captains. He made an application for one of the companies, but the reply he received was, that, as a matter of economy, it was intended to give them to captains whose companies had been reduced on their regiments coming home from service abroad. Such a decision was plausible enough in itself ; but its effect was to deprive this meritorious officer of the chance of further promotion. It was small consolation to him to be assured by the military authorities of the War Office, after his case had been brought to their notice, that he should succeed to the first death vacancy. This, however, might not occur for many years to come ; and meanwhile officers with means at their command would pass over his head. This case afforded a practical illustration of what was going on in very many regiments. He trusted the time was coming when gentlemen would no longer desire to engage in pursuits so foreign to the military profession as bargaining with money for the attainment of position in the army.

GENERAL PEEL : I do not feel myself called upon to defend the original introduction of the system of purchase into the army, or to deny the objection which in theory exists to anybody being enabled to attain promotion or preferment merely because of his having the means to purchase an advance, while another officer, his equal in point of ability and merit, does not possess that facility. But do not let it be for a moment supposed that the system of purchase is confined to the army. There is not a class of life, from the highest to the lowest, in which people do not obtain appointments by means of money. Take the highest offices in the Church. Livings, which are the first step to those offices, are notoriously purchased. Take, again, the highest offices in the State. These can only be obtained by passing through this House—by a system of purchase, as everybody knows. [Laughter.] When I say purchase, I do not mean a purchase of seats, but such an expenditure of money as the law allows. Lawyers, for instance, rise to the summit of their profession by incurring an expenditure which other lawyers, possibly as clever as they, are not able to sustain. Now, as far as the purchase system in the army is concerned there is this consideration, which is not out of place when the subject is discussed in the House of Commons. The system was originally brought into play in consequence of the niggardliness and neglect of the State in not making provision for those who, through sickness, long service, or other circumstances, were desirous of retiring. And even now, by the action of the Army Reserve Fund, money is extracted from the purchasing officers, in order to pay for that which, if paid for at the shape of interest upon money expended in the purchase of commissions, and he also receives something every year for his services. If any young man without money about to enter the army should ask my views as to the regiment in which he should enter, I should say, "If you can possibly do so get into a regiment where every man but yourself can purchase; as long as there is any one man senior to yourself in the rank you hold you obtain an advantage from purchase. It is only when you become the senior in that rank that you are liable to be prejudiced; but in the long run you gain as much as you lose." The usual three courses are open to us with regard to promotion. There is, first, the present system; then there is the system of strict seniority, and lastly there is the system of partial seniority and partial selection. Now my hon. and gallant Friend who has just sat down quotes an instance to show that contribution is not compulsory, for he says he knew a case in which an officer refused his quota. Well, I have no doubt the general feeling about this officer was that he was a very shabby fellow for thus obtaining an advantage without contributing his share to the cost of it. That sort of thing will always prevail under a system of strict seniority. As to the selection, I have greater objection to it than to either of the two other systems. Depend upon it, you will never introduce a system of selection without creating jealousies and suspicions of unfairness—in all probability perfectly unfounded—which will rankle in the minds of the officers, and which you will be quite unable to remove. Very often the system of selection would necessarily place at the head of a regiment men who are not fit for the position. Take the case of an officer who has gained the Victoria Cross. A man may have gained that distinction by rushing out of the ranks or by some gallant action which has brought his name into the newspapers, and public opinion would raise a loud complaint if he were passed over, yet he might be the most unfit man in the service to take the command of a regiment. It is far from my wish to depreciate the value of the Victoria Cross; but I do not hold that it is a certificate entitling the bearer to everything, command of a regiment included. But it is said, "All this will depend upon the Commander-in-Chief; he will have the power of selection." No doubt; but then cases of another kind will arise. If you give this power to the Commander-in-Chief, you must give him the power of removing officers without Courts-martial; officers guilty of no military offence, but who are thought, from temper or other circumstances, to be unfit men to command a regiment. Why, this House would be inundated with complaints from men so treated. Suppose the senior major is passed over. What is his position? He is pointed out as a man unfit to hold command, and what authority can he have in the regiment afterwards? Yet the commanding officer may be killed in action, and instantly this major will be called upon to command the regiment. Again, the officer under him may be a very fit man, yet because his senior officer is thought incapable, he sees another man brought in and put over his head. I say that nothing would more tend to create jealousies in the army, particularly in time of peace. In my opinion the good officer is the man who goes with his regiment everywhere, and who shirks no service where they may be; but if he goes, for example, to the West Indies with them, what chance has he of being selected for command? Then it is proposed that the army shall be officered by two distinct classes of men, and that a certain number of commissions shall be reserved for men who rise from the ranks. Then you would have on the one hand young officers highly educated, and officers much older than they are, who have risen from the ranks, and whose knowledge would be entirely professional. Do you not suppose that they would be jealous at having over them comparative boys, who might be good mathematicians, but who knew little of drill or regimental duties? I hold in my hand a letter from an officer who himself rose from the ranks and became adjutant in a regiment in which promotion was not very quick, and what does he say?—

"Born in the army, and having entered it at about sixteen years of age from school, I naturally feel the greatest interest in everything connected with our military service. I was therefore alarmed when I read in the public prints that in the proposed re-organization of the Departments it is contemplated to abolish the purchase system, and to a certain extent substitute promotion by selection. If the abolition should be adopted for selection, the greatest discontent will exist from the notion of gross partiality. I have the firmest conviction that it would be a most fatal blow to the good feeling which should pervade our ranks of officers (and which happily now exists to the fullest extent), it would engender feelings of jealousy, as no selection during peaceable times can be viewed as impartial (unless by seniority), where there is no opportunity for distinguished conduct.

system? Now, could they afford to throw away that which, after forty years of peace, had proved its efficiency, solely for the purpose of making the officers more professional and preventing wealthy men from serving in the army? One of the greatest authorities on questions of this kind—namely, Lord Grey—stated in his evidence before the Commission that he held it to be a benefit conferred upon the country and on the wealthy men themselves that they should serve in the army. A great deal of evidence was given before the Commission to show that the officers of our army were at present indulging in all sorts of luxury, which could be done only by wealthy men. But he would ask, was it only in the army that an alarming increase in luxury had taken place? Did not young men at Oxford, at the Inns of Court, even in the navy, indulge in a similar way? Therefore, the two objects which Sir Charles Trevelyan had in view should not be sufficient to make the House at present declare that purchase should be entirely abolished, or to adopt the change proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Truro.

GENERAL PERCY HERBERT said, he was glad that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grenfell) had given notice that he would, if necessary, move the Previous Question, because he felt this was a very large matter, which ought not to be settled by a Resolution of the House. Though in favour of purchase in the army, as furnishing the best system of retirement that he was acquainted with, he was not so wedded to it but that he was ready to accept any other system which might accelerate the flow of promotion, without doing injury to the interests of officers, whether present or prospective. The hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trevelyan), though disclaiming the accusation as far as he was concerned, yet mentioned, as if he believed there was some truth in it, an allegation that had been made by others—namely, that officers of family sought for employment in purchase corps because they wished to have the pleasure of purchasing over the heads of others. Now, the object of officers of family was almost invariably to get into crack corps; and these were the very regiments in which scarcely more than one or two officers would be found in the whole list that were not for purchase. Therefore, it could not be for the pleasure of purchasing over the heads of others that men of family entered the service. Then the hon. Gentleman said that the longest purses formed the criterion of advance. But he begged to remind the hon. Gentleman that the longest purse would not give a man a single step until he became the senior on the list. Ours was a strictly seniority system, tempered by purchase. The senior on the list was offered the step, unless he was disqualified and the Commander-in-Chief exercised his authority, which was very rarely done, to prevent his advance. That was a point which was very much misunderstood—not only abroad, but even in this country; and he believed he had once before stated to the House that foreign officers who had talked to him on the subject had been greatly surprised when they were made acquainted with the truth. It was an erroneous impression to suppose that a man with £10,000 could purchase any step he pleased in the army. The hon. Gentleman also said that it was a reflection on the Commander-in-Chief for military men to say that if purchase were done away with, and the system of selection adopted, it would open the door to jobbery. But he had always noticed that on occasions of this kind the name of the Commander-in-Chief was paraded with the greatest respect by Members who at other times were fond of denouncing the Horse Guards—the “Horse Guards” being merely a euphemism for the Commander-in-Chief. In fact, there was scarcely a Session in which some of these denunciations were not indulged in by hon. Members. Some expressly desired the army should be democratized; but the late Lord Raglan had told him, about a fortnight before his death, that a French marshal warned him, in the most earnest terms, against so fatal a measure. He offered this opinion of a French officer of high rank to the House, because the French system was continually being pointed out as a model. He was assured, also, that nothing gave the French Government more trouble than the system of retirements in vogue in the French army. Our own police system, too, was often lauded on account of the ease with which it was recruited; but every man in the police force received about £1 1s. a week, while the soldier only drew some 9s. How could it be expected that artisans would enlist in the army at that price? But, at the same time, it must not be supposed the army was recruited wholly from the vicious classes; the majority of the recruits, although simple fellows, were decent agricultural labourers. He gathered from the Army List that 350 officers sold held out were very trifling. This was owing to the circumstance that there was, in this country, a very large leisure class, who were ready to place their sons or connections in the army. It was from this leisure class—consisting of tradesmen and men in all classes of business who had made money and who were anxious to seal their position by sending their sons into the army—and not exclusively from the aristocracy, that the officers of the army were principally obtained. There was no reason to expect that the supply would fall off; and as long as the two terms of officers and gentlemen were regarded as synonymous, he did not believe that any difficulty would be experienced in finding officers. The hon. Member for Tynemouth had advocated the admission of non-commissioned officers into the commissioned ranks. Now there were no men of whom, as a class, he had a greater respect than for the non-commissioned officers of the army; who, as a body, fulfilled very important duties, in such a manner, as to give satisfaction and procure for them the respect of their superior officers. But they were generally men of a certain age, contented with their position, and not influenced to any great extent by ambitious desires, while their wives were no more capable of entering a new sphere of life than they themselves were. The result of promoting a few of these men would, in his opinion, be to spoil the men so promoted, while the promotion of a large number would inevitably lead to a deterioration of the commissioned ranks. The experiment had been tried, and though it might answer to some extent in time of war; yet, where it had succeeded in one instance, in twenty cases it had failed. He did not believe that the proposal would find much favour even among the non-commissioned ranks. Under the present system of purchase, entry into the army was easy enough. A letter to the Commander-in-Chief, as a rule, at once secured the placing the name of the candidate on the list; and on lodging a certain amount of money, and passing an examination, a commission was obtained. That commission, however, was given in the order in which the candidate came out of the examination, and was not the result of bargain; for a man possessed of great wealth could not get his promotion one day earlier than the man who possessed only a fixed sum. Except in one particular case, too, an officer who had served a certain time would, on leaving the army, have his deposit money returned. Now, he would ask, from whom did the demand for the abolition of the purchase system come? Were they told that the Commander-in-Chief was unable to obtain the services of officers capable of performing the duties assigned to them? or did the demand for this sweeping change come from the officers themselves? On the contrary, those who were at all intimate with the officers of the army would bear him out when he said that they regarded the system with great favour. They did not enter the army without being fully aware of the nature of the system, and they knew, moreover, that by waiting a certain time their advancement would be a matter of great probability, if not of absolute certainty. He maintained that even those officers who did not purchase their promotions benefited by the present system. The hon. Member for Tynemouth said that the effect of the purchase system seemed to be that officers could not be persuaded that they were the servants of the Crown. According to his experience, on the contrary, it was their greatest pride and highest honour that they were serving Her Majesty, and for this they gave up the pleasures of home and took their turn of service abroad. It had been argued as a great advantage in the Indian system that at certain steps officers were called upon to pay a fine and make a contribution as a step towards buying out the officer at the head of the regiment. But these demands upon officers were made at uncertain and unexpected periods, so that officers were sometimes compelled to borrow money at usury. An officer was scarcely a free agent in the matter; for it was well known that if he were to show any spirit of contradiction and refuse to make the contribution expected of him means would be found to make him very uncomfortable in the regiment. Contrasted with such a plan the purchase system was much superior, because no attempt was made to compel an officer to pay more than was convenient to him. Then it was said that, without substituting any other plan for the purchase system, Parliament ought to place officers of the Cavalry, the Infantry, and the Guards in the same position as the Artillery. But had the system worked so well in the Artillery that it ought to be adopted in other branches of the service? On the contrary, promotion was so slow in the Artillery that an officer could hardly expect to be made a captain until he was an fied its unfairness. He did this with reluctance, from the fact of the gallant officer concerned being a near connection of the hon. and gallant Officer opposite (General Percy Herbert) whose professional merits he was happy to acknowledge, and who had well earned every step he had gained. He found by The Gazette that on the 9th March, 1867, Major Herbert was the junior major of the 84th Regiment, the senior major having purchased all his steps, and Major Herbert not having purchased his majority. On the 25th April, 1868, this Gentleman suddenly stepped at once to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 4th West India regiment, jumping at once by that one leap over the heads of 780 officers senior to him, many of whom must have been desirous of purchasing that step. It appeared, therefore, that the system was very far from being fair in its operation. The hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) had observed that a major-generalship could not be purchased, and pointed out the desirableness of certain situations in the army not being acquired by purchase. Now, was there any situation more important, or that more required to be filled by a man of thorough professional skill and ability than that of commander of a regiment? Yet that situation was placed within the reach of any one who had £1,500 or £2,000 at his disposal. The hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) said that promotion in the Artillery and Engineers was so slow that these corps were in a state of complete stagnation; but was he prepared to introduce the purchase system into them. They had just seen a military expedition conducted with unsurpassed skill and talent; and who was the commander of that expedition? He was a man who had never purchased a step; he belonged to the Engineers; and yet that was the man who had won bloodless battles by the superiority of his engineering and his artillery. Could it be said that the Artillery were inefficient? It was well known that the corps of Artillery, Engineers, and Marines, in which purchase never had existed and never would exist, were constantly referred to as the model corps of the British army. Why not, then, place our Infantry under the same system? He would grant that the systems of purchase might be retained with advantage for one branch of the military service—the Cavalry. That branch of the service was remarkably expensive, and looking at the cost of the uniform, the changes that often took place, and the general expensiveness, it was impossible for a man to enter the Cavalry unless he were possessed of means considerably beyond those which he derived from the State. It was said that many men entered the service for two or three years and then retired, conferring by their withdrawal considerable advantages on the non-purchase men. But he believed the disadvantages of this outweighed the advantages, from the unprofessional tone that was introduced. When the abolition of purchase was proposed in 1855, before the fall of Sebastopol, there had been so many vacancies in the army, and so many promotions without purchase, that if there had then been a Minister in power capable of appreciating the advantages of its abolition, that might have been effected at a cost which would have been but as a drop in the bucket compared with the vast total of expenditure for the Crimean War, and the whole vested interests of the officers of our army might have been purchased for a sum not exceeding £2,000,000. But that which would then have entailed only a charge of no great importance, would now be impossible without making demands on the public purse of a most onerous character. With the prospect of speedily separating and the uncertainty of their all meeting together again, would his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) like to answer that objection at the hustings? People would naturally say, "To carry out the new system would require an addition to the Income Tax of 2d. in the pound, and looking at the way in which your officers fight, and their excellent conduct generally, we do not think it would be at all desirable to saddle the country with such an expenditure." He believed that on account of the vast expense of a change, and for no other reason, it would be desirable that his hon. Friend should not push his Resolution to a division. His hon. Friend had done the cause good service by his able speech, and by eliciting the weakness of the arguments opposed to it, and he hoped and trusted they might live to see a change one day successfully effected.

GENERAL PERCY HERBERT craved permission to say a few words in explanation with regard to a gallant Relative of his whose case had been referred to by the hon. Member who had just spoken. The senior major of Major Herbert's regiment had refused to purchase promotion out of the regiment before it was likely to get good men for privates on account of the conscription, which brought in all classes. A common French soldier in the Crimea, he recollected being told, had been a civil engineer, and had built a famous bridge over the Loire, or some other French river, but being drawn by the conscription, and not being able to pay for a substitute, he served as a private soldier in the Crimea. Therefore, the French army had privates and non-commissioned officers such as the English army did not possess. But with respect to the proposition of giving commissions to non-commissioned officers—and let it not be supposed that he was opposed to carrying out that proposition in reason and moderation—it was desirable to hear the opinions of the non-commissioned officers themselves on that point. He believed that the hon. Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson) stated on a former occasion that in his regiment in the Crimea eight non-commissioned officers refused commissions. The sergeant-major in the regiment of Volunteers which he himself commanded was sergeant in the Army in 1863, and, being offered a commission, replied, “I make a very good sergeant, but shall make a very bad ensign.” Knowing that this discussion was to come on to-night, he asked that man to write a statement expressing his views and the views of other non-commissioned officers on the subject of promotion from the ranks. He had in consequence written a letter, in which he said that it was necessary that promotion by purchase should continue, or that otherwise promotion would be very slow; that it would take fifteen years to obtain a captaincy, thirty years to obtain a lieutenant-colonelcy, and forty-five years a major-generalship. He went on to state that the proposition to give commissions to non-commissioned officers was a great mistake; for after the first novelty was over the recipients found that they had made a great mistake in accepting them, and that they positively could not live on them; the consequence was that they were continually making applications to the Commander-in-Chief for small Staff appointments, and when they were refused they became more dissatisfied than ever. Very few ever rose to the rank of field-officer; for not being able to bear the expense to which they were put, they either left the service, or sought a living in the Colonies. Nor did the men like to be commanded by those who were formerly of their own class, but always said that they preferred to be commanded by gentlemen, who, if they did wrong, treated them with lenience, and like men; whereas a non-commissioned officer who had been promoted was much too sharp for them. The kind of commission which, in the opinion of the writer, should be given as a reward to deserving non-commissioned officers were commissions in the Commissariat, the Military Train, or the Military Stores Department, which were generally more lucrative, and did not require much moving about. The writer also thought, and he entirely agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Berkshire (Sir Charles Russell) in the justice of the claim, that every clerkship in the War Office, the Horse Guards, and the other military establishments should be given to men in the ranks. Civilians, he considered, had no claim to these appointments. He trusted his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Charles Russell) would be supported in his Motion on this subject. There were 623 clerkships which, in the opinion of this writer, ought thus to be thrown open. There was a story current, he did not know whether it was true or not, that the office-keeper at the War Office—who was in receipt of a major's pay, a position which many an officer's widow would naturally be glad to fill—was held by a French lady's maid. This was the line in which they ought to work in that House, and it would do more in getting good men for the Army than the 1st Resolution of his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Vivian). Mess expenses ought to be kept down. The purchase system was not responsible for them, but those who administered it. It was all humbug to say that regimental expenses could not be kept down. They could be kept down by having a Report on Regimental Expenses from the General inspecting, and there ought to be no difficulty in the matter. He wanted to know on what authority the present proposition had been brought forward. He maintained that the authorities were all the other way. The Commission of 1840, the speeches delivered in that House, the opinions of officers of the Army, of the civil administrators of the Army—the Duke of Wellington, Lord Raglan, the Duke of Cambridge, Mr. Ellice, Lord Grey, Lord Dalhousie, and Lord Herbert; for no one more strongly objected than Lord Herbert to total abolition—all these were in favour of the purchase system. Who is the most expensive army in the world? Past, present, and future Chancellors of the Exchequer are protesting that there never was anything so abominable as our Army Estimates. But, notwithstanding all that, this House and the country are content to go on with the most expensive army in the world. It does not suit the spirit of our generous people to submit to a conscription or compulsory system. It is the determination of the country to have an army on the voluntary system, and to have that in a highly-civilized country like England makes it necessary that our army should be a very costly one. Is it not a great anomaly that our generals are paid as they are a very inadequate salary, which may become a very handsome one when they are appointed to the honorary command of a regiment? Is it not an anomaly that we should give our soldiers an extravagant rate of pay as compared with what is given to the soldiers of other countries, while we pay our officers a small pittance which is hardly enough—indeed, I may say it is not enough—to enable them to maintain their position? No doubt, in respect of all those matters the Government should introduce such reforms as they may consider necessary; but my duty in dealing with a question like the one now before the House is to consider, not what might be best in the abstract, but what the interests of the army and of the country really required. I hope I may say without any presumption that I have shown I am not indisposed towards army reform. I am at present engaged in the laborious duty of endeavouring to re-organize the Administrative Department; and recently I have introduced a system by which the whole of our Reserve Forces are put under one officer—a system which has already been attended with most beneficial results. When the noble Lord the Member for South Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) the other day proposed that there should be a Commission on Education in the Army, from the moment he gave his Notice I had no hesitation about supporting his Motion; because I agree with the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) that the military training of the army is one of the most important questions connected with the subject of military reform. If you persevere in your present system of purchase in the army, it is most important that your officers should have the advantage of a good military education. On the other hand, if the system is to be changed, it would be equally important that you should have well-educated and well-trained officers to take the place of those now attached to the army. Before I proceed to notice more particularly the objections urged against the purchase system, this admission I most distinctly make—namely, that, in one class of cases, a severe grievance does arise from that system, as it is at present in operation. I allude to the cases in which young officers who have bought their commissions die. Many distressing cases of this character have been brought under my notice; and I have no doubt that, speaking of his own experience at the War Office, the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) could make a similar statement. Under a regulation made in recent years, if an officer is wounded, and if he dies within six months, the money paid for his commission is returned to his family; but in case of death from climate or disease, this is not done, and frequently much distress is the consequence. I do think it is well worthy of consideration whether something may not be done to prevent the purchase system from working the harm which it does in that way. Let me now touch on the alleged hardship of the rich man being enabled to purchase over the head of the poor man. I believe that no portion of the subject has attracted so much public sympathy, and created so much prejudice, if prejudice there be, against the purchase system, as this idea of the poor man being purchased over by the rich man. But, I believe—and I think I may challenge contradiction of my statement—that this is an idea rather than a fact. The truth is that the non-purchasing officers of the Line obtain promotion more rapidly under the purchase system than they would in a non-purchasing corps. I hold in my hand a statement of all the lieutenants promoted between April, 1867, and March in the present year. The whole number promoted was 183 by purchase and 51 without purchase. The average service of the former was nine years and sixty-four days; that of the latter eleven years and thirty days—that is, less than two years' longer service than those promoted by purchase. We heard a great deal this evening about the Artillery, and I think there is a great deal of misconception about the present state of that branch of the service. The fact is that if the promotion in the Artillery is not very rapid, the officers have had very little to complain of since the Crimean War. The

we should induce a very different class of men to enter our army as privates. Now, I doubt very much whether that result would follow, and whether we should succeed in obtaining a supply of men qualified to become officers. Before quitting this branch of the subject I must refer to the desire of my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire in connection with this question of promotion—that the object of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Berkshire (Sir Charles Russell) should be carried out, and that retired soldiers should be employed as clerks in the public offices. I believe he has impressed upon the House the advisability of extending that system to other public offices; but, as regards the War Office, I may say that it is now, and has been for some time, in full operation. [Lord ELCHO: How many soldiers are there out of the 623 clerks?] I cannot state just at present the exact number; but it must be borne in mind that the system has not been long established. It has only been lately tried; but soldiers are being constantly appointed to such clerkships as they are competent to hold. As to what my noble Friend said about the appointment of a French lady's-maid as house-keeper at the War Office, I can only state that it was not made by me, and that I know nothing about it. I think the cost of doing away with the purchase system would be so great as to justify me in urging the House to pause before they venture on making so large an expenditure for so very doubtful a result. The hon. Gentleman has not even mentioned the whole expense which would be incurred. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) indeed referred to the fact that, in addition to the purchase money of all the commissions you must also be prepared with a retirement system. But even that is not all, because, upon the showing of the hon. Member for Tynemouth, you must, if you adopt his plan, not only pay the price of the commissions and provide a system of retiring pensions for officers on their leaving the service; but you must in addition introduce a class of officers who would not be content with the present low rate of pay. Thus of course we should be involved in the additional expense of a much higher rate of pay. To these very serious considerations let me add a warning, founded on our practical experience of what is going on at this moment with regard to the Royal Artillery—a non-purchase corps. Last year a Committee was appointed, and presided over by my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) who understands this subject better than most men in this House. My hon. Friend presented a very able Report as the result of the labours of that Committee, in which a system of retirement in the Royal Artillery was recommended, and he has evinced upon several occasions a great desire that I should carry that proposal into effect. I suspect, if he were a Member of any Government that came into power, he would find it very difficult to induce his Colleagues to carry out so costly a plan as was recommended. I have had the subject under anxious consideration, and, if I may be allowed to say so without pledging myself, I do hope, if I retain my present position, in the course of the present Session to submit a plan which may do something for the Royal Artillery without embarking us in the expense involved in the course proposed by my hon. and gallant Friend. I confess I am rather surprised by the references made to the French army. Without meaning to disparage that noble army, the courage and achievements of which are indisputable, I would say that it furnishes a warning of arrangements with respect to officers to be avoided rather than followed. You ought to have young and vigorous officers; but it is notorious that the French army is not officered by such, and if you see a regiment of French infantry with the line different to what it ought to be, the probability is the irregularity will be due to some portly old captain or lieutenant. In the French army there is a system of compulsory retirement at a certain age, and the retiring pension is so small that the officer clings on to the last moment that the regulations will allow him before exposing himself to the privations consequent on retirement. I rejoice sincerely at the tone of the debate in reference to these proposals for sudden and violent change. I do not pretend that the present system is perfect; but we must be cautious how we deal with our army. I will say the less of the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) as I understand it is his intention to withdraw it; but in candour I must say that I cannot view the Amendment in the light in which it has been regarded by some of the speakers who have preferred it. Many seem to think that it would be a great

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. ACLAND rose to call attention to the inconvenience arising from the want of an authority specially charged with the duty of considering questions affecting agriculture and the food of the people, and to move for a Committee to inquire into and report upon the Functions of various Government Offices so far as they affect Questions relating to Agriculture, with a view to provide for the due consideration of such Questions by one Department responsible to Parliament. He had therefore to establish two points. 1. That there are subjects connected with land and agriculture requiring the attention of some public authority responsible to Parliament. 2. That there is prima facie ground for an inquiry into the functions of certain existing Departments of the Public Service, with a view to consolidate their duties connected with land, and to make better provision for the discharge of those duties. His reasons for bringing forward this Motion were, first, because of the very active interest in legislation which was now growing up among agriculturists, and especially among tenant-farmers, evinced by the institution of Chambers of Agriculture; and secondly, because of the discussions likely to occur with reference to the land laws, between which and the cost of the food of the people there was, in the opinion of some persons, an intimate connection. On this second point he quoted the opinion of a very able writer in the volume of Essays on Questions for a Reformed Parliament. After speaking of speculations on the price of food in towns, the writer proceeded—

“Sound or not, these speculations point to one inference, which is—that there is the most intimate connection between the food supply of the cities and the freedom of the land. In whatever degree our agricultural system checks the outlay of capital, or militates against security of tenure, it tends to diminish the productiveness of agriculture and to raise the price of food in towns.”

He (Mr. Acland) was well aware that, however some persons might think the prosperity of agriculture bound up with excessively high prices, the county Members of this House were far too well-informed to sanction such a doctrine, or to give any countenance to the opinions that the owners or occupiers of land were jealous of the abundance of food for the people. He wished to clear the ground by stating what he did not propose. He did not propose that the English Government should, as the French Government did, teach the practice and science of agriculture, or undertake duties which were here better left to private effort; but in one respect, perhaps, we might follow the example of our neighbours. The French Minister of Agriculture had under his charge a large number of haras for the breeding of horses, and had some authority to prevent unsound stallions from going about the country as they did with us, doing an infinite amount of mischief. He had taken part in the earnest endeavours of voluntary societies to do what could be done by such agency in the way of certificating sound horses in England, but voluntary effort had entirely failed to effect the desired object, and perhaps the Government might interfere with advantage. He would venture to say that if some noblemen would use their abilities—which in some cases were very considerable, and which were not used much to their own advantage on the Turf—in assisting the Government on this subject, they might render great public service to the agriculturists of England. Among the subjects requiring the attention of a provincial or central administration was our system of roads, whether national, county, or parochial. Another point was how we were to get cheap railways—branches from the main lines—carried into the rural districts, where there was no inducement for capitalists to take shares. It had been suggested to him by a county Member sitting on the other side of the House that it might be possible to get such railways with sharp curves and low speed constructed at a cheap rate by means of an assessment on the landed property of the district. He was not prepared to say that this was a practicable plan, but it was certainly one which deserved serious attention. Looking again at our systems of water supply, of drainage, of sewage, and irrigation, it was plain that these could be only carried out effectually when dealing with very large areas. Some attempts had been made by Parliament to deal with river basins, as in the case of the Thames and the Shannon; but the process was expensive, and the result unsatisfactory. The difficulties in the way of individual landowners, or even of the smaller towns wishing to enter upon improvements of this character, were almost insuperable. At the present moment there was practically a deadlock as to the taking of land for sewage. Towns were forbidden to pour their sewage into running streams, and yet the powers indispensable for the acquisition of lands by them for the purposes of sewage utilization were uncertain. There was a growing necessity for some administrative power to carry out the public Acts which had been passed. On this subject he would read the opinion of a very competent judge, the Secretary of the Local Government Department of the Home Office, Mr. Tom Taylor—

“All the larger questions of drainage involve most serious difficulties, both as respects the determination of drainage areas, the appointment of proper local authorities for superintending drainage schemes, assessment of their cost, &c., and these questions daily grow more pressing. It is difficult to see how they can much longer be dealt with without some central authority specially charged with the subject. To such an authority would belong the initiation and guidance of inquiries in connection with sewage and its distribution, and the granting powers for the taking of land for the purpose of sewage application.”

To this testimony he must add a statement which he had on the authority of the Medical Officer of the Privy Council, and fully established by evidence to be in the hands of Members in a few days—that there is an intimate connection between the amount of phthisis or consumption and the want of drainage in large districts. The conflicting areas of local administration formed another great source of confusion. There were already in existence parishes, townships, hamlets, highway districts, ecclesiastical districts, Poor Law unions, burial board districts, registration districts, special drainage districts, under the Sanitary Act and Sewage Utilization Act, and no two of these were necessarily coterminous. A Parliamentary Return had been called for with a view of ascertaining what had been the effect of recent legislation on the subject of drainage, and out of 700 districts it was found possible to get answers only from thirty, in the other cases there being no correspondence whatever between the areas of drainage and registration. Then they had the action of the Inclosure Commissioners who discharged duties of very high importance, but were not directly responsible to the House; and also of the speculative drainage and improvement companies, who were usually responsible to the Inclosure Commissioners, but exercised powers of their own in the way of charging encumbrances upon posterity, one of them he knew being subject to no limit of time.

These various bodies he maintained should be made directly responsible to the House. The manner in which agriculturists, during the prevalence of the cattle plague, had been referred from one Government Department to another had impressed upon them very strongly the desirability of some better organization on all subjects relating to the cattle trade, markets, and fairs. Closely connected with the subject of cattle was the improvement of the veterinary profession—a matter to which no little importance was attached by farmers, who desired that effective measures should be taken for the education of properly qualified practitioners in the different grades. When the cattle police of the country, so to speak, depended upon the opinions of men in such a position, it became of the highest importance that they should be properly trained to the discharge of their duties. With regard to all the subjects which he had enumerated, he submitted that they were either clogged by obsolete customs, or by modern but incoherent legislation, or controlled by persons not practically responsible, or by high Ministers of State having many other duties and no qualified staff of assistants; or they were simply left to take their chance. To what quarter were they to look for improvement in administration or legislation? The questions on which he had touched had several aspects. On their economical side they would naturally look to the Board of Trade, on their sanitary side to the Privy Council; but, as regarded fiscal matters, to the Home Office. The advantage of the public lay in combining these several functions in one office responsible to public opinion. He contended, without any disrespect to the persons at the head of these offices, that in none of these Departments was the fact recognized that special knowledge and training and experience were required to be at the disposal of the office in order to deal with land questions; nor is any one office specially charged with the consideration of these questions as a whole. He was far from advocating the creation of any new or costly Department; on the contrary, he believed that better administration might be obtained with considerably diminished cost. At present the country was called upon to bear the expense of the Inclosure Commission, the Cattle Plague Office, and the Statistical Office. He estimated that the amount voted by Parliament annually for subjects connected with agriculture was for salaries alone above £25,000. If the Office of Woods and Forests, the Board of Works in Ireland, and some temporary charges were included the salaries would be over £70,000, and the aggregate official expenditure nearly £110,000. This amount it was the aim and tendency of his Motion to diminish, not to increase. He referred for the items to a paper which he held in his hand, but he would not trouble the House with all the details. Now having established the fact that there were subjects to be attended to and offices whose functions and expenses called for inquiry, he wished to state shortly what he considered to be the legitimate functions of Government as follows:—To remove obstacles caused by obsolete custom or inconsistent legislation; to protect those who cannot help themselves; to collect information, test its accuracy, and put it into a systematic and accessible form; to stimulate and supervise the discharge of local duties; and, finally, to raise an authoritative standard of competency for public duties. He had endeavoured to show, not with a view to class legislation, nor in the interest of any party, that there were important subjects connected with land, food, and health, which demanded the serious attention of that House, with a view to more comprehensive legislation, and more systematic administration; and that as matters now stood the profitable application of capital to land was impeded. He would ask the House to consider what that meant in its effect on the labouring population. The power of the labourer to pay for a healthy and decent dwelling depended on his wages; his wages depended on demand; the demand on the amount of capital available for agriculture. What he had urged was part only of a very large subject. That subject was not less than a re-construction of our provincial administration guided by the action of a well-informed Government, and supported by public opinion. He reminded the House that there was a growing conviction that something more than honest intentions were expected of a Government. They lived in an age not only of inquiry but of scientific progress; sound government demanded an accurate knowledge of facts, and science was but the systematic accumulation and knowledge of facts. He had shown that their present system was chaotic, and that it was not money that was wanting but organization, both central and local. At present they had in their public offices neither the special training, nor the knowledge, nor the experience, nor the distribution of labour, nor the presiding control needed to help the nation to help itself. If the Government would not agree to the appointment of a Committee in the present state of public affairs, they might appoint a Royal Commission which could continue its sittings in the autumn. The hon. Member concluded by moving for a Select Committee.

MR. READ rose to second the Motion. He said, that this was a question which deeply interested his constituents, and in which he had taken an interest for a very long time. He disclaimed any desire to revive the old Board of Agriculture, which many said had been a failure, but from which, nevertheless, might be dated almost all our agricultural improvements before steam and cheap education had taught people to help themselves. We had no need of State assistance to do what agricultural societies did much better. We did not want such a Minister of Agriculture as in France, where the Government did everything and the public nothing; but what we wanted was local means of enforcing public regulations; and in order to make any sort of regulations certain, swift, and general, we must possess a better organization than we had at present. There were practical inconveniencies which he had experienced in his dealings with the Government administration with respect to the cattle plague. On the subject of the cattle plague he had a good deal of experience, because he represented the greatest winter-grazing county in England; he had the honour of being a Cattle Plague Commissioner, and the misfortune to be a farmer whose herds had been ravaged by the disease. In his dealings with Government on this subject he had found that if he wanted to know anything about fairs and markets he must go to the Home Department; if about importations he must go to the Privy Council; while on the subject of statistics and cattle transit it was the Board of Trade that must be applied to. So much inconvenience, however, had been found to arise from this distribution of duties, that the Government of the day had thought proper to huddle them up together and to institute a body over which a colonel of Engineers and afterwards a philosophical doctor were appointed to preside. The result was that the only persons satisfied were the butchers of London, who were not very desirous of giving their cuspurpose ; immediately something new had to be done a new department had to be constituted ; the present system had no elasticity, it was based on no settled principle, all was chaotic, and any one who contributed anything towards reducing this chaos to order deserved the thanks of the community.

MR. M'LAGAN deplored the absence of a department which could utilize by bringing into a focus the experience gained by the various agricultural societies scattered throughout the kingdom. Great efforts had been made by some societies to extend a knowledge of veterinary science, particularly in Scotland, where ineffectual attempts had been made to gain a charter for improving the means of veterinary education. Unless Returns were brought together they were comparatively valueless, and a central office would discharge a useful task if they collected and published in an accessible form the agricultural Reports annually received from our Consuls and Colonial Governors which were now scattered through the blue books. In the United States there was a Commissioner of Agriculture, who corresponded with the agricultural societies, collected information at home, and despatched agents to procure information abroad, as well as to bring home the seeds of new plants, which were given to farmers to experiment with. He likewise superintended entomology and other departments of science, as also the industrial arts ; and two years ago the subject of his investigations was the question of a substitute for cotton. An officer of this kind would, he thought, be useful in this country, and one subject which would come under his cognizance would be the adulteration of food, which was carried on to so enormous an extent. The Society of Arts was now conducting an inquiry into the various kinds of food and their qualities, and into the sources necessary for the supply of the English people. Now such an investigation would be more properly undertaken by a Government Department. Agricultural statistics, agricultural education, the produce of lands and rivers, enclosures, food, and the cattle plague might all be included in the proposed Department. While, however, prepared to vote for the hon. Member's (Mr. Acland's) Motion, he thought it might be better at this period of the Session to obtain the appointment of a Commission.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he thought the administrative confusion manifested in the case of the cattle plague was an argument in favour of his hon. Friend's proposition.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he listened with anxiety to the proposal of the hon. Member for North Devon, and referring to the subject of local taxation the hon. Gentleman said that a Minister of Agriculture ought to have nothing to do with the matter of local taxation. Some improvements might, no doubt, be made in other matters connected with agricultural Returns, &c. ; but the subject could be very well dealt with by the Board of Trade. He did not undervalue what had been said by the various speakers with reference to the cattle plague and its ravages in this country ; but the insular position of this country afforded great facilities for preventive measures by the proper regulation of our ports with reference to the provision of proper quarantine sheds and layers for the cattle under directions from the Board of Trade, as a primary means of guarding against the introduction of the disease ; but strange to say, objections had been raised to it in the Committee now sitting on the subject. The Royal Veterinary College had sent its professors in each of the two years, previous to the inroad of the cattle plague, to places on the Continent, to watch its progress, and had warned the Government and the public of its approach and of its incurable character. But the knowledge of the veterinary surgeons of this country had been disparaged. He could state from his own knowledge that the veterinary profession warned the country two years before any steps were taken to guard against the disease. He was connected with the Royal Veterinary College, and he knew that the professors were sent for two years to watch the progress of the disease abroad, and through the Royal Agricultural Society repeated warnings were given to guard against the disease, and yet for three months after the advent of the disease, because they could not cure an incurable malady which ought to have been barred out by the Government, they were spoken of in disparaging terms. In answer to what had been said as to Scotland's needing a charter for the veterinary profession, he replied that Scotland had a charter which was obtained through the instrumentality of the Highland Society, and the only real grievance was that an attempt was made to get rid of that charter, and that a separate charter was refused by the Board of Trade. Members would be compelled by their constituents to vote in support of the system of local management, for which there had always been displayed so strong a predilection. He quite admitted the importance of the considerations upon which the hon. Member for North Devon had dwelt; but the hon. Member would not, he trusted, press his Motion to a division, a course which, in his opinion, would not tend to secure the results at which his hon. Friend was aiming.

LIBEL BILL—[BILL 3.]

(Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. Baines.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, in moving "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," expressed a hope that his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) would not move the Amendment of which he had given notice, "That this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee." Last Session the Bill, after very ample discussion, passed that House by a majority of 70 or 80, and this Session, on the Motion for the second reading, it was again discussed at some length. Every objection that had been made could be discussed on going through the clauses in Committee. As the Bill was in no way connected with religion, it was not one in respect of which he should have supposed his hon. Friend would take so extraordinary a step as that of opposing the Motion for going into Committee. It was true that last November some parties issued a circular in which it was stated that the measure was a bribe to the Press to advocate Popery; but he could assure his hon. Friend that the Bill had not emanated from the Jesuits, nor been submitted to the Propaganda.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

MR. NEWDEGATE observed, that the thin state of the House would in itself be a justification for the Amendment which he intended to move. With respect to the observations of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), he had only to observe that the hon. and learned Baronet himself had introduced the opinions of the Papacy against free discussion, and that he must leave to the hon. and learned Baronet the responsibility of having cited those opinions. He opposed the Bill because its principle was a reversal of the principle of Lord Campbell's Act. In his early years that eminent lawyer was engaged in reporting in both Houses of Parliament; so that his

the public advantage. Because a thing was true it did not follow that it ought to be multiplied by millions of copies and spread all over the country. That depended upon whether the propagation of that truth was calculated to do good or evil. Could it be for the interest of any person or class that all the slanders and spite of every petty local meeting should be accurately published? Suppose a gas meeting in some provincial town, the speakers at which departed from its object into personal disputes and slanderous altercation—would anyone say that it was for the public advantage that these slanders should be printed in newspapers, and dispersed over the whole country? Nothing but mischief could follow. Such a report indeed was not true in the proper sense of the word; and the newspaper containing it only became a vehicle for the dissemination of libels that would otherwise have been strangled in the moment of their birth. Newspapers, it should be remembered, were published in the way of trade, and for purposes of profit, and had no care about the propagation of truth. At present there was sufficient security for the fidelity of reports in the mere circumstance that in order to maintain the reputation of a newspaper such fidelity must be a conspicuous feature. The supporters of the Bill asked why the editor should be liable; the answer was that he was the person who did the real mischief. People in the country were not so dexterous as hon. Members in that House in the selection and application of epithets and in running close by the edge of slander, without passing over it. A man under the influence of momentary passion or of liquor made an angry speech at an acrimonious public meeting; the mischief done by his slander was aggravated an hundred, nay, a thousand, times by its publication. Only imagine the pain inflicted by the dissemination of the slander in hundreds or thousands of copies. It was said that the publication was only in the ordinary way of business; but the ordinary way of business ought to be different. It was the obvious duty of a newspaper editor to look through the reports of such meetings, and to take care that nothing was published which was calculated to inflict injury on individuals. It was said that newspaper reports were brought out in a hurry, and that allowance should be made for that circumstance. But journalism was as much a trade as any other calling in life, and those who followed it ought to be as much responsible for what they did in the way of their calling as the chemist or druggist for what he sold in the way of his business. The argument of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), was that the person aggrieved would have a remedy against the original utterer of the slander. Now on this he had to observe, that this was the first time that an attempt was made to punish A B for a crime he did not commit, and to make C D irresponsible for a crime which he did commit. The original utterer was liable already, but not for libel. Such a man might speak from misapprehension; he might be convinced of his mistake a few days after he had made his speech; might offer an apology and have it accepted; and yet, in the course of the following week, several thousand copies of the libel might be circulated over the kingdom in the columns of a newspaper. At the present day the Press was so admirably conducted that he should be sorry to see any measure passed which would tend to make its managers less careful in excluding libellous matter. On these grounds he should certainly support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire.

MR. NEATE said, he thought the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had done quite right in taking issue before going into Committee, especially as the Bill was a very short one, and as an attempt was about to be made to strike out the 3rd clause, and thereby to deprive aggrieved persons of the remedy which the Bill, taken as a whole, would give them. That remedy, however, was quite insufficient. For instance, it was no uncommon thing, in railway meetings, for some ignorant person to charge Members of that House with having a corrupt interest in railway legislation; and though it might be published in all the newspapers, yet according to this Bill there would be no remedy except against the utterer of the slander, who, as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had said, might be a mere man of straw. Newspaper editors usually exercised their discretion very judiciously in eliminating objectionable remarks made at public meetings, and as an instance he might mention that the reports of a recent meeting, where very strong intemperate language was used respecting the conduct of the House of Commons, contained no allusion to that language. He was willing to admit that whatever the state of the law was the present race of those against it, he should vote for going into Committee.

MR. J. GOLDSMID said, he was in favour of the Bill as an extension of the Act of 1843. He thought the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers) had absurdly exaggerated what he considered the dangers likely to flow from this Bill. It was not at all likely that any respectable paper, with a large circulation, would trouble itself to insert slanderous or scurrilous matter spoken by some worthless person at a small local meeting. The Committee who had inquired into the subject were of opinion that, when defamatory language uttered at a meeting was afterwards published in the ordinary way in the newspaper, the action should not lie against the proprietor of such paper, but against the person who deliberately uttered the language alleged to be libellous.

MR. WHALLEY said, he must oppose the Bill. He could not help apprehending that things might occur such as were suggested by the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers). He had known things said about himself, conveying the most offensive imputations about the motives of his public conduct and proceedings, which were actually printed and disseminated in newspapers by hundreds and thousands over the country. The mischief that was done by a report of slanderous statements could not be measured by the circulation of the small country paper in which it might originally appear; because that report might be copied into other journals and circulated all over the world. Some severe remarks had been made in a country paper upon his conduct as Chairman of a Railway Company; and though the proprietor was afterwards compelled to confess in a Court of Law that those remarks were false and malicious, yet they were copied into all the journals that were opposed to his (Mr. Whalley's) public conduct; and copies of those journals were forwarded to his constituents. The real object of the Bill was to convert slander into libel; and he submitted no case had been made out for such a change. He called upon the House not to commit itself to a measure which might seriously compromise the public interests. The proper course would be, if a change in the law were to be made, for the Government to take up the question and deal justly in the matter, in a large spirit—not prompted merely by the consideration of cases of individual grievances. For his own part he considered that the change was not required, and that there could be very little doubt that the Jesuits were at the bottom of the matter. The Protestant associations of this country—no matter what might be the contempt with which they were regarded by this House—were likely yet to influence the public opinion of this country considerably, and it was the object of the Jesuits to put them down; and, as a first step to that, to fetter the newspapers which went against Jesuitism, by converting slander into libel. He had declared, Session after Session, for five years—in season and out of season—what would happen. They were not at the end, but at the beginning of their difficulties—brought about, to a great extent, by the perseverance of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), who was undoubtedly inspired by the Jesuits.

MR. SERJEANT ARMSTRONG said, there was no novelty of principle in the Bill, while the state and progress of public society rendered it a necessity. He thought that the 3rd clause of the Bill was a necessary corollary to the 1st and 2nd; because, if it was just to afford protection to the newspaper proprietor, it would be unfair to give the maligned party no redress against the author of the slander. He believed the Bill would really prevent slander.

MR. COLERIDGE said, he coincided in the objections which had been taken to the Bill by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, and should vote with him in case he divided the House, though not from the fear of any combination of Jesuits or other persons. He did not agree with the assertion of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong) that the Bill made no important change in the law, for it really made a most important one in the wrong direction. The strongest argument against it was that it required the introduction of the 3rd clause to make it palatable, and the opinion of the Attorney General was that unless the 3rd clause was retained the Bill would prove most mischievous. Already public comments upon the public acts of public men were privileged. It was only when private character was attacked that the law was stringent, and it was right that in such cases there should be some restriction on publication. Why should a private, harmless man be dragged out of his privacy by the publication of a slander in a newspaper? Why should he be put to the annoyance and expense of defending his character? Why should he be put to the trouble of writing a long letter to a paper to refute that which would not be worth the trouble of refutation but for the importance given to it by its appearance in print. At present protection was given against the publication of defamatory matter, and he did not see why the publication of personal slanders uttered at quasi-public or semi-private meetings should have any peculiar and exceptional privilege thrown around them. Under the 3rd clause, if the newspaper proprietor refused to insert a retraction of alleged defamatory matter, the person aggrieved might bring an action against the speaker as if he had written what the newspaper reported. He thought this a very ineffective kind of remedy. The remedy against the utterer of a slander was more difficult than against a newspaper, for there was more difficulty in proving spoken than in proving written words. The Bill would give the remedy against the wrong person, for the great mischief was caused by the publication. The newspaper, and not the obscure slanderer, ought to be held responsible. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had said that truth in reporting was the great object. Now, although truth was a most desirable thing, accuracy was not so very desirable if the matter stated was not true.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, he hoped the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) would persevere in his opposition to the Bill, which would be mischievous and dangerous in its results, and was not called for by the present state of the law. He thought the House ought to hesitate long before introducing the change now proposed. Its object was to protect a newspaper proprietor from liability for printing a libel, provided he did not originate the injury, and he might therefore publish it from printed matter. If newspaper proprietors were thus protected in the publication of second-hand libels there would be no limit to them. The defence had been already set up in Ireland, but without success; and, indeed, if such a defence were admissible, it would be possible to re-produce in this country slander or treason spoken at a legally convened meeting in New York and reported in the American papers. He believed that newspapers had all the protection that was necessary, so long as sufficient care was exercised in their management.

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY said, the main question was—who was the guilty party; the speaker who uttered the libel, or the newspaper which published it? He contended it was perfectly plain that the speaker was the guilty party. He quite agreed that it was not desirable to report every word spoken at every little village meeting; but, at the same time, there was nothing to prevent the newspaper editor exercising proper discretion. There were discussions of great public importance which it was well to have fairly and fully reported, and this was especially the case with respect to the proceedings of great public companies. In his opinion the most dangerous calumny was not a statement in the public Press which might be publicly contradicted, but a private slander repeated from mouth to mouth. For his own part, if a charge were made against him at a public meeting he should prefer the exact words of the speaker to be given in the report. He hoped the 3rd clause would not be omitted, for if it were it would be impossible to bring an action against either the newspaper proprietor or the speaker in the event of the report being accurate. The feeling of the majority of the Members of the Select Committee to whom this Bill was referred was that it was just and right to transfer the responsibility from the newspaper to the person who uttered the libel.

MR. LAWSON, as a Member of the Select Committee to whom this Bill was referred, wished to say a few words on the subject. He conceived it to be the interest of the public to know what took place at public meetings, and this Bill was merely an extension to other cases of a well-known principle already acknowledged in the law, and that was, that if a newspaper gave a bond fide, truthful report of what took place in a Court of Justice it was protected from any action. And why? Because it was the interest of the public to know what took place in Courts of Justice, and because the fact that a person was merely communicating to the public what had really taken place removed the impression that he was actuated by malice or any other motive that would render him liable to an action. It was often equally the interest of the public to know what occurred at a meeting of shareholders of a public company. Should not the shareholders know what was said at meetings of their company about the doings of their Directors? The Attorney General for Ireland spoke of the case of a Fenian meeting in New York. He (Mr. Lawson) contended that it would be to the interest of the public that the proceedings of the meeting should be made known. The substance of the matter was this—were they to protect the public Press in the bond fide discharge of a difficult and arduous duty, in which their interest concurred with that of the public, or were they to leave the newspapers subject to frivolous and vexatious actions which were often instituted for the sake of costs? This was the real point of the case. It was not the duty of a reporter to expurgate from the proceedings of a public meeting matter of a libellous nature, but to give an accurate account of what occurred. Was the reporter or editor to constitute himself the judge of what the speaker ought to have said?

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not desire to restrain the liberty of the Press in any way; but he thought that newspaper proprietors were sufficiently protected at present, and that Parliament should pause before it did anything which would be an encouragement to penniless persons to publish slanders upon private character. That would be the effect, he feared, of this Bill should it become law. He did not think it right that parties should be put to the expense and trouble of repudiating charges which might be altogether unfounded. If slanders were uttered, he trusted Parliament would not give facilities for promulgating them. Generally speaking, the English Press was an honour to the country; but there were badly-conducted journals whose interest it might be to publish calumnies.

MR. BUXTON said, that law should be founded on justice; and, in the present instance, justice demanded that the man who uttered a libel, being the really guilty party, should alone be made responsible.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the question was not a party question, nor was this a Government Bill. He confessed that he was disinclined to the Bill, which he thought would be a protection for the careless and ill-conducted newspaper, and was not wanted by the well-conducted Press of the country. It was said that the guilty person was he who uttered the slander; but the question was, whether the mischievous person was not he who gave it publicity? Slander when uttered at a small meeting, in a small place, might be of no great importance; but when circulated throughout the country it might have a most injurious effect. He agreed with the Attorney General that if the 1st clause of the Bill were passed the Bill would be a most mischievous one if the 3rd clause were not passed also. His hon. and learned Friend accepted the Bill solely on the supposition that the 3rd clause would be passed if the Bill were passed; but, for his own part, he must say that not even the 3rd clause could reconcile him to the Bill.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN denied that this was a Bill introduced in the interests of the ill-conducted journals. A hundred petitions had been presented from newspapers in favour of the Bill, together with a petition from the Provincial Newspaper Press Association, which included the proprietors of 200 newspapers; and it would hardly be said that all these were "ill-conducted." The organs of all shades of opinion were in favour of the measure; and he reminded the House of the great expenses to which newspapers were put by actions of this class, though juries might return verdicts against them for merely nominal damages. The privilege which newspapers now enjoyed in publishing the proceedings of Courts of Justice was mere Judge-made law; and it was actually doubtful at this moment whether the same privilege attached to the publication of the proceedings of Parliament. In the case of "Wason v. The Times" the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench had decided that there was such a privilege; but the question was still sub judice. This was not a state of the law which ought to be preserved, and it should be decided by statute how far the Press had a right to go in reporting proceedings of Parliament or of public meetings.

The House divided:—Ayes 108; Noes 38: Majority 70.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (No Proprietor of Newspaper shall be liable to an Action or Prosecution for a faithful Report of the Proceedings at a Public Meeting, and Proof that it was such shall amount to a Defence).

MR. SANDFORD moved, instead of the word "proceedings," to substitute "speeches." Persons who were in the body of the meeting might get up and utter were now re-discussing the principle of the Bill. He protested against arguments, which had been answered over and over again, being dug up in that way. The principle of the Bill had been settled by a large majority, and they had now only to deal with the clauses.

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY said, it was an error to suppose that there would be no responsibility left if this Bill passed. Discretion would still have to be exercised, but by the speaker instead of by the editors of newspapers. Surely, it was better that that discretion should be thrown on the speaker, and that a slander should never be uttered than that it should be uttered but never published.

MR. CRAUFURD held that both the man who uttered, and the man who published, should be liable. It was not right that the person who did most mischief should escape scot free.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in that case the hon. Gentleman ought not to have voted for going into Committee. The words in the clause, "bonâ fide, without actual Malice, and in the ordinary Course of Business," would, in his opinion, be sufficient to meet the justice of the case without the proposed addition, and would not afford a justification for publications of every description. If the editor of a newspaper published scurrilous matter against any individual, a jury would know how to deal with him. The bonâ fides of the publication would still be matter for the jury.

MR. WHALLEY said, he must again protest against this alteration in the law, which had been objected to by Lord Campbell and Lord Wensleydale. The whole weight of legal authority was against the principle of the Bill. A speaker, under the excitement of addressing a public assembly, may scarcely know what he says, or mean what he says, and the law at present takes cognizance of such a possibility; but by this Bill a speaker is to be made responsible for the circulation of his statement throughout the world by another person, and thus the freedom of speech is to be restricted. At present if a man said anything indiscreet, the law considered it merely as slander, and that he should not be held liable to as severe punishment for hasty and inconsiderate expressions uttered in the excitement of the moment as if he had deliberately written the matter. It was the publication that did nearly all the mischief.

Mr. Roebuck

MR. NEATE wished to know, whether the other Law Officers of the Crown agreed with the Attorney General upon that point?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the Attorney General rested his defence of the clause on the bonâ fides of the publication. Now, he wanted to know in what that bonâ fides consisted. Was the editor of a newspaper to be held free from malice if he published a report believing that it was full and correct, or was it to be understood that he was still bound to exercise that discretion which the Amendment was intended to secure—a discretion as to the truth, the moral tendency, the political admissibility of the words spoken? The words of the clause bonâ fide admitted of such a latitude of interpretation that no one could define their precise intention, and yet it was to rest upon the interpretation of these wide words whether the speech was spoken, and the report published without malice, which words followed, and were governed by the words bonâ fide. In one newspaper you might see a report extending over a column, while in another and cheap paper that report might be given in a paragraph. Were both of these to be considered fair reports? The truth was, that this 3rd clause was an apology for the unwarrantable character of the two first clauses of the Bill; for the injustice and the harshness of the principle of those clauses. As he had said before, the Bill was a Bill for publishing slander and legalizing apologies.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, that the argument of the Attorney General only showed the necessity of inserting the words of the Amendment.

MR. SERJEANT ARMSTRONG maintained that the Amendment was altogether unnecessary. The words "actual malice" in the clause had a well-known and clearly defined meaning.

Amendment negatived.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (A Speaker of defamatory Matter not amounting to Slander shall be liable in certain Cases to be sued as if the same were printed or published).

SIR ROBERT COLLIER, while approving the principle of the Bill, objected to the extension of liberty to newspapers at the expense of speakers at public meetings. At present a man was not liable for spoken words unless they imputed an indictable offence, or were attended with actual damage, while written words, holding up a person to ridicule or contempt, were actionable. Now, this clause would render actionable spoken words reflecting on a person's character, which, if written, would be libellous. He was not sure whether, but for the privilege they enjoyed, speeches of eminent Members of the House would not come within the scope of this provision. The speeches for instance delivered by the present Prime Minister against Sir Robert Peel certainly had a tendency to bring Sir Robert Peel into ridicule and contempt. It might apply inconveniently to hustings' speeches—such, for example, as that delivered on one occasion by Lord Palmerston at Tiverton, in which he cast such ridicule on a gentleman who had interrogated him as to make him a laughing stock. A certain class of attorneys would always be ready to promote actions where the slightest pretence existed for the charge of holding up a man to ridicule or contempt, and many persons would be inclined to bring such actions on the chance of recovering small damages. The effect of the clause would be to curtail the liberty of free discussion, and to exclude reporters from many meetings to which they were now admitted to the advantage of the public. Railway directors were sometimes suspected of “cooking” accounts, and at present their conduct might be freely canvassed by the shareholders, but this provision would place a restraint on such discussion. It was an attempt to establish something intermediate between slander and libel; and it would make the character and liability of spoken words depend on the mere accident of a reporter being present. He could not help thinking that if the clause were passed reporters would be excluded, very much to the public injury, from many meetings to which they were at present admitted. He was aware that the clause contained words which would to some extent limit its operation; but it appeared to him that it would upon the whole unduly interfere with the freedom of public discussion, and he begged leave, therefore, to move that it be struck out.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the Bill had been greatly modified by the Select Committee, and that he now supported it to a certain extent because it appeared to him to be a beneficial measure. He was himself responsible, in a great measure, for this clause, as agreed upon by the Committee. It was quite true that it altered the law of slander to some extent. He thought the clause was a natural consequence of the change in the law which the two preceding clauses would effect. Those clauses would exempt the proprietors of newspapers from any liability on account of fair reports of the proceedings at public meetings; but the same privilege ought not to be extended to persons who uttered defamatory language at meetings at which they must have known that reporters were present, and who afterwards refused to apologize for that language. The clause would not apply to privileged persons—such as railway shareholders who, at meetings of their companies, might attack their directors who were believed to have “cooked” their accounts. The object of the clause was to render actionable defamatory words spoken at a meeting open to reporters, to the extent to which they would have been libellous had they been written. A person defamed at a public meeting obviously ought to have the right either of bringing an action so as to clear his character, or of requiring a retraction.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he thought the clause was a perfectly fair one, and that it was rendered essentially necessary by the protection given to newspaper proprietors by the two clauses which preceded. He contended that a person who went to a public meeting and deliberately made a statement was not entitled to the benefit of the distinction between slander and libel. The late Lord Lyndhurst, in a speech delivered in the House of Lords in 1858, pointed out the injustice of allowing a man who made a defamatory speech, knowing that it would be published, and probably with a view to publication, to escape with impunity, while the reporter, who could have no malicious motive, and who perhaps did not know the point on which the calumny turned, was made the scapegoat. As to frivolous actions, a jury had to decide whether matters were libellous or not, and if a man who had been ridiculed in Punch or elsewhere brought an action they would in all probability decide against him. The clause, as settled by the Attorney General and the Select Committee, rendered the utterer of defamatory statements liable to an action unless he published a full apology and retraction, and he did not believe this would infringe the privilege of public speaking.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he would remind the Committee that, in the warmth of debate or in the excitement attending public meetings, persons often exceeded the bounds of propriety, and used strong language, which they would shrink from committing to writing. The 1st and 2nd clauses conferred exemption from liability on persons who had no claim to it; while this clause inflicted penalties on those who did not deserve them. Generous and high-spirited men were apt, in the agitation of popular debate, to use language from which they would revolt in calmer moments; yet it was proposed to let the person escape who, for his own profit, circulated the slander, and thereby did all the mischief. This was not the case of robbing Peter to pay Paul, but of robbing Peter to make an unnecessary and mischievous present to Paul. The measure, instead of protecting an innocent Press, would remove the responsibility which made the Press a blessing to the country; and it would fetter freedom of speech by requiring the observance of greater caution and self-control than was always possible, under penalty of an action or of a servile apology, to which not one man in fifty would stoop. The argument of Lord Lyndhurst supposed a case which was not likely to occur; and it was, therefore, of no authority in the present discussion. He was ready to admit that if the principle of the 1st and 2nd clauses were adopted it would be necessary to qualify the concession to newspaper publishers. But there was not much in the whole Bill of which he could approve. He should support the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Sir Robert Collier) for the rejection of the clause.

MR. WHALLEY said, the object of the Bill was to convert slander into libel, and to compel everybody to be as careful of what he spoke as of what he wrote. That was certainly a consummation not to be wished. The whole tenour of Lord Lyndhurst's speech in 1858 was contrary to the change now proposed. The existing distinction between words inadvertently spoken and statements deliberately committed to writing ought to be retained. He might illustrate the evil working of this clause by referring to the case of the lecturer Murphy. That gentleman was only the representative of a class of men who went about the country, actuated by strong feeling, with the single desire of making known the doctrines, discipline, laws, and usages of the Church of Rome. It was impossible for these persons to describe these doctrines and usages without speaking in tones of contempt and ridicule of some people who believed in them. Should this clause be adopted it would be out of the question for these conscientious persons to prosecute labours which they believed to be useful and profitable. He would ask whether anyone had pointed out any real grievance in the present law? Riotous persons had interfered with the free discussion in which Mr. Murphy was engaged. [Cries of "Divide!" "Oh!" and "Question!"] The interruptions to which he was subject was a proof that those matters could not be fairly discussed.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he objected to the clause because it made speakers at public meetings answerable for words which they might not have uttered, but which were attributed to them in reports which they had had no opportunity of correcting. A speaker's words uttered in haste, and upon the spur of the moment, might be twisted and distorted by a reporter, and the speaker might be prosecuted for an offence which in reality he never committed. There was, therefore, a practical objection to the proposal. Only that morning he had seen words attributed to himself which he had not used; and if they had been libellous he might, under this clause, be sought to be made liable for an authorized report. He objected, moreover, to the provision requiring an apology to be published in any paper selected by the person who felt himself aggrieved—a provision which might be used for purposes of offence; some papers regarding certain individuals with known aversion, and other papers having no other object than to obtain notice, and thus increase their circulation by these means. It would be impossible to treat such papers with contempt, if their unauthorized reports were thus to be made the foundation for proceedings against a speaker. The clause would fetter the freedom of discussion throughout the country, and would, in his opinion, complicate rather than simplify matters; and he would, accordingly, give it his utmost opposition.

MR. ESMONDE said, he also objected to the clause. Two persons belonging to opposite political parties might have an encounter of words at a public meeting. The editor of the local journal might favour the gentleman who held the same political opinions as himself, and keep out of print anything strong which he might have said; while he might publish all the strong statements of his opponent; and the latter might, in that case, be subjected to an action for libel by the other man, who, perhaps, had made as libellous a speech.

MR. SERJEANT GASELÉ said, there were so many objections to the clause and to the Bill that he did not know where to begin in opposing it. It made it dependent upon a reporter whether a man was a libeller or not. A man was to be held liable, not only for words which he had used, but for words which he had never used. The speaker would be at the mercy of the reporter, and unscrupulous journalists might use this power to bring men into trouble and difficulties. Very often a reporter must be highly educated to understand properly what you said. Of course it was some comfort to be reported by an educated reporter. But in many parts of the country reporters were not highly educated, and you could easily hit above their heads. If the party who made a speech said he was entirely misrepresented, what was he to do? How could he be expected to insert an apology? And he was not permitted to justify himself by inserting a denial. The effect of the clause would be frequently to compel a man to apologize for words which he had never uttered. It was a dangerous and uncalled-for Bill; and he hoped it would go back to Ireland and never show its face in that House again.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to apprehend that an action could be successfully maintained against a man whose speech had been misrepresented. [Mr. Serjeant GASELÉ: Not with success.] If that was the learned Gentleman's objection, anyone was liable to have an unjust action taken against him; but the law provided for such a case by mulcting the plaintiff in costs. The publication of the apology might be made in the paper in which the libel was published; but if that were objected to, a paper might be selected by the person libelled. Having passed the 1st clause, the Committee could not, he thought, do otherwise than pass this; but he was in favour of omitting the words, "reflecting upon the character or conduct of another," and of inserting, "reflecting upon the personal honour or honesty, or professional, mercantile, or business character of another."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not think that the intention of the Committee was to create a new offence—namely, that of throwing ridicule upon a third person. He did not think that the clause had that effect; but if there was any doubt upon the subject it ought to be removed. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to have forgotten the conditions of public speech in this country. If a man made an oration in public, the probability was that it would be reported; and the man, therefore, who made it ought to do so under the fullest sense of the responsibility he incurred. He did not think it was fair to attempt to shift the responsibility on to the shoulders of others. A person who, at a public meeting, uttered reflections upon another ought to be held liable for so doing. Even if reporters were not present, great mischief might be done; and the slanderer should not be allowed to escape. He did not think that the clause would have the effect of limiting freedom of discussion, or that men like the lecturer Murphy would be rendered liable to action for libel because they saw fit to ridicule the doctrines and tenets of the Church of Rome. But to remove the doubt that had been thrown out, he should move that the words "reflecting upon the character or circumstances of another" be omitted, and the words "reflecting upon the personal honour or honesty or professional, mercantile, or business character of another" inserted.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Committee that they were discussing the question whether the clause should stand part of the Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to point out that the effect of the clause would be to attach the same responsibility to words spoken as now attached to words written. The clause, moreover, made a speaker liable for an action on account of a paragraph in a fragmentary report; whereas, had the whole speech been reported, the passage, which printed alone might appear libellous, might have been perfectly harmless. The clause was a dangerous one; for if a man in the course of a long speech dropped one word to which exception could be taken, he was to be liable to an action for libel. There was no provision that the jury should take into consideration the whole speech, or even that the whole speech should have been properly and fairly reported. If a man had been grossly slandered, and said of his slanderer that he was unworthy of belief, he would have committed an offence under the Bill. He trusted the Committee would not sanction such an alteration of the law. If the Bill were to pass, it would, in his opinion, prove exceedingly destructive to the freedom of public discussion; for it would render public men continually liable to actions at the hands of persons upon whose conduct they thought it necessary to comment. A man who uttered slander at a public meeting was now liable for such slander; a man who furnished a report of his own speech could, if it contained anything libellous, be proceeded against under the present Libel Act; but what the measure now before the Committee proposed to do was to render a man responsible for what might be published by a third party, with whom he had no connection, and in whose profits he had no share. Moreover, the Bill did not refer to public meetings only. A meeting where three persons attended might be brought within the scope of the Act. It might be said that the Bill only applied to open meetings where reporters were present; but it often happened that speakers did not know that reporters were present, and they might utter something which, if reported, would make them liable to an action. The clause did not contain a single word protecting a public speaker. They knew that the most careful and experienced speaker did not always express his meaning precisely, and was often surprised when reminded of what he had really said. But the law was for the whole community, and they all knew that there was rarely a public meeting in which an esteemed Mr. Brown or Mr. Jones was not invited to speak and—although perhaps a very sensible man—found great difficulty in expressing his thoughts in words. It was very rarely, too, that reports professed to give the words employed by the speaker; and they all knew how often letters appeared from gentlemen who stated that what had been attributed to them in print had never been uttered by them, or that if it had it was entirely different from what they had intended to say. The condensation to which speeches were subjected was no doubt advantageous; but still, even in the change from bad to better, the application of the speech might be materially altered, while there could be no doubt that the report, the moment such a change was made, ceased to furnish an exact reflex of the opinions of the speaker. A speaker would be bound hand and foot to the reporter, against whom, on the production of his note-book in a Court of Justice, he would have no chance whatever. If the speaker was to be held liable, it ought only to be where an accurate short-hand note of every word that he had spoken was placed before the jury, to enable them to come to a conclusion as to what he had said, and not the mere impressions of the reporter. For these reasons, he objected to the clause in its present form, and maintained that no case had been made out for altering the law of England on that subject, which had worked well for 500 years.

MR. HENLEY said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had carried them back 500 years, to the time when a difference was made between written and spoken words, but the distinction between the two things had been drawn long before there was any question of reporting. When a man spoke with reporters before him, and knew that what he said would probably be published, there could be no reason for the existing distinction. The hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers) had said that it would be a hard thing to call upon a man who had unwittingly gone just beyond the line at a public meeting to make "a servile apology;" but he asked, what necessity was there that the apology should be servile? If led in the heat of speaking to go beyond the truth and beyond what he meant to say, surely the first thing any honourable man would desire to do would be to relieve the person he had unintentionally injured from the injury he had inflicted on him. As to a speaker having no chance against a reporter when he came into Court after the lapse of three months, the speaker might easily answer that his words had been taken down wrongly, or that he had not intended to say what was imputed to him, and that was as good an apology as any man need require, while it was also one which any honest man could readily make. That there was considerable difficulty in the matter he had felt in the Select Committee; but he thought the clause as drawn by the Attorney General in the main met the requirements of the case. He entirely approved the principle of the clause, holding it to be of great public advantage that there should be reporters present at public meetings, and thinking it only just that the Press should be relieved of responsibility if it fairly published what passed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought the clause ought to be more guarded and restricted, and he would suggest, as the words he had proposed could not then be regularly submitted to the Committee, that the hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) should allow the clause to be negatived, with the understanding that another clause embodying his Amendment should be brought up on the Report.

MR. ROEBUCK recommended that the clause should be carried and the Bill be re-committed.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER thought the clause should be postponed.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the Committee had already decided that defamatory matter, whether spoken intentionally or by accident, should be published; and he maintained that it was morally and practically impossible, by any contrivance, to insure for the subsequent apology and retraction equal publicity with that given to the original slander.

SIR COLMAN O'LOUGHLIN asked leave to postpone the clause.

MR. H. BAILLIE thought it ought to be rejected instead of postponed.

MR. CRAUFURD hoped that the clause would be negatived, in order that a better one might be prepared.

MR. WHALLEY wished to confirm what the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had said as to the absence of proper protection for public speakers. Any observations that he himself ever made on any subject were always misreported. That Bill was intended to give form and substance to a professional and organized system of misreporting. At present there was, he believed, an influence exerted on the Press which rendered it impossible for any person who spoke on a certain subject, to which he need not more particularly refer, to rely upon being fairly and accurately reported. ["Name."] He might mention the name of the lecturer, Mr. Murphy, whose addresses were said to have produced riots and disturbances in the country. His own name having been mixed up by the Press with Mr. Murphy's, he had made two special journeys to Birmingham to ascertain whether the reports in the newspapers purporting to give what that lecturer said were true or untrue. On the one occasion he questioned twelve, and on the other twenty persons on the subject, and he had found that a report professedly of what that gentleman had said had been entirely fabricated to bring derision and obloquy upon him, and make him appear to be responsible for the riots that followed his lectures. A London paper had inserted a detailed contradiction of a report which it had previously published, charging Mr. Murphy with having used language calculated to bring him into general odium and derision.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House I will now state the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to take with reference to the votes which this House arrived at in Committee a few nights ago on the Scotch Reform Bill. In the arduous labour of attempting to re-construct the electoral system of the United Kingdom Her Majesty's Government are not conscious that they have shown any want of sympathy with the claims of Scotland, or any desire not to treat those claims with the utmost respect and with every wish to arrive at a conclusion which would be generally satisfactory to the House. And I am bound to say, on the part of the Government, that those efforts have been appreciated by the Scotch Members, and that we have received from them, especially last year—that is, from Gentlemen who are not politically connected with us—a warm and generous support in carrying the principal provisions of the great English measure. And we are sensible of the value of that support, and in no instance more than in our efforts to establish a household rating franchise, against the opinions of those who would have advocated one on a principle of restriction. When I say "restriction" I mean an arrangement similar to that which was familiarly described last year in this House as a "hard and fast line," and which had been proposed both for England and Scotland. I felt that in those efforts when we have attempted at all times to uphold a rating franchise against any artificial restrictions of the kind, we have received much support from Members from Scotland who are in no degree connected with myself or my Friends. Now, the other night—on Monday night—two important decisions were arrived at with respect to the Scotch Reform Bill. The first related to the distribution of seats. It is unnecessary for me to remind the House that by the plan which Her Majesty's Government proposed they hoped they might give, if not an adequate, at all events a considerable addition to the representation of Scotland, in a manner which would be consistent with maintaining the general privileges of the other portions of Her Majesty's dominions. That plan, we ascertained, was one which did not find favour in this House—or at least not sufficient favour to insure its passing; and there were many of our Friends—Gentlemen of influence—who were opposed, though, as we thought, on insufficient grounds, to any plan for increasing the number of the Members of this House. Then there were two other propositions made in order to satisfy the claims of Scotland—or, at any rate, partially to satisfy them—and which were before the House—one proposed by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), and the other by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley). Neither of these propositions was agreeable to Her Majesty's Ministers—they were not in harmony with our original views; but, as we were very anxious to carry a measure for Scotland which should be on the whole satisfactory, and desirous, as every Member of this House is, to bring these great labours to a happy conclusion, we expressed our willingness to defer to the feeling of the House, and whether the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose, or that of the hon. Member for the county of Northampton were adopted we said we would consider the decision of the House, and endeavour to frame upon it such a proposition as would on the whole give general satisfaction. I need not dwell further on that point—I think I have said enough to remind the House of what they will in justice admit—namely, that there has been at no time any desire on our part to meet the claims for the increased representation of Scotland in a niggard spirit, or, indeed, any other desire than to bring about, if possible, an arrangement which would be satisfactory not only to Scotland, but also to the other portions of the kingdom.

And now, Sir, I come to the decision arrived at under different circumstances, and which is, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, of a different character. I refer to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), which, if adopted, would establish a household suffrage in Scotland without any qualification or condition whatever, and this, too, in a country where, we should remember, householders do not dwell in houses. Therefore, that proposition was of a very serious character. Now, Sir, with regard to that decision, I must say on the part of Her Majesty's Government that I deeply deplore that the Committee should have arrived at it. But it is their opinion that the Committee arrived at that conclusion under a considerable degree of misapprehension. I can say certainly for Gentlemen who sit generally on this side of the House, that after the vote had been taken upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose there was a general apprehension—indeed, I may say it was founded on an authoritative statement made by one who, from his position, influences the conduct of hon. Gentlemen as far as their attendance in the House is concerned—there was a general apprehension from the nature of that vote that our proceedings in Committee would close, and that Progress would be reported in order that the Bill might be adapted to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. ["No!"] I do not say it was a just apprehension, but undoubtedly there was such an apprehension. Hon. Gentlemen were not at that time aware that the first part of the Bill referred merely to the franchises of Scotland, and that, therefore, it was open to us to proceed with the Committee, and impossible for us to resist any claim for continuing the business of the Committee. But there is no doubt whatever there was a general apprehension on the part of hon. Gentleman—certainly on this side of the House—that the Committee would close, and report Progress after that division; and, therefore, the greater portion of the House broke up without any idea that we were going to proceed further with the consideration in Committee of the Scotch Reform Bill. I believe that to be an accurate statement: and I think there were signs even on the other side of the House that there was not an apprehension that we should be proceeding in Committee after the vote on the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose. I will not, however, dwell further upon that. Statements have been made to me that such was the case, but of course I cannot speak with the same knowledge as I can with regard to Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House. I think that under these circumstances the Committee arrived at a somewhat precipitate conclusion—that it was a conclusion not preceded by that degree of discussion or accompanied by that attendance which I should have expected, whatever their decision might be, and which was especially desirable when the decision was to be taken on a point of such paramount importance. I do not wish to conceal from the House that the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on this Motion of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock is such that it would have the most serious consequences on their conduct as regards their responsibility in carrying on the Bill; for it is not only in itself, as we believe, highly detrimental and disadvantageous to Scotland, but in its ultimate consequences on the whole electoral fabric of the kingdom it must be of the most injurious description. And therefore I do hope that, with that anxious wish which pervades both sides of the House to carry the Scotch Reform Bill to a satisfactory conclusion, I may induce the Committee to re-consider the determination which they came to on Monday night, so that with a larger attendance and a more complete discussion we may all of us clearly understand what point we are arriving at, that we have contemplated all the consequences of the issue at stake, and that if we do feel it our duty to uphold the Resolution adopted by the Committee the other night, at least it shall not be said of us by those whom we represent that we have arrived at that conclusion in a precipitate and careless spirit. With these views, it is my wish to propose on Monday next certain words in Committee which will obviate the inconveniences and injury which we think will accrue if we do not take some remedial course of that kind. I shall not propose to restore the two clauses which have been struck out by the Committee. I shall propose to add words—which we shall place on the table in the course of the evening—to the effect that no elector in a Scotch borough shall be entitled to exercise the suffrage who is not rated to the poor and who has not paid his rates. That will assert the principle which we wish to uphold, and will provide against the infringement of the principle of the English Bill. In answer to those Gentlemen who have talked of innovation, and who spoke the other night as if we were proposing regulations which were perfectly unknown to the people of Scotland, and to which they were quite unaccustomed, I beg to state that the language in which I shall endeavour to secure this end and to vindicate the principle which I have already vindicated for England in a House of more than 600 Members, is the language which I find in a clause regulating the exercise of voting under the Poor Law Act of Scotland. Therefore, hon. Gentlemen opposite need not be afraid of any innovation or of anything to which the people of Scotland are not accustomed, because the provision will be the same as that which has so long influenced their conduct in the performance of one of their most important municipal duties. With this view I shall place these words upon the table in the course of the evening, so that they will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow morning; and I do hope we shall come to a unanimous conclusion, by accepting the words to which the people of Scotland are accustomed, and which entirely vindicate the principle of the English Law, which the House adopted so decidedly last year. And if that be so we may, I trust carry the Scotch Reform Bill to a happy conclusion, and that within a few days.

MR. PERCY WYNNDHAM said, he desired to say a few words on this question; and, to put himself in Order, would conclude with a Motion. He should not have ventured to obtrude himself, had he not thought the statement they had just heard would have been more satisfactory if the right hon. Gentleman had told the House that, in the event of his not succeeding in inducing the House to reverse the decision arrived at the other night, Her Majesty's Government would resign. Let hon. Members look back for a moment upon what they had lately seen in that House within the last few days. He would not dwell on the votes on the question of the Irish Church carried by majorities sufficient at any other time to make Government resign their places; but what could they say of the conduct of a Government who had seen the House disallow the proceedings of a Royal Commission, that Royal Commission being appointed by themselves? He would not say that the Instructions to that Royal Commission were not imprudent and unjust ones; but having given those Instructions, and having limited and restricted the Commissioners, he maintained that, by not making their decision the starting point for the decision of that House, but by going through the farce of appointing a select Committee to consider the subject, the Government had shown a disrespect to the Commissioners. Would the House, or the Government, respect the decisions of the Committee? From the way the Government had treated the whole Boundary business, nothing was clearer than this—that every question relating to it would be decided upon the floor of that House, and nowhere else. This would set all the electioneering agents in the country agog. The fact was the government of the country and the direction of legislation on all important questions no longer remained in the hands of the Government; it did not even rest with the Opposition, as a distinct body properly so called; it rested in the hands of the House, as a whole—that is, in a vast Committee of nearly 600 Members, fluctuating in their attendance, and who arrived at decisions of the greatest importance by a mental process, which could be described only as drifting. The result was that hon. Members—the hon. Member for Birmingham and those who agreed with him—were able to obtain all the changes they desired, without the least responsibility attaching to them. He gave those hon. Members more credit for patriotism than to suppose they wished to attain their ends by means of a state of things in that House which was drawing down upon it the contempt of every thinking man in the country; and which, if persisted in much longer, would render the present system of Parliamentary government impossible. He was aware that some hon. Members on the Government side of the House thought the Opposition did not treat the Government with generosity and forbearance; but he was not at all certain that forbearance was a word you could admit into politics. Gentlemen were sent to that House to further their own views; but because a weak man—to which he compared the Government—gave up to his antagonist an advantageous post as soon as it was demanded, his antagonist knew that it was given up because it could no longer be withheld, and not on any ground that entitled him to forbearance or respect. Some years ago, when Lord Palmerston was in Office, and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) in Opposition, at the beginning of the Session he issued to his supporters a manifesto, in which, after enumerating the important negative victories which had been won by the Conservative party—the putting a stop to a Church Rate Bill among others—he made use of this expression: “Place without power may gratify the vain, but it can never satisfy the nobly ambitious.” Either the right hon. Gentleman did not fall within that category, or he had much changed his sentiments on the question.

He wished to speak of the Government with all the respect that attached to their high position, and which he felt for many of them individually; but he must tell them, when they put forward principles which they were always ready to withdraw; when, Session after Session, time after time, they exhibited what they called their principles—as a showman draws his puppets from a bag to be dangled awhile before the eyes of their supporters and put away again when they had served their turn—although they might continue to be Ministers of the Crown, they were permitting themselves to sink into the position of a mere joint-stock company for the division of places among themselves. He did not suppose that anyone who supported the great and important measure passed last year believed it to be, in the old acceptation of the term, a Conservative measure; on the contrary, it must be clear to every one that we were on the eve of great and important changes; and, it was all-important how we met these changes. The right hon. Gentlemen at the head of the Government had been saying to their supporters—“The talisman of safety lies in the Boundary question, and we will appoint a Royal Commission and secure it;” and “The real basis of the electoral franchise—the old pathway of the Constitution—is in rating and not in rental.” Of these two principles they had already given up one—the other they would give up when it suited their purpose, and they met the difficulties of the day in this most unwise and unstatesmanlike manner. His objection to the right hon. Gentleman at the Head of the Government continuing in power was that his vitality as a Minister of the Crown appeared to be in direct inverse ratio to the vitality of his principles as a politician; and, as they one by one disappeared, slain by his own hand, the tighter did he stick to Office. We were coming upon dangerous times; there was a limit to everything, and he would tell the right hon. Gentleman that there were some at least of his supporters who would refuse to be dragged through the mud, in order to enable the Government to remain on those Benches, and that there was a limit to the fidelity and patience of the right hon. Gentleman’s followers. To put himself in Order, he would move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That this House do now adjourn.”—
 (Mr. Percy Wyndham.)

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I have no intention of taking up the discussion at the point at which the hon. Gentleman has left it; but I think the statement made by the First Minister is one that, on this side of the House, we have a right a little to complain of. Now, my view of the discussion on Monday night was this: that it was a very wise thing, as I said then, to go with the great majority of the Scotch Members on a matter with which they were more familiar than the House generally could pretend to be. The Scotch Members in the House being about forty or forty-one on that evening, thirty-five or thirty-six—nearly all—voted in opposition to the view of the Government, and of the four or five who voted with the Government, at least two if not three are members of the Administration or in some Office. Well, now, I think farther, that although the right hon. Gentleman and the House last year had agreed to rating—what we call the ratepaying clauses of the Bill of last year—that in that case he was following the Act of 1832, which has produced enormous inconvenience in England. I have a letter this morning from a gentleman connected with the town of Blackburn, who says that, in consequence of there not being any rate made in that town before the 5th January last, any person in Blackburn occupying a house of any value will be placed on the registry in the autumn of this year. So the system is one which, being connected with a system of voting and the franchise, will create, the more numerous your electoral body, difficulties continually in a great many boroughs. But in Scotland the Reform Act of 1832 did not apply this principle; and therefore I think that, as the Scotch Members were of opinion that it would be accompanied with great inconvenience—with even more inconvenience than in England—and as they were nearly unanimous in that opinion, they were the best judges, and that the House was wise in following their advice. But to come to that night’s debate—the right hon. Gentleman accepted the proposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire—the hon. Member having made up the little difference which existed some time ago. [SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY: No, no!] I am sorry to hear that, because I like to see harmony in a political party. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, or somebody who acts for him, was well aware of the Notice being given. In point of fact it was offered to the House as the proposition of the Government, in substitution for that of the hon. Member for Montrose. I do not think there was any great difference between these two; but the Government made a very fair offer in the matter. At the same time—although I will not say that I should not have liked the Motion of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire quite as well, looking to the future, I believe that the House did really decide in a proper manner in giving the preference to the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose. The right hon. Gentleman allowed the debate to go on, and the House to go into Committee; and nobody on his side of the House had a right to believe, and I am sure nobody did believe, that he was about to make a great catastrophe of any vote in connection with the Scotch Bill. He had agreed not to increase the numbers of the House—which in his speech at Edinburgh he had held out as a great bait, and he had consented to the destruction of ten “centres of representation,” which, as a principle, was thought more of last year, I imagined, than the principle of rating, though next year in all probability, the centres of representation in Ireland may follow the same fate, and at the same hands. The right hon. Gentleman, I say, had already agreed to this important alteration, and surely no one had a right to expect that a difficulty would arise upon any further clause. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman even heard any of the discussion upon the proposition of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock; and how was the question debated? We are warned now that this was a vital principle, and that if it failed the Bill might be defeated, the Government might resign, or something still more impossible might take place. But how was it defended? Did ever Minister defend a great cause in such a manner? The Lord Advocate spoke, but certainly he did not speak with enthusiasm in the matter. He pointed out that he was merely seeking to introduce into the Scotch Reform Bill a principle approved in the English Bill—a fact of which we were well aware. The clause was also defended by the hon. Baronet the Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson), who spoke upon it, as he always does—he spoke very fairly, with a certain feeling, which possibly was real. Who else defended it? Why, it was defended by an erratic Member of the House, the noble Lord (Lord John Browne) who sits below me, who generally sits upon this side of the House and votes on that; but who, with perfect consistency, upon that occasion, addressed the House from the opposite Benches. He, an Irish Member, took up the cudgels for the Government. And that was about the only defence which was made. When the House came to a division, there were 224 Members present, and there were 240 others who had paired, most of them after the first division; and they paired knowing that this very question was coming on. [“No!” and Cheers.] Well, I have taken some pains to inquire, and I find that the great bulk of them paired till ten o’clock; and it was a reasonable supposition that, in their opinion, the discussion would last until ten o’clock. The fact is, they did not come down very punctually, and the division took place, unfortunately for them, five minutes before ten o’clock; and the result was the great calamity which has brought the Government and the House into a position of some difficulty. If I might, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman to be a little more explicit. I have no unfair object; I do not want to put him into any difficulty. I have felt it my duty to speak with a certain severity upon one occasion, when I thought that severity was deserved; but the House will bear me witness that I have not been active except in the fair discussions of propositions before the House during this Session. The speeches that have been made most offensive to the right hon. Gentleman, speaking generally, have come from Gentlemen that I see opposite. I am told—though I do not pretend to have that secret understanding with Gentlemen opposite which the right hon. Gentleman always assumes that he has with some upon these Benches—that the Gentlemen who have spoken unfavourably of the Government from the Benches opposite represent the feelings of a great many who are silent. [“No, no!”] We are placed in an unpleasant position, and what I say shall be uttered with the simple and honest object of helping us to get out of the difficulty; for I agree with the hon. Gentleman who spoke last as to the discredit which attaches—a great deal of it to the Government, some to the House, and I am afraid some portion of it especially to this side of the House—that the present state of things is not terminated. The right hon. Gentleman came into Office having, as we know, a minority only at his back; he has had but a minority during the whole period of his official career—by which I mean the existence of Lord Derby's Government as well as of the present Administration; and he has been maintained in Office because there was an opinion upon this side of the House that hon. Gentlemen opposite do much less harm to our principles when in Office than when they are in Opposition. I think that is true, as the past has shown, and the sequel may still further illustrate. But at this moment the right hon. Gentleman holds over the House a threat to which reference has been made before—a menace which I say it is not right for a Minister to employ, and not right for this House to submit to. The right hon. Gentleman knows that in one sense this is the most corrupt House of Commons that ever assembled within these walls. ["Oh!"] When hon. Gentlemen hear the explanation of that statement, I think they will agree with me. I believe it cost more money to place the 658 Members now in this House within these walls than any 658 Members who ever sat here at any former period. And it is because of that excessive cost that the right hon. Gentleman has the power—I am sorry that, under any circumstances, he should have the will—to hold over the House the menace of dissolution. A penalty, probably, of £1,000,000 sterling will be entailed upon those who contest the seats—that is to say, upon the Members now here who will come back from the General Election—the Members who will fight and be defeated—the new Members who will be returned, and the constituencies who return them; and the great bulk of that expenditure will go into the hands of a certain number of lawyers, a great number of publicans, and a considerable number of printers. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has proposed that we should go back from the Vote of the other night. I will only say what I said then—that I think the Scotch Members are the best judges of this matter; and, if they can find any satisfactory solution of this difficulty, I shall be extremely glad, and feel perfectly confident that I am right in giving my vote with them. Therefore, I shall say no more on that point; but leave it till the question comes on again—I suppose about Monday next. But the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has given a Notice to-night with regard to the Bill of which the right

hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire is to move the second reading, I believe, to-morrow. I do not know exactly what is the object of that Notice—whether it means more than a debate or a division, as we had on the first Resolution. Clearly, the First Minister was right when he said that the second and third Resolutions followed naturally and inevitably from the first; and he would be right now if he were to get up and say that the Suspensory Bill followed more inevitably—if such a thing were possible—from the second and third of those Resolutions. There is no doubt that, even if the propositions for changes within the Irish Church, in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission now about to report, were accepted by the Government and the country, it would be wise for Parliament to pass a Suspensory Bill, in order that money might not be wasted in filling offices between the time of the presentation of the Report and the passing of the Bill for giving effect to its proposals. I thought the right hon. Gentleman was intending to get the House into smooth water; and I wish he would. If he is resolved to sit there till the House is prorogued in July or August—to remain in Office till Christmas, until after the General Election has taken place, I have no power of myself to move him from his seat. I dare say there are many persons in this House and out of it who are more anxious to eject him than I am. But, if he wishes for smooth water, let him not be a disturber of the pool. On this very question of the Scotch Bill possibly there may be some half-way house, some proposition or solution which may be fixed upon as the way out of the difficulty. There is no wish to drive him out of Office on that Bill, or to cause the failure of the Bill. On this side, I believe, there is perfect unanimity in wishing that the Bill should pass, and that it should be, as it promises in the main to be, a measure satisfactory to Scotland. But, if we are to be asked to make concessions in this matter, I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is prepared to make concessions also? Do not misunderstand me. I am not speaking for anybody else—for anybody upon those Benches, or upon this side of the House. Nobody knew or supposed that I was going to make any observations of this kind. But suppose the right hon. Gentleman considers it due from us to make any concessions with regard to this matter, surely it is not the business of the Government to raise any question that can bring us during the next few weeks into any dilemma of this kind again. After all, a crisis every week—twice a week, some hon. Member says—is not a credit-able thing for a Minister; and it is not a pleasant thing for this House. There is some advantage occasionally in having a little excitement; but I confess that the excitement which we have had during the last two months since the right hon. Gentleman came into Office has been rather too much for my nerves; and, if it continues much longer, some of us will have to ask leave to go to a purer atmosphere and to more pleasant occupations. I have risen to say that, if the right hon. Gentleman thinks he has a claim to ask this side of the House to make any concessions, as regards the Scotch Bill, surely it is time for him, and those who sit with him—many of whom very seldom get up to say anything themselves, though their voices are enthusiastic when cheering the right hon. Gentleman—to pursue a course which will not lead the House into any difficulty hereafter. Now, only one other observation upon that. The House has decided by majorities of from 60 to 70 in favour of the Resolutions on the Irish Church. No one can deny—even the right hon. Gentleman himself or the Home Secretary cannot deny—that the House is agreed—for a vote by a large majority must be held in agreement—that the Bill that has been brought in is a just and necessary measure. If the Parliament that shall meet next spring, elected by the new constituencies, shall decide that the Irish Church shall remain as it is, then the Bill of my right hon. Friend, being only for twelve months, will expire, and there will be an end of it. Moreover, if the plan of the right hon. Gentleman opposite is considered better, the Suspensory Bill will be equally useless. I say, therefore, that, under these circumstances, if the right hon. Gentleman takes this opportunity of picking a quarrel, or what may be intended as a quarrel, it is from the love of the quarrel itself, and for a purpose which does not arise naturally out of the question or out of the Bill. Well, then, if the right hon. Gentleman asks Members on this side of the House to step back one hair's breadth from the line they have taken, I say he should be careful to deal with the House in as frank and fair a spirit as we on this side are disposed to deal with him.

Mr. Bright

I think it will be understood that, in the observations I have made, I have not been speaking so as to aggravate the position of the right hon. Gentleman. I have said nothing to add to the irritation that might have been caused by the speech from the other side of the House. I have spoken my honest sentiments with regard to the position the House is placed in. If the right hon. Gentleman behaves, as I have known him to behave, as becomes him—though sometimes I have known him to act otherwise—if he behaves as becomes a Minister in a minority, possibly we may be saved in the next few weeks from many of those tumults and disorders which are not pleasant in the House, and which will not add to its influence with the country.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, that the hon. Member for Birmingham had expressed his satisfaction at the present state of things, because Her Majesty's Government, according to the hon. Gentleman, were very useful to the principles which he advocated. It was not surprising that the hon. Gentleman, while thus using the Government for his own purposes, was satisfied that they should continue to hold Office while in a minority. This state of things might not be pleasant to hon. Members on the one definite purpose, he (Mr. Newdegate) thought that Her Majesty's Government should remain in Office. They had carried their duty, although in a minority, to the forbearance of the House as to whether they could complete their scheme by carrying Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland. With respect to the question which arisen as to the re-distribution of seats Bill for Scotland, he had been inclined to take one Member from the Northamptonshire (Sir Rainsald Knight) boroughs which had two, in or they might be given to the county when he found that the county would not stand together with the adding two county Members, or from each side of the House, to Committee on Boundaries, he larger and subsequent object less, and then he voted distasteful alternative of transferring Scotland. The truth was that for the small boroughs had to be due either to the county or to Scotland. Under the he thought the House had right hon. Gentleman is, and how it will fit with their views; but I must say for myself, if it is simply the reversal of the decision of Monday that is proposed, I shall not be induced to consent to it; and I doubt very much whether the right hon. Gentleman, consistently with the common forms of Committee, will be able to call on the House to reverse its decision. The fact is, that the right hon. Gentleman has at last come to a point when he thinks he can no longer go on and take the consequences of the situation in which he has been during the last two months. The right hon. Gentleman, however, must be content to accept the consequences of that situation. If he is willing to be a Minister in a minority, he must—as he said last year he would—be guided by the majority of the House. He has no right to set up his views, or the views and wishes of the minority, against the well-considered decision of the House. It comes to this—which is to play the part of Ancient Pistol and which of Fluellen? Are we still to go on offering the leek to the right hon. Gentleman, and forcing him to bite it, or is he, stung by the various defeats of the last two months, to come forward and say, “Well, this is my last vital point; all the rest I have surrendered; every one which I insisted upon, and on which I educated my party, they are all now abandoned but this one of rating. On this I stand, and I insist, whether it is right for Scotland or not, on the House upholding my consistency?” Well, I trust he will not succeed in persuading the House to take that course. Now, important as this question of a clause in the Scotch Reform Bill is, there is a graver question behind it, on which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Percy Wyndham) made so strong and able a speech. The greatest man of our times once asked, in “another place,” with reference to the Reform Act of 1832, “How is the Queen’s Government to be carried on?” Now, it appears that the right hon. Gentleman has discovered the solution of that question. The recognized and ancient practice of the House, to which we were all accustomed, which we all understood, which worked well, and which, whether it worked for or against either party, was accepted by them as a natural consequence of the system, was that the majority should rule, that the Government should express the mind of the House, and should give efficiency to its acts. That was the time-

honoured and well-considered practice. But now, it appears, the minority are to rule. Any number of defeats do not signify. “Thrash me, kick me, beat me, insult me, outrage me,” says the right hon. Gentleman, “but still I say, like Mr. Toots, it doesn’t signify, I feel quite comfortable where I am.” Now, I am astonished that the Tory country Gentleman have submitted to this state of things so long. I am a Whig country Gentleman, and I am not ashamed of the designation, and according to my notion, this state of affairs is degrading to the Crown, disgraceful to the Minister, and destructive of the just rights and privileges of this House. That is not the only reason why I am astonished at the Tory country Gentlemen submitting to a continuance of this. I must say, that had I been sitting behind the right hon. Gentleman I should have been aghast at seeing all that I most valued and honoured gradually swept away under his protection. You have had the benefit of this system for two years, and under its auspices you have seen carried a measure which I do not myself dread or dislike, but which you viewed with the greatest dislike and alarm—a democratic Reform Bill. Under the same process we are likely to have an inroad upon that great institution which you value above everything else—the Church—for it is no doubt far easier to make an inroad upon that deep-rooted, long-established institution when we are in the position we now occupy than if we were sitting on the opposite side. That is the reason why some of us are very unwilling to see a change of Government. Again, the financial arrangements of the Government are no doubt acceptable to this side of the House, because they are in conformity with our views; but it has been a matter of the greatest astonishment to me that not a single Tory country Gentleman has been found who has had the courage to rise up and protest, in conformity with the doctrine taught him for twenty years by the right hon. Gentleman, that it was not fair or right to the landed interest to raise the whole of the increased expenditure of the country by direct taxation. I do not make these remarks in any spirit of hostility. There is a story told of Lady Mary Wortley Montague that she once said—

“Most people wish their enemies to die. That is not my wish at all. My prayer is, give my enemy the gout; let him feel what the pleasure of that is; let him have the stone; let him know what torture is.”

Now, the worst that I could wish an enemy would be that he should sit as a Minister on the Treasury Bench in the circumstances in which the right hon. Gentleman is placed—for I cannot conceive a position more humiliating to one's sense of dignity, and more derogatory to constitutional Government. If I were hostile to the right hon. Gentleman and his friends—if I were animated by feelings of personal dislike, my prayer would be that they should continue in that position, endeavouring ineffectually to carry on the Government of the country, endeavouring ineffectually to support principles to which the majority of the House will not adhere, and endeavouring to maintain their position by a policy which I must designate as a policy of legerdemain.

MR. J. HARDY, as the representative of one of the ten unfortunate boroughs which were condemned on Monday, wished to say a few words. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) had just related a story of Lady Mary Wortley Montague; but he thought a much milder saying was that of Lord Chesterfield, who held that the worst wish he had to an enemy was that he should be married and settled in the country. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman chose to retire into the country he would not be regretted by hon. Members who sat opposite to him. Now, with reference to the proposed alteration of the vote of Monday last—for his own part, he should not be satisfied by the mere rescinding of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, for he considered that a vital principle of the English Reform Bill had been attacked by the previous Amendment, affecting ten English seats. Members on both sides were induced last year to support the Reform Bill, under the express condition that there should be no total disfranchisement; and it was a most monstrous thing that ten English boroughs that had committed no sin should be swept away in order to give additional seats to Scotland. Ten independent English Members were to be sacrificed for the benefit of the most narrow-minded constituencies in the Empire. As for the boasted success of the grouping system, why, such a rude and rigid line was enforced that no independent man dared to offer himself, and if a Scotch Member ventured to show any independence he never appeared in the House again. Everybody knew exactly what the ten additional Scotch Members would be like; they would be like so many brace of grouse. His own borough (Dartmouth) had, he thought, been treated in the most shameful manner; indeed, the honour of the House was at stake in the matter. Last Session a proposal to disfranchise these boroughs, made by the hon. and learned Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee), was defeated in a full House by a majority of 52; but on Monday, in a much thinner House, there was a majority of only 21 for it. Now, he regarded that as a very unfair decision. He did not say that he should have supported the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley), for he had no great fancy for giving additional Members to Scotland. He was quite aware that Scotch Members were most respectable persons at home; but when they entered the House it seemed to be their business to vote away everything which a Constitutionalist held dear in Church and State. He would not go far as Charles II. in saying that Presbyterianism was not a religion for a gentleman, for religion was not concerned in this question; but he regretted to say that the dominant religion of Scotland was not conservative. The Scotch Presbyterians were banded together with Irish Roman Catholics to carry their measures; how then could they expect the Constitutional party in England to support them? The hon. Member for Birmingham, ready to give advice, he would not say with less than his usual obtrusiveness, and who, as he had told them, was the last man to get the House into troubled waters, had laid all the blame of what had taken place during the last few months upon that (the Ministerial side) of the House. But that side had not been at all to blame. Surely they were not called upon to accept everything offered to them from the other side. The Government, pledged as they were not to disfranchise totally, could not have supported the proposal of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), and he wanted to know why the vote on that proposal should not be re-considered? If this were not done he only hoped the Bill would be thrown up or withdrawn; for Scotland could exist very well for another Parliament without these additional Members. Several of the condemned boroughs were in Devonshire, and he protested against the representative power of that county being thus diminished. His own borough, moreover, had once been, and might again be, an important port, and he felt bound to protest against its disfranchisement. If the vote of last Monday were supported he hoped the Government would throw up the Scotch Bill.

MR. HIBBERT said, he neither voted nor paired the other night, and was not pledged on one side or the other; but he did not feel disposed to establish a principle of rating in Scotland that had been hitherto unknown there. He supported the Government on the ratepaying clauses of the English Bill last year, and was in favour of maintaining it; but he could not admit that by agreeing to a different principle for Scotland, they would necessarily weaken the principle adopted for England. The law and circumstances of the two countries were quite different. It appeared to him that the question at issue was one the solution of which only called for a little practical common sense on both sides of the House. What was the object of the Government? That those who were too poor to pay the rates should not be put on the poor-rate book and be eligible to be placed on the register. That was equally the object of the House. He would suggest an addition to the clause providing that all persons exempted from the payment of poor rates should not be placed on the register. Such a provision would only leave out a small number of persons in Scotland; for he had been told that throughout Scotland the rates were collected within 9 per cent, so that the collectors did not allow many persons to leave their rates unpaid. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would accept some such compromise on this question, and he had no doubt that some arrangement satisfactory to both parties might be arrived at.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, he was a Tory country Gentleman, and he hoped he was as independent and as little influenced by personal motives as the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). No man felt it more deeply and painfully than himself the existing state of things, and the only consideration that induced him to tolerate it was his hope to put a stop once for all to any further agitation on the question of Reform. Last year the Conservative party had made enormous, and, as he thought, most disastrous sacrifices, and he for one deeply regretted the course taken by the Government. Those sacrifices, however, were made, and the only hope was that they would have a little peace for the time to come. He wished to see the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills settled. Hon. Gentlemen opposite could not settle them—they had tried their hands at Reform for a good many years and failed. He did not say whether those on his or the other side of the House were most to blame for that; his own party had their share of the blame, but not, he maintained, so large a share as hon. Gentleman opposite, because when in opposition they were not so factious. He would tell hon. Members for Scotland, “If you wish to pass a Scotch Reform Bill, and to obtain ten additional Members for Scotland, do not turn out the Government at the present moment.” Just let them try what chance they would have of passing such a Bill through the House of Lords with the Conservatives in Opposition. He did not wish to see the Government retain Office longer than to settle the Reform question in Scotland and Ireland. Let the Government pass those two Bills and then let the House turn them out next day if they would.

MR. KENDALL said, he was in the House on Monday night, and being very suspicious about what was going on he would not go away to dine or pair. What was the state of the House? The hon. Member for Birmingham said that no questions were asked and no objections taken in opposition to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie). The reason was there was no one there to take objections. When he came in he found five Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, two behind them, and three near him. He also found the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) pressing for a division. [“Oh!”] He heard that hon. Member frequently say “Divide, divide.” Although he was getting old he was very quick of hearing and of eye. The hon. Member urged to-night that as the Scotch Members were agreed the English and Irish Members ought also to agree to pass the Amendment. But why should forty or fifty Scotch Members destroy the principle of the Reform Bill for England? It was not a fact, as had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie), that his Amendment had been fully discussed and duly considered on the Conservative side of the House. No one expected it to come on so early. Many Members were prepared for the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), but there was not the slightest expectation of the Motion of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock coming on. He did hope, notwithstanding the manner in which he had been treated, that the First Lord of the Treasury would give Scotland a further chance, because the vote of Monday night was a catch vote. It was passed in the absence of those who were dining and taking care of themselves. Hon. Gentlemen were too quiet on the other side of the House, and so he stayed there to watch them.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, they were constantly hearing hon. Members on that side of the House taunting the Government with more or less bitterness, on the ground that their retention of Office was calculated to bring the House into a humiliating position. But nothing was more calculated to produce that result than language such as had been heard that night from the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). What could be more degrading to the House and the country than the constant practice in which some hon. Members indulged of casting the vilest imputations upon Her Majesty's Government—he did not speak of the present Government in particular. If they were to sit there as an assembly of Gentlemen, they ought to give credit to any Government for acting on principles of policy in the performance of what they considered to be their duty to the country. Hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House were always telling them that the sole object of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues was to retain their places; but if the Opposition were always throwing such imputations on the Government, might not the Government retort by pointing to Members who might be very anxious to succeed them, and might they not say that these hon. Gentlemen were hungry for place? But if hon. Members went on making these imputations and foul aspersions, that House could not fail to be degraded in the eyes of the country and in the eyes of the world. Let them give the right hon. Gentlemen who might sit upon the Treasury Bench credit for holding Office with a sincere desire to perform their duties; and even if they did not believe they were actuated by a sense of duty, let them at least have the good manners to suppose they were, and not make these charges, which degraded the House and the whole country in the eyes of Europe. The hon. Member for Birmingham and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) appeared to suppose that because the Scotch Members were agreed in supporting the Amendment adopted on Monday night the representatives of England and Ireland were practically to abdicate their functions on the question of Parliamentary Reform for Scotland, and leave the matter to be settled by the Scotch Members alone. Any more unconstitutional doctrine he could not imagine, and he was surprised to hear such comments from the hon. Member for Birmingham, who had been for many years a Member of that House, and ought during that time to have learned something about the English Constitution. The question touched the constituencies of the United Kingdom, and of course affected the constituency of England as well as Scotland; and an Instruction had even been moved in Committee upon the Scotch Reform Bill to disfranchise a number of English boroughs. He should have thought such a proceeding most irregular; but the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair ruled that it was a thing that might be done. If it were really within the rules that governed their proceedings it was pushing those rules to an extent bordering upon licence to disfranchise English boroughs upon an Instruction on going into Committee on a Scotch Reform Bill, and thus to repeal an Act of Parliament passed last year after the greatest deliberation and the fullest discussion. That appeared to him, he owned, to be an abuse of the proceedings of Parliament. The other question upon which the Government were placed in a minority was upon the Scotch franchise. Now, if there were to be a simple household franchise without rating for Scotland they would have to apply the same principle to England. He denied most emphatically that the Scotch Members should be left to decide this question upon principles which the other Members of the House thought were not right. He contended that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had done no more than his duty in affording the House an opportunity of re-considering this subject. He was certainly under the impression that after the decision of the House on the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), on Monday evening, the House would not proceed with the consideration of the Scotch Reform Bill in Committee; and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was not present during the discussion which ensued. ["No!"] The right hon. Gentleman was absent, at all events, during a portion of the discussion; and the division was a snapped one and was taken under a misapprehension. It was therefore right that they should have a re-consideration of so important a subject. He thought the hon. Member for Birmingham was again exceedingly unfair in saying that the Government called on them to re-consider the decision on the Scotch Reform Bill under the threat of a dissolution. He certainly had heard no threat of the sort, and his belief was that no threat was intended. Any such threat held out to the House of Commons in a case of that kind would be a crime. He believed that the Government were not capable of that crime, and that, whether they were or not, they would not commit it. With regard to the speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Percy Wyndham), who had moved the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of enabling them to enter upon that discussion, he was perfectly at a loss to know what was the object of the hon. Gentleman in making that speech. The hon. Gentleman dealt largely in that species of declamation which he had already deprecated, and which he still most sincerely deprecated. On a question regarding the Scotch Reform Bill the hon. Gentleman had gone into a mere attack of the Government; and he could not but think it would have been better to avoid a discussion which must necessarily be of a personal and offensive character, and which could not conduce in any manner to the decision of the important questions which they had before them. In conclusion, he had spoken as an impartial observer. ["Oh!"] It was not very often that he took part in what might be called party debates in that House, and, he repeated, he had spoken as an impartial observer, uttering freely what he believed it to be his duty to say, as no one else had said it.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, the remarks that had just fallen from the hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) were made in the same spirit in which he himself wished very briefly to address the House; for after the taunts thrown out by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock against Conservative country Gentlemen he could not allow his speech to remain wholly unanswered. The right hon. Gentleman said he was astonished that country Gentlemen on that side could continue to support a Government which was conducting public affairs in the more than questionable manner he had described. For his own part he (Colonel Lindsay) was astonished that a country Gentleman could impute such mean and paltry motives to any body of Gentlemen who were endeavouring to serve Her Majesty and the country. His own feeling was that Her Majesty's Ministers were, under great difficulties, fulfilling a most important duty at great personal sacrifices to themselves. [Laughter.] It might cause a laugh to some hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Members of a Government should be supposed capable of doing their duty to their Sovereign and their country at some sacrifice of their own feelings; but he was sure that many hon. Gentlemen who sat on the Opposition Benches must be perfectly ashamed of the manner in which not only in that House, but constantly in private on all occasions, the most mean and paltry motives were attributed to the Government for remaining in Office. He regretted exceedingly that a speech of that character had been made that evening from that (the Ministerial) side of the House. Such an attack as that which the hon. Member for Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) had directed against those by whose side he sat and to whose party he professed to belong ought not to be made in the hasty and precipitate manner they had just witnessed. If an Independent Member below the Gangway might give advice to the Government as to how long they were to continue in Office and what course they ought to pursue, he hoped that one Independent Member might give advice to another; and availing himself of that privilege he would ask the hon. Member for Cumberland to listen to a few words taken from a well-known classic author. The Spectator, describing the establishment of Sir Roger de Coverley in the country, and speaking of Sir Roger's pack of hounds, said—

"I was at the same time delighted in observing that deference which the rest of the pack paid to each particular hound, according to the character he had acquired among them. If they were at fault and an old hound of reputation opened but once, he was immediately followed by the whole cry; while a raw dog might have yelped his heart out without being taken notice of."

He trusted that Her Majesty's Government might continue to carry the very important measures they had in hand, which everyone knew they were endeavouring under a conscientious sense of duty to bring to a satisfactory issue. Let those measures be carried, and he was convinced that nothing would induce the Government to remain in the very unpleasant position they now occupied.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, the hon. and gallant Member who had just addressed the House had not dealt with the real difficulty of the present circumstances. He charged the Opposition with imputing unworthy motives to Her Majesty's Government; but the main point to be dealt with was whether the Conservative Members themselves did not disapprove the course pursued by the Government. The statement he ought to have grappled with was what they had heard from the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley), who said that the Government had carried measures which were disastrous and fatal, and that the great body of the Conservative party so regarded them. That was the light in which they were viewed by the men whom he had been accustomed to look upon as the chief Gentlemen of England. The hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire said that his party had supported measures which they themselves believed to be disastrous. ["No!"] Aye, but they did, though. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) charged the Opposition with imputing motives to, and speaking harshly of, their opponents; but he must say, as one of the oldest Members of the House, that he had never heard anything spoken there against hon. Gentlemen opposite which was nearly so violent or so strong as the language used by one of their own most respected Members. The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) had told them the Treasury Bench ought to be sent to the British Museum as a curiosity, as the Bench for the honour of sitting on which right hon. Gentlemen were willing to sacrifice all other honour. For himself, as a Whig country Gentleman, he said there were things far more important than the transfer of any party from one side of the House to the other; and among those things were the honour of Parliament, political honour and consistency, and the respect which the country should entertain for its representatives. An injury had been done to the character of Parliament. That was what he imputed to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and not any base personal motives, of which he knew nothing. On the contrary, such were the labours undergone by Ministers, who were also Members of that House, and so great the pecuniary sacrifices, by relinquishing profitable professions and business, that he felt that the country was hardly aware how much was owing to those who transacted the business of the State.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I shall contribute but very slightly to what I may call the personal and almost offensive character of the greater portion of this debate; for I think I shall best consult the dignity of the Ministry itself and that of the House if I abstain from noticing many of the remarks which have been made; and certainly I should be doing wrong to my own feelings were I to attempt to retaliate. But when the hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney) stands up and tells us that he imputes to the great body of Gentlemen sitting on this side the House not personal but political dishonesty, and professes, as others have done, that he represents the majority of this House, I must tell him that both he and they are grossly neglecting their duty if, believing what they state, they do not take immediate steps to put an end to an exhibition which they tell us is a disgrace to the country and to the Parliament in which they sit. For such a proceeding I long. When the time shall come to vindicate my personal or political honour, I shall not be wanting, at least, in my efforts to do so. Passing to the subject more immediately under our consideration, I proceed to notice an observation which has fallen from the right hon. Member for Kilmar-nock. He states that there was no reason for saying that the division of the other night was sudden and unexpected. Let me speak for myself. There is no question on which I have taken greater interest than that rating and the personal payment of rates should be the foundation of the Parliamentary franchise; but after the division on the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose, understanding that further progress with the consideration of the Scotch Reform Bill in Committee would not be pressed that night, I left the House, and only returned—and returned by mere accident—at the last moment, before the division on the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock. I understand that those who represented the party opposite stated to many Friends on the Ministerial side of the House that there was to be no further progress with the Scotch Reform Bill that night, and the consequence was that many Members who would otherwise have remained in the House were absent from the division. I say this in my own vindication, because it would have been my duty to remain on this (the Treasury) Bench if I had thought that the Scotch Reform Bill would have been proceeded with. No imputation can be made against the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) on the score of not having given full Notice of his Amendment; for, as he has himself said, he gave Notice of the Motion some time ago, and it was on the Paper for the Business of that night; but, believing that the House would resume immediately after resolving into Committee, I certainly was surprised, when I came back to the House, to find that, instead of Supply being proceeded with, the Scotch Reform Bill was being considered in Committee. I have only one word to say to my hon. Friend (Mr. Percy Wyndham) who introduced the present discussion. I am very far from thinking, like the hon. and gallant Member behind me (Colonel Loyd Lindsay), that the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Cumberland was unprepared; for, in fact, it was prepared, but for a totally different state of things from that which has actually occurred. In the first place, my hon. Friend does not appear to have read accurately the Reform Bill of last year; for he imagines that the Commission appointed to inquire into the question of Boundaries was a Royal Commission, whereas it was a Parliamentary Commission. Therefore, to say that Parliament might deal with the question of Boundaries as it thinks proper was not such an extravagant assertion as my hon. Friend supposes. In the next place, my hon. Friend attacked the Government for abandoning the principle of rating, although my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) had just given Notice that, so far from abandoning the principle of rating, we proposed to ask the House to re-consider its former decision. It was further stated that threats have been held out to the House by the Government as to what would follow in certain contingencies; whereas the only observations on that point were made by my hon. Friend himself, who said that we ought to have told the House what we intended to do with Parliament in case we should be unable to carry our proposal. I state this for the purpose of showing that the hon. Member has no foundation for the attack he has made upon the Government. I say again that we are prepared at any moment to meet the charges brought forward in this desultory manner, if they are submitted to the House in such a shape that we can fairly deal with them. That is what we desire. I do not know that there is any Gentleman on this Bench who would not say that we have painful and difficult duties to discharge, or who would not acknowledge that from day to day and from hour to hour our difficulties are increasing; but at the same time we may entertain a sense of duty which prevents us from ignoring the obligations which we owe to ourselves, to our Friends, to this House, and to the country at large. For myself, I defy any Gentleman to say that we have done anything inconsistent at least with personal honour; and if any one wishes to impute to us political dishonour, the way to bring that accusation to a test is to submit a distinct Motion to this House.

MR. OSBORNE: We are again engaged in personal discussion, and we know that nothing so delights the House as baiting a Minister. But, in my mind, this proceeding has gone a little to far; and I think that those hon. Gentlemen who talk so loudly of the honour of Parliament would best consult that honour by not indulging so much in these miserable discussions, which can lead to no practical result. I for one, have no political sympathy with the right hon. Gentlemen who sit on the opposite Benches; but to them I impute no dishonest or dishonourable motives. I have still less sympathy with the hon. Baronet and Tory country Gentleman, the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) who defends the Ministers on every possible occasion. But this I will say—that neither as a Whig country Gentleman nor as a Tory country Gentleman, but as a sort of nondescript country Gentleman—that if I thought, as the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock thinks, I would not be satisfied with making speeches of the kind he has made, but I would test the opinion of this House by a Vote of Want of Confidence. I say, moreover, as a Member of the Opposition who wishes to transplant the Gentlemen opposite to the more congenial atmosphere of this side of the House, that, whatever steps I might take on that point, I would not be content to come down here night after night interfering with the Public Business; but I would come forward either to support the Motion of the hon. and learned Serjeant the Member for Sligo (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong), or to anticipate that Motion, and ask the House to declare whether, in its opinion, the Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench are or are not deserving of the confidence of the House. What is the position we are placing ourselves in? Night after night we move adjournments, we take every opportunity of scandalizing the Ministers, and imputing the basest motives to them; but we are positively afraid to say that we have no confidence in them. I say that I have myself no confidence in their discretion; but I do not impute these unworthy motives to them. [Mr. BOUVÉRIE: Neither do I.] Well, certainly, if you love them your brotherly affection is expressed in a most extraordinary manner. All I say is, Don't love me after the same fashion. I pray the House to consider one thing. The representative institutions in this country are going rather to a discount. The people out of this House view our proceedings with some distrust. There is but one Parliamentary way of expressing want of confidence in a Ministry, and I say that we are bound to adopt that mode if we think the Ministry do not deserve our confidence. I am not going to give any pledge to the hon. and learned Member for Sligo (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong) as to the course which I may pursue in reference to his Motion. I certainly will not move a Vote of Want of Confidence myself; and I think that if other Members are wise they will not move it. I will tell you why. [An Hon. MEMBER: Because they cannot carry it.] That I know nothing about; and I leave it to those older hounds who can yelp for the pack. But we all know that this Parliament is coming to a rapid end. We are all agreed that it ought to be brought to a rapid end. Let the Government push the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills. They do not lie upon a bed of roses. It cannot be agreeable to any men to hear what is said of them in this House night after night, and not be able to notice it elsewhere. I say that the sensible course for Parliament to pursue is to pass the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills in the best way we can, and to get rid of these miserable discussions and this still more miserable House. If you are not prepared to do that, then come forward with a Vote of Want of Confidence; and if that Motion is brought forward, it will be met, if not by discussion, at least it will be met in such a way as the character of the Ministry justly entitles the House to give them credit for.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Ministry if he would put upon the Paper any alterations which he might intend to make in the Scotch Reform Bill, in addition to those of which he had given Notice? It was absolutely necessary that hon. Members should know whether those words are to stand by themselves, or whether they were to be accompanied by any other alterations. He must, however, say one word with reference to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He said that he was taken by surprise the other evening—that he understood it was not intended to go into Committee on the Scotch Reform Bill on that night. If that was really the case, he must say that the Scotch Members had the greatest reason to complain. They appealed night after night to allow these Scotch and Irish Bills to go through, and they were told by the Government night after night that their only desire was to wind up the Session at the earliest period, and that the Scotch Reform Bill should stand for a day on which it should really be taken up. On Monday night, the right hon. Gentleman placed the Boundaries Bill before the Scotch Reform Bill; and now it appeared that, after a division upon my hon. Friend's the Member for Montrose Motion, he did not intend to go on with the Scotch Reform Bill—for what reasons and with what view he was entirely unaware. And then, when they agreed to a Resolution respecting a matter relating to Scotland, they were suddenly thrown into a Ministerial crisis. If they were to have a Ministerial crisis on every clause of this Scotch Reform Bill, there were a good many Amendments on the Paper, they would therefore have plenty of them. They did not desire to embarrass the Government by these Amendments. They related to matters of Scotch detail. This matter about the rating was not intended to defeat the Ministers, but to apply to Scotland the principle upon which a Reform Bill could work in that country; and he did not think it reasonable that when the House came to a decision upon such a point, they were to have a Government crisis thrown in their face.

MR. SCOURFIELD wished to explain the vote he had given the other night on the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose. He voted in the minority against that Motion, and if that had been negatived, he should also have voted against the proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer), that it was rather straining the rules of the House by an Instruction to the Committee on a Scotch Bill to give power to disfranchise English boroughs. He did not think Scotland stood in need of any additional Members. Instead of ten more, he rather thought if she had ten less, considering the sagacity and organization of the Scotch Members, they would be quite able to hold their own both as against England and Ireland.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

IRELAND—ARBOUR HILL GARRISON CHAPEL.—QUESTION.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that an order has been given for the discontinuance of Presbyterian Service in the Arbour Hill Garrison Chapel in Dublin, where it has been held for the last eighteen years, and for the future celebration of the same in a school-house?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, it was quite true that the order in question had been given. The Chapel had originally been consecrated as a place of worship in connection with the Church of England, and it was illegal that it should be used for worship by any other denomination. The illegality had not been noticed till a short time since, when the Archbishop of Dublin wrote a letter on the subject; and, in consequence, the order in question had been given, which, if this proceeding has caused any pain, he, for one, deeply regretted.

NAVY—THE "GLATTON" AND "HOTSPUR."—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MACKINNON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is true that a vessel of only 2,700 tons, the Glutton, can be built to carry twenty-five ton guns, with from twelve to fourteen inches of armour, to be available for the Mediterranean or wherever required, of what use would any of our four, five, or six thousand ton broadside ships be against her, with their eight and nine-inch armour, except to run away; why should the Glutton turret ship have only nine, knots speed when the Hotspur ram, of less tonnage, was to have twelve knots; has Captain Coles been consulted or allowed to see the drawings of the turret ships proposed and those now building for our Colonies; and why should not the turret-ship Glutton be a ram as well as the Hotspur?

MR. CORRY said, in reply, that he might venture to avail himself of this opportunity to make an explanation with reference to the name of one of the vessels which, as it stood in the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, was not very creditable to the good taste of the Admiralty in naval nomenclature. They might hope that if the ship in question should ever be engaged with an enemy she would prove a "Glutton" in the metaphorical sense of the word; but, in fact, her name was not the Glutton, but the Glatton, and she was so called after a vessel which, towards the end of the last century, succeeded in beating off a French squadron by which she had been attacked mainly in consequence of the large calibre of her guns. He could not very well answer the points of the hon. and gallant Member's Question without making a speech. He would, therefore, only observe that vessels intended for defensive purposes were built on principles which were wholly inapplicable to vessels intended as sea-going ships capable of keeping at sea in all weathers. He was quite certain the Controller of the Navy would be very grateful to the hon. and gallant Member if he could show him how sea-going ships of reasonable size, and combining all the necessary qualities, could be plated with 14 inches of iron. The drawings of the proposed turret ship were in a forward state, and would be referred to Captain Cowper Coles, so far as related to the turret itself, and the arrangements in connection with it.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH AUSTRIA. QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the new Tariff will come into operation, which, in the Commercial Treaty between this Country and Austria, was fixed to take date on the 1st January 1867; and especially, whether it will come into operation simultaneously with the new Tariff fixed in the Commercial Treaty between Austria and the Zollverein—namely, on the 1st June of this year?

LORD STANLEY said, he regretted to state that the negotiations on this subject had not yet been brought to a final conclusion. The Government were fully alive to the importance of the subject, which continued to occupy their attention. On two occasions there had been a temporary suspension of the negotiations at the urgent request of the Austrian Government, in consideration of the many internal difficulties in which that country was involved, and also in consideration of the sincere desire which it was believed Baron Beust entertained to fulfil the intentions his Government had expressed towards this country. The new Tariff, therefore, could not come into operation upon the 1st of June; but he hoped before long to be able to give the hon. Gentleman and the House more ample and satisfactory information on the subject than he could do at present. Under what was commonly known as the Favoured Nation Clause, England would derive the benefit of a considerable reduction of duties in the new tariff fixed in the commercial treaty between Austria and the Zollverein.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Is it a correct supposition that the Treaty between Austria and the Zollverein is fixed to come into operation on the 1st June?

LORD STANLEY: I am not informed.

DESIGNS FOR THE COURTS OF JUSTICE.

QUESTION.

MR. PEASE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the opinion of Her Majesty's Attorney General has been received on the legality of the award of the Judges of Designs for the Law Courts; and what is the nature of that opinion, if delivered to the Treasury?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that the opinion of the Attorney General on the legality of the award of the Judges of Designs for the new Law Courts had been received and considered. The Government were of opinion that they might submit to the House any proposition they might think proper upon the subject, and they would consider what that proposition should be.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is his intention to proceed with the Electric Telegraphs Bill this Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he wished to proceed with the Telegraphs Bill this Session, and he felt that commercial gentlemen were extremely desirous to see that Bill passed. He also believed that the House would be glad to have the opportunity of passing it; but the only chance of being able to do so would be to have a Morning Sitting; and if the House would assent to that he would endeavour to make arrangements for the purpose.

ARMY—DEFECTIVE AMMUNITION.

QUESTION.

MR. HERBERT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that the Brigade of Guards have very lately been obliged to abandon the usual annual rifle practice at Aldershot on account of some serious defects in the ammunition, which it is said caused some of the rifles to burst and others to be so damaged as to be useless; and whether he will state to the House the cause of such serious defects; whether any casualties happened to the men on account of them; how many rifles were damaged; and what steps will be taken to remedy these evils for the future?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, it was true that the usual annual rifle practice of the Brigade of Guards at Aldershot had been interrupted in consequence of five accidents that occurred to the rifles. He believed that that practice was going to be immediately resumed; but he was not prepared to admit that the accidents were caused by any serious defects in the ammunition. One barrel burst, and the other four guns were slightly damaged. The authorities had endeavoured to trace the cause; and certainly in one case, and he believed in more, the cause was the accidental use of cartridges invented when the Snider was first adopted, but which were condemned as defective. At the same time, in one of the five cases it was proved that one of the cartridges now in use was defective, and in consequence 7,000 cartridges were sent down for immediate trial, one in ten being opened and closely examined. From the result of the trial he was disposed to believe that the accidents must be rather classed among those casualties which from time to time would happen in the use of fire-arms. An inquiry was now being prosecuted with the view of ascertaining whether any improvement could be made in the general construction of the cartridge, and he could assure the House that no pains would be spared to make the cartridges supplied to the army as safe and as useful as possible. One of the men was slightly hurt, but no serious casualty occurred.

UNITED STATES IRON-CLADS.

QUESTION.

LORD JOHN HAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Government has been called to the reported sale of Iron-clads by the Government of the United States to South American Governments who are now in a state of war; if this be true, whether such an act is consistent with the principles of neutrality laid down by this Country and by the United States; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any Papers connected with the reported sale of such vessels?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that he had received no official information respecting the alleged sale of Iron-clads by the United States' Government to the South American Governments, and therefore he was not in a position to express any opinion upon the subject.

IRELAND—BIBLE DEPOT AT QUEENSTOWN.—QUESTION.

MR. LONG said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the following statement of facts—namely, that a clergyman of the United Church of England and Ireland, the Rev. M. A. C. Collis, has been threatened with assassination by a person styling himself "a good Catholic," unless he, Dr. Collis, would undertake to close the Bible Depot at Queenstown within four days; whether the above statement is correct; and, if so, whether the Government have deemed it their duty to take any steps to discover and to prosecute the person who subscribed the above-mentioned document?

Sir John Pakington

THE EARL OF MAYO, in reply, said, the constabulary of Queenstown had reported some days ago that on the 13th of this month the Rev. Dr. Collis, of Queenstown, had received a letter of the character referred to by the hon. Member. The constabulary were using every endeavour to discover the writer of that letter, and he hoped their exertions would be successful.

THE ASSISTANT JUDGE OF SIERRA LEONE.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for State for the Colonies, Whether Mr. Horatio Huggins, recently appointed to the office of Assistant Judge in the Colony of Sierra Leone, has ever been called to the English Bar, and whether he is the same person whose judgments while sitting as sole Judge in the Supreme Court at Sierra Leone were brought under the notice of the House last Session; And whether the Colonial Office has received a Communication from Mr. Rainy, a properly qualified advocate practising at the Bar of that Country, setting forth further facts having reference to that gentleman, and demanding an inquiry?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that the hon. Member for Dudley had four or five times placed Questions of a character similar to that which he now asked upon the Notice Paper, without coming down to the House to enable a reply to be given to them. He thought that this was scarcely the right course for any hon. Member to take. In reply to the first Question of the hon. Member he had to state that Mr. Horatio Huggins had been called to the English Bar, though the Question seemed to imply that he had not been called to that Bar, and was therefore not a fit person to fill the position to which he had been appointed. In answer to the second Question he had to state that Mr. Huggins' judgments had been noticed in that House last year, and that the allegations made against them had been proved to be unfounded; and in answer to the third Question he had to state that communications had been received from Mr. Rainy, whose statements had been inquired into and found to be inaccurate.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to say that this was the first time this Question had been put upon the Paper.

MR. ADDERLEY: I said Questions with respect to West African appointments.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he had put the Question on the Paper in the exercise of the ordinary privilege of a Member of that House, and he regretted that the Under Secretary had not confined himself to answering it. He should certainly take an early opportunity of bringing the whole subject with reference to these appointments before the House.

IRELAND—THE IRISH CHURCH.

QUESTION.

MR. MACEVOY said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, Whether, in the event of Parliament being dissolved, and an appeal made to the present Constituencies, he would in the new Parliament propose the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and the settlement of that question?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am rather unfortunate in being the object during the present Session of several Questions which raise very great scruple in my mind as to how far I am conforming to the general practice and rules of the House in replying. My own opinion is that it would not be consistent with Parliamentary decorum for any Member of this House to state what course he would take in a future Parliament, and I am absolutely precluded from so doing. I will only, therefore, say in general, by way of reply to the hon. Gentleman, that my intention is, in any situation or circumstances in which I may be placed, to adopt any and every measure of a legitimate character which may appear calculated to forward the great purpose which I have taken in hand with respect to the disestablishment of the Irish Church.

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir Stafford Northcote.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short Title of Act).

MR. DENMAN said, he understood that the principle of the Bill as it now stood which had hitherto not been considered, would be discussed at the present stage, and he proposed therefore to state his opinions with regard to it.

MR. DODSON reminded the hon. Member that they were not discussing the Preamble, and that he must confine his observations to the clause under consideration.

MR. DENMAN said, that to enable himself to discuss the whole measure he would conclude with a Motion—That the Chairman report Progress. He did not blame the Government for desiring to proceed with all reasonable expedition with this measure, which they had put forward as one of great importance, in view of an election by the new constituencies; but Members must be careful not to take any foolish or false step in the matter. The question whether the House should or should not part with its jurisdiction in these cases had not been adequately discussed, and those who were best acquainted with the proceedings of the present tribunals for the trial of Election Petitions—namely, the lawyers who practised before those tribunals, were unanimously of opinion that the existing system had many advantages, and was not open to any of the objections that had been raised against it. This Bill provided machinery which was not adequate to meet the difficulties of the case, and contained many provisions which he could not but regard as objectionable. He should support the clauses by which the provisions against bribery and corruption were made more stringent; but would leave the Committees as they are, so far as numbers are concerned. He would, however, appoint honorary Justices to preside over the investigations. After a General Election he would appoint coadjutors to the honorary Justices, to assist them in disposing of the increase of business that would result from it. He proposed to substitute for the proposal on that point in the Bill a provision enabling the honorary Justices and the Speaker of the House of Commons to appoint qualified barristers of a certain standing to assist them in the discharge of their duties and accordingly act as honorary Justices. They, like the honorary Justices, would be responsible for the law laid down, and the Committee, still consisting of five members, would decide all questions of fact. In a pamphlet published by Mr. Pickering, very much of what he (Mr. Denman) now proposed was embodied. Instead of a majority of Members, as at present, deciding a question, the jury should be unanimous, and the effect would be that the men engaged in the inquiry would feel a greater sense of responsibility than they do now. There would always be uncrupulous persons in a borough who would have an interest in getting up a local inquiry after an election, and who, by procuring such an inquiry, would have it in their power to ruin any man who had been returned, however fairly. Therefore, instead of putting it in the power of any man belonging to the place to have such an inquiry, he should propose to give the tribunal power to adjourn to the place when this step seemed to be requisite. This would be a useful and constitutional power; anything further would be oppressive and injurious. He could not help thinking it would be far better that the Government should let the question alone, so far as concerned the tribunal itself, during the present Session, confining themselves to stringent and severe enactments against the offence itself. He did not say this to damp the aspirations of the Government on the path of Reform, but he did not see what éclat they could expect to gain out of the subject during the present Session. He believed the Judges were not consulted until a very few days before their opinions were announced. He submitted there was ample ground for referring the subject to a new Committee, and would suggest that, in the first instance, all clauses relating to the Committees should be postponed. In that way, they might have a chance of legislating so as to do some good service in the matter; but if they were got into the maze of questions in connection with the tribunal, it would be equivalent to throwing overboard this question altogether for the Session, and there would be no chance of making any real progress. He begged to move that the Chairman report Progress.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER concurred in much that had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Denman). The present mode of treating Election Petitions was not satisfactory; but it was not so unsatisfactory as to induce them to make a change in the existing state of things unless they could get something almost perfect, so far as Legislation could be perfect. The Bill before the Committee certainly did not answer that expectation. He objected in toto to a single Judge being the tribunal to decide questions of contested elections. It was far worse than the present system, under which they were determined by a Committee of five Members. Another objection to the appointment of these honorary Judges was that at one time they would be overworked, and at another would hold mere sinecures. It was proposed that they should have other Judges to assist them when they were overworked; but the Judges had already said they did not wish to have anything to do with the matter. No doubt the Judges would have to discharge whatever duties Parliament might cast upon them; but it would not be desirable to compel such high functionaries to do what they did not like. It was utterly absurd to suppose that two Judges would be sufficient to decide all the Election Petitions which would arise after a General Election. They would receive £5,000 a year, and yet have nothing to do during a greater portion of the year. Their law and judicial capacity would get rusty from want of employment. It was suggested that they might sit in the Exchequer Chamber; but he believed that Court was adequate to its duties. If, however, they appointed them Judges of the Exchequer Chamber merely to fill up their time, they would be inferior in point of weight to the other Judges; and if the decision of a case turned upon their judgment, neither the profession nor the public would be satisfied. Then it was proposed to make them also members of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. That, again, was a mistake, because very few questions of Common Law came before it; and if it required strengthening, that should not be done by the addition of Common Law Judges. These objections, he thought, ought to be fatal to the Bill. A more reasonable solution of the matter would be by moving after a General Election an Address to the Crown for the appointment of Commissioners to decide these questions, care being taken that those Commissioners were properly qualified persons. Let them sit in Courts comprised of three members, and let them be adequately paid for the work they had to perform. This would be much better than the appointment of Judges who at some times would have more to do than they could possibly perform; and at other times would have nothing at all. Although the present practice was not perfect, it was not so bad as to justify a measure like this.

MR. LAWSON objected to the Bill on the ground that it applied solely to England. The three parts of the United Kingdom were under the same law, and it was a bad precedent to have separate legislation in matters common to the three countries. He believed it was intended to introduce a similar Bill for Ireland and Scotland; but as regarded Ireland he thought that the nomination by the Government of the day of two Judges in that country to try Election Petitions would not provide a tribunal satisfactory to any of the parties concerned. As long as the Bill remained in its present state he must give it his strenuous opposition.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he had strongly approved the Bill in its original shape; but the Government, in deference to the Judges, had left out their only valuable proposal, and now, bad—dreadfully bad—as was the jurisdiction of the House in reference to Election Petitions, he preferred to keep it as it was rather than to make the change now suggested. In his opinion the reasons given by the Judges for not taking upon themselves the proposed duty were insufficient; but he thought they ought not to give the Government power to select the particular Judges for that duty, but should allow them to be appointed by ballot from the whole body of the Judges. The power of appointing Judges Privy Councillors was objectionable. About thirty years ago there was a practice of making some Judges Privy Councillors, and he recollected that it created much jealousy among the Judges, and gave rise to the greatest possible dissatisfaction. Judges who had influence were made Privy Councillors, while those who were honest and had no influence did not attain to that distinction. He was not prepared to vote for a Bill taking away the jurisdiction of the House unless it was given entirely to the Judges. He also thought there should be one Bill for the entire kingdom. He believed the majority of the legal Members of the House were of opinion that additional Judges were not wanted, except for the circuits; but this Bill expressly provided that the two new Judges who were to be appointed under it should not go on circuit. As it was notorious that learned gentlemen who knew but very little law were sometimes appointed Judges, such persons might be appointed by the Government under this Bill; and as they would not be in close communication with the other Judges, they would forget what little law they knew. He objected to giving more patronage to a feeble Government, who ought to confine themselves to passing the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, dissolving Parliament, sending in their own resignation, and then returning thanks for having enjoyed Office so long. With regard to Election Committees, when they learnt who the Chairman in any case was, they knew the result. ["No, no!"] There might be exceptions, but that was the general rule. ["No, no!"] Her Majesty's Ministers could not carry anything without the support of the Opposition, and with such a weak Government, and in an expiring Parliament, which had been rightly condemned, he thought they ought to do nothing but what was absolutely necessary, and leave such measures as this for another Parliament to deal with.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he concurred with the hon. and learned Serjeant that the Government ought not to undertake any legislation that was not necessary; but he could not conceive any subject that more required legislation than the subject of the present Bill, and he should therefore give it his support. He certainly did not suppose any Government was capable of selecting two Judges, as the learned Serjeant insinuated, solely for the purpose of deciding Election Petitions in a manner which might be convenient. [Mr. Serjeant GASELEE: I neither said that nor insinuated it.] That was the impression produced on his mind, but he was glad he had misunderstood the hon. and learned Serjeant. He believed the present or any other Government would select the Judges whom they bond fide thought best qualified for the duty; neither could he concur with the hon. and learned Serjeant that the Judges had not too much to do. Sometimes they were very much overworked. Almost everyone was agreed that the jurisdiction on Election Petitions was not satisfactorily exercised by the Committees of that House. All the Amendments on the Paper pointed to that conclusion. In fact, a Committee of the House of Commons could not be a satisfactory tribunal in these cases for several reasons. First, it could not hold inquiries on the spot. Next, it could only hold them while Parliament was sitting; and a third and most important reason was that it was not so constituted as to be qualified to decide the intricate questions arising in election cases. The unanimous judgment of the Committee was that, if they parted with their jurisdiction, it should be transferred to the highest tribunal. He confessed he preferred the recommendation of the Committee that the jurisdiction should be given to the whole body of the Judges, and that, if necessary, some additions should be made to the Bench. As the Government had not adhered to their original proposal, they had, in his opinion, suggested the best alternative. In the present plan, the highest tribunal was still retained ; for it must be assumed that the two Judges selected would be rather above, and certainly not below, the average of the Bench. Such a tribunal would, in all probability, get through the work in about half the time required by a Committee of that House, while the circumstance of their conducting inquiries on the spot, would enable them to form their decision with a promptitude unknown to the tribunals upstairs. The only real objection urged against the scheme was removed by the clause which provided that the two Judges might be assisted by others when the amount of business was unusually large. Under the proposed scheme, inquiries into Election Petitions would be increased in efficiency and decreased in cost. The public, he felt sure, would repose the greatest confidence in the Judges, and, on the whole, he was of opinion that this was the best arrangement which could be adopted. He did not think that there was any necessity for including the legislation intended for Ireland and Scotland in the present Bill ; but at the same time he hoped that the Law relating to Corrupt Practices in those countries would as speedily as possible be assimilated with that of England.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE : I will remind the Committee of the position in which we stand in relation to the subject, which is confessedly one of great importance, and one which touches the privileges and the honour of this House. I am perfectly satisfied that the Committee is prepared to deal with it in a deliberate, calm, and impartial spirit, and with an anxious desire to sustain the honour and reputation of the House, and its position in the eyes of the country. This question of the purity of elections has been for a long time under the consideration of the House ; and for a very long time dissatisfaction has been expressed as to the mode in which the elections for representatives in this House are generally conducted. It needs no words of mine to point out the fact that it is becoming a prevalent opinion that the House of Commons is elected to a large extent by influences such as we are ashamed to own. And, if this opinion be not counteracted, the legitimate and constitutional influence which this House ought to bear in the country will be materially lessened and endangered. Whilst keeping our attention, then, upon this most serious and weighty question, we ought not at the same time to proceed with undue haste or consideration in the steps we may deem it necessary to take to remedy the evils of which we all complain. Notwithstanding all the efforts we have heretofore made to put a stop to corrupt practices, we are forced to admit that we have not as yet succeeded in impressing upon the country a full and undoubted confidence in our having adopted the best and most effective measures for the purpose. This, at least, is certain—we have not as yet succeeded in putting an end to the evils. Whilst the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Sir Robert Collier) was speaking in respect to the time which those investigations would take in the hands of the Judges, I was nearly tempted at the moment to add to what the hon. Gentleman was saying, that, if you can have this satisfactory tribunal, not only would those inquiries be disposed of in a much shorter time than they would be before an Election Committee, but the effect of such a tribunal being actually established would be to stop the necessity for many of these Election Petitions. If, I say, you can get a thoroughly satisfactory tribunal, in whom the electors will have the fullest confidence that any corrupt or improper practices would be immediately brought to light, and would be followed by prompt and severe punishment, then I think you will be going a long way towards putting an end to those evils which we all want to extinguish. The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) said that we may set aside all those provisions in regard to the mode of procedure and investigation, and content ourselves with those clauses adding penalties for bribery. Now, I contend that, if you content yourselves with merely imposing penalties for the offences, you will not touch the difficulties of the case. We do not want tremendous penalties. The effect of them might be to render conviction less easy. What we want is to get a system by which detection would be made certain. We want, in fact, to stop those corrupt practices. Her Majesty's Government, in considering the question last year, came to the conclusion that there are one or two weaknesses in our present system of inquiry which it would be desirable to correct. One of those weaknesses was the great evil in our system of hearing petitions. We find the worst cases are constantly hushed up, and never brought into notice, because of the time wasted before the question at issue is brought to a conclusion; and that the agents on both sides agree to get rid of them by pairing off petitions on the one side with those on the other. Then, again, however pure and public-spirited the Members of the Select Committees may be, you cannot have the same certainty as to the mode of proceeding as you would have in a Court of Law; nor can the proceedings before them, reported with "roars of laughter" provoked by the evidence, have the same effect in deterring as they would have if conducted on the spot and in the presence of the guilty parties. Under these circumstances, it is most desirable to establish a system under which those inquiries will be carried on upon the spot at which the occasion for them arose—that they shall be pursued as speedily as possible, so as to arrive at the truth, and to bring home detection, and that they shall be conducted by persons who command the respect and the confidence of the electors themselves. We felt, then, that we were not only asking the House of Commons to deal with questions, the speedy solution of which was necessary for its high character and honour, but we were also asking the House to part with some portion of its privileges properly dear to it—that is, the privilege of determining who are or who are not rightly elected representatives in this House. We all know there have been times in the history of this country when it was a matter of vital importance to the House of Commons to retain in its own hands the right of saying who were or who were not duly returned as its Members. Those were times in which it was worth while for the House of Commons to endure any reproaches as to the method of returning representatives to it rather than part with its privilege of declaring who had or had not been properly returned. Those times have happily gone by, and it is no longer of such vital importance to this House to retain in its own hands the decision upon such questions. The main principle as to the mode in which the representatives shall be elected has been already decided, and has passed into the Constitution of the country. No danger, therefore, now exists of the matter being again called in question. The Government felt, however, that they had to deal with a matter of considerable delicacy in asking the House to part with this privilege. They first introduced the subject in a Bill of a tentative character—a Bill, however, that hardly rose to the level of what was required. If the House assented the Government said that they would go farther in the way of legislation. The result was the appointment of a Select Committee, who examined the subject with great deliberation and at great length last year, though they did not take any evidence. A Bill in which the principle concurred in by that Committee was embodied was subsequently presented to the House, but owing to the lateness of the Session it was found impossible to proceed with it. The Government, however, accepted the Report of that Committee as the decision of the House of Commons, and took it as a conceded point that the House was prepared to surrender this privilege, on the ground that it was to be surrendered to the Judges—the highest legal authorities of the country. Before introducing the present Bill, however, they thought it right to communicate with the Judges upon one simple point—namely, supposing the House of Commons to commit to the Judges the duties prescribed under the measure, what additional assistance would they require? The Judges, however, instead of answering this simple question, raised objections to the whole scheme and altogether declined to undertake these duties. They thus left the Government in a difficulty; and another scheme was proposed which was submitted to the House; but the House upon this intimated that it would not part with its privileges except to the highest authorities. The Government at length devised a plan which they thought would meet all the difficulties of the case. One of the difficulties raised by the Judges was this—that the work under the Bill would come upon them in such floods it would be impossible for them to execute it without interrupting the ordinary business in which they were engaged. The Government proposed that the ordinary strength of the judicial Bench should not be lessened, and that provision should be made by the appointment of special Judges for this particular purpose, whose services should also be available for work which does not usually come before the ordinary Judges—such as appeals before the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. The Government submitted this proposal with a sincere desire to accomplish something that should be satisfactory. And how are we met? The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) moves that you, Sir, shall report Progress, with, I presume, the object of having this question referred again to a Select Committee.

MR. DENMAN said, his objects were to obtain a general discussion upon the measure, and to have the question referred to another Select Committee.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: In regard to the reference of the Bill to another Select Committee, I will venture to say that, if such a proceeding be assented to, we cannot expect the measure to pass this year; and I think that the House cannot appoint a Committee that will carry more weight with it than did the Select Committee of last year. There is very little to be considered by a Select Committee, because this is the Bill of last year, with the exception of the point with reference to the Judges. That point we shall have sooner or later to discuss and decide in this House, and to refer it to a Select Committee would be a wasting of the precious time of this Session. If the House wishes to make real progress with the measure it will be better to withdraw the Motion and at once proceed to discuss the clauses of the Bill. The Bill can be better discussed in Committee of the Whole House than by a Select Committee. I ask the House to examine it calmly and dispassionately, and the only object the Government have in proposing the Bill is to improve the present system of dealing with Election Petitions.

MR. MELLY thanked Her Majesty's Government most warmly for the Bill, containing clauses providing for an inquiry on the spot, which seemed to him to be the first proposition which had been made at all calculated to go to the root of the evil. Under the new state of things the kind of corruption that was likely to prevail was that of small payments to a great number of persons. A few years ago there had been an example in point; and it had taken the Committee in London no less than twenty-six days, during which they examined no fewer than 326 witnesses, before they were satisfied that there was a clear case. The cost to the prosecutor of that Petition had been no less than £11,000. Surely, therefore, as a matter of saving expense, it was most desirable that there should be a local inquiry. Then, again, the practice of "squaring" petitions would be put an end to. That was never done on the spot. The parties who had been, as they thought, unfairly defeated, were always exceedingly unwilling to give up the contest; and when petitions were "squared," it was always after they had passed into the hands of London agents. As to the tribunal to be appointed, he should place the fullest confidence in whichever Judges the Government of the day might appoint; for he had always found the strongest political partizans, when appointed to the Bench, keenly alive to the responsibility of their position and the necessity of exercising strict impartiality in every matter which came before them for decision. He would be quite ready to trust his own case, if he were ever unfortunately in that position, even to the warmest partizans of the party to which he was opposed, when once they had assumed the Judicial ermine.

MR. SCHREIBER said, there were two classes of the Members of that House who might be allowed to feel a natural interest in the Bill before them—those who had sat on Election Committees, and those on whom Election Committees had sat. It was his misfortune—assuredly it was not his fault—to have belonged to the latter; and as the result of his personal experience, amid all the changes and chances of this eventful Session, there was one hope to which he had been constant—namely, that they would pass this Bill, or some equivalent measure, before they were sent to their constituents. He had spoken of his personal experience. It was comparatively recent, it was somewhat costly; it was, therefore, vivid, and it was very much at the service of the Committee. He was sure it would be wrong to say of Election Committees, as at present constituted, that they were not impartial. He was confirmed in his seat by the unanimous decision of a Committee, the majority of which consisted of two Metropolitan Members and a Roman Catholic Gentleman—a tribunal not altogether favourable for one of his opinions; but their decision was unanimous. He could further say that when the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) was in the Chair, the Bar was certainly not stronger than the Bench. But when he had said that he had said all. The process was dilatory, it was costly, and it was totally devoid of all moral effect. Like many other Members of this House, he was elected on the 12th of July 1865, and it was not till May 1866 that he was declared duly qualified to sit. During all that time, he had been walking about with this drawn sword of Damocles suspended over his head; but all the same he had been taking part in the critical divisions of the time; and, if his memory did not deceive him, he had made a speech. All this, of course, was wrong, if he was not duly qualified to sit. Under this Bill they would, at least, have had a prompt decision on that point. But the existing system was not only dilatory, it was also costly. No sooner was a Petition presented than the principal witnesses on both sides became possessed with a sudden desire to go abroad. They did so at the respective cost of the petitioner and the sitting Member; while there, they developed the most unexpected and expensive tastes, to the great inconvenience of their families on their return. The next result of these proceedings was, that a seat was defended before an Election Committee, at the cost of some £500 a day; and he had six days of it. And then the process, after all, had no moral effect. The Committee were regarded by the witnesses as men of like passions with themselves; and the whole thing was treated as a joke. What he wanted was, to hear a convicted briber addressed by a Judge of the land as he would address a convicted pickpocket. But, when all this had been done, he would not have the House deceive itself—it would have done nothing until it had grappled with the evils of bribery at municipal elections. The Bill of last Session established an identity of Parliamentary and municipal franchise; and he said that while corruption was constant, annual, flagrant at the municipal elections, it was a mockery and a farce to send down Parliamentary candidates and tell them to hold pure elections. If hon. Members were in earnest in this matter, let them speak out. So far as his own borough was concerned, he had no hesitation in saying that votes at the municipal elections were now openly bought and sold for beer tickets. And then the hon. Member for Birmingham told them that the extension of the franchise was to be the remedy for corruption. He was sorry not to see the hon. Member in his place; but he must take leave to say that that remark displayed a wonderful want of acquaintance with the real nature of things—especially of electioneering things. Whether there would or would not be bribery depended on whether there was or was not a balance of party which made it worth while to contest the municipal elections. So surely as these were contested corruption would come in; and with a reduction of the franchise they would only extend the area of corruption. These were the few remarks which he had to offer to the Committee; and before he sat down he would repeat the expression of his earnest hope that they would pass this Bill; and that, when it passed, it would contain some provision against the flagrant evil of corruptions at municipal elections.

MR. AYRTON said, the hon. Member (Mr. Schreiber) seemed to think that the decision of the Committee which had seated him was unsatisfactory, and would have preferred an investigation before one of the Judges.

MR. SCHREIBER: I said the process by which it arrived at that result was unsatisfactory.

MR. AYRTON said, that having been Chairman of the Committee in question, it seemed to him strikingly to illustrate the danger of transferring the determination of such questions to a tribunal that would deal with them on rigid technical principles; for while the decision of the Committee in seating the hon. Gentleman was no doubt right, if the case had been tried before one of the Judges what the decision might have been it was not easy to say. As to the question of moral weight, no doubt the proceedings of Election Committees did lose their moral influence if what afterwards was stated to occur really took place. There was undoubted evidence of corrupt practices at Cheltenham, and by way of honouring the decision of the Committee the hon. Member paraded himself in the town of Cheltenham. [MR. SCHREIBER: No, no!] He was seen there afterwards in the company of those persons whose conduct was brought under the notice of the Committee. [MR. SCHREIBER: No, no!] At all events, it was important that such a thing should have been publicly stated in the Cheltenham newspapers, and should not have been contradicted by the hon. Gentleman. Of course, if a Member under such circumstances did not sustain the decision of the Committee it could not be expected to have much moral weight. Regarding the Bill as a measure for the suppression of bribery, he had in vain endeavoured to discover how it could have any such effect. The only material change it made as regarded the presentation of Petitions was that the seat of a Member might be challenged, not only at any time during a Session, but at any time during the whole duration of the Parliament. He thought, however, that the Statute of Limitations on that subject was founded on important public considerations, and should not be lightly disturbed. It was absolutely essential to the independence of Members of that House that after a certain period they should be secure of their seats; but, if Parliament deemed otherwise, the change might be made without destroying the existing tribunal. There was another point to which great importance was attached, and that was the prosecution of the Petition. He confessed he could not find in the Bill one word which would have the effect of making the prosecution before a judicial tribunal more effectual than before an Election Committee. On the contrary, it would be far easier to suppress a Petition before the new tribunal. The proposal to submit the question to a Judge who should go down to the spot surrounded with all the circumstances of a Judge of Assize was the very thing to deprive him of all control over the inquiries. How could he interfere to urge on a prosecution? If the party who had presented the Petition and the party petitioned against were both agreed that the case should not be proceeded with, the Judge would be perfectly helpless in their hands. Years ago when Lord Campbell had proposed some new-fangled plan for preventing collusive suits in the Divorce Court, he (Mr. Ayrton) said that his only effectual precaution would be to empower an attorney to appear on behalf of the public. That had been done with the best results; and that was the only plan that would be of any real use here; but it was a plan that did not appear in the Bill. There was no provision whatever in the Bill for anything like independent action. It was the old suit of The Petitioner v. The Sitting Member, which might be compromised at any time if the Petitioner chose. As he said the other day, so far from being a Bill to suppress, it was one to conceal or prevent the knowledge of bribery and corruption. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) said that it was to put an end to that shocking practice of pairing off petitions; but how on earth could they prevent a man saying "You withdraw your petition, and somebody else petitioning against a Member on the other side will withdraw his;" and all the arrangements would be made in certain solicitors' offices in London. In point of fact, pairing off would be effected with greater facility under the Bill than under the present system, while it would be more difficult to detect the cases in which it was resorted to. Another misconception which the supporters of the measure laboured under was that by a local inquiry a complete exposure would be secured, because such an exposure was now obtained by a Commission. The reason, however, why full disclosures were made before a Commission was that the seat which had been disputed was no longer in jeopardy. So long as it was uncertain which party would be victorious, everybody was anxious to conceal what had taken place; and it was only when the contest was over that it began to ooze out how it had been obtained, and then after one man had spoken others spoke also, and a sudden fear seized the guilty parties, and the moment a Commission was appointed and an assurance given that if they spoke the whole truth no penal consequences would follow, they were all as eager to disclose everything as they had been before anxious to conceal it. But the local inquiry, carried on while it was uncertain who would obtain the seat, would totally fail in eliciting the truth, and no more information could be obtained on the spot than in the Committee-rooms of the House of Commons. If the Commission sat in London, under the same circumstances, the result would be precisely the same; but if a Judge went down to try a Petition, the seat being still in jeopardy, all the party contrivances which prevented the discovery of the facts by a Select Committee would be resorted to, in order to prevent the new tribunal from eliciting the whole truth. So far, therefore, from the establishment of the proposed new tribunal putting an end to corruption, it would very likely lead to its practice with still greater impunity. Then, if they looked at it in another point of view, a very important preliminary question arose, and that was, how far a Judge would be enabled to proceed before he was stopped by his attention being called to the fact that he was transgressing some rule or Standing Order of Parliament, and thus interfering with the privileges of the House. It would be very seldom indeed that, in such cases as were likely to come before this new tribunal, a plain and simple issue could be put before the Judge; but it must often happen that collateral questions would arise, any discussion even of which might be a breach of privilege. No less an authority than Lord Coke had laid it down as a legal axiom that, however learned lawyers might be in the laws of Westminster Hall, they had no knowledge whatever of the laws which regulated the privileges of Parliament, and must accept those privileges as they were prescribed. There were numerous cases in which questions as to the privileges of that House must arise incidentally, and he wished to be informed how those cases were to be dealt with. Not long ago, an Election Committee made a Report, as to the conduct of a returning officer in the case of two candidates having an equality of votes. The House thereupon passed a Resolution, as it had a perfect right to do, as to the conduct of that officer. Was the Judge to be bound by such a Resolution, and might he not say that the Common Law had been superseded by the statute, unless the clause were so accurately framed as to limit exactly the power of the Judge? More than that, he was prepared to take his stand upon the position that the decision of a single Judge, who had never been called upon to discharge the functions of a jury, and might have no knowledge of the habits of the people, was not entitled to so much authority as the opinion formed by four members of an Election Committee. Yet this Judge, who might be incompetent for the functions of a jury, was to be entrusted with the enormous power of deciding the destinies of 500 Members of this House. The House would surely never consent that questions which might affect the fate of a Government, and the destinies of the country, should be allowed to depend upon the judgment of a single Judge. The fate of the Ministry and of the nation might depend on the verdict of a single Judge, who would not have any one person near him to probe his conscience. He did not believe the House would consent to such a change, and some kind of jury must be substituted for the single Judge. But was such a jury, drawn from the body of the county, likely to decide better than a tribunal of five Members of that House, acting under the sense of responsibility?

He warned the House against substituting for the honourable decisions of one of their own Election Committees, the narrow technical mode of decision practised in Courts of Justice. The result would be that the straightforward, honourable man would often be the victim of the decision of these Courts, and that the cunning man who had the most practised election agents would escape. One of the strongest objections to this measure was that it would reduce the Judges to the position of servants and instruments of that House. They were not to perform their functions in regard to Members of that House as they did in the general administration of justice. They were to report to that House; but who was to bring the Reports under the notice of that House? Was the Speaker to do it, or was the task to be confided to the Home Secretary? His final objection was that they ought not to pass a measure dealing with the seats of the 500 English Members until they had before them the Bills which were to regulate the trial of claims to the seats of the Scotch and Irish Members. Would the representatives of either Scotland or Ireland accept such a Bill as this? The House had never been informed where the Judges were to come from who were to try these questions, or how long the trial of Petitions, after each election, would occupy them. He objected, moreover, to the general scope and character of the present Bill, as being insufficient for the objects for which it had been introduced; and he thought that if they devoted three or four nights to its discussion they would be unable at the end of that time to render it a satisfactory measure. It would be a mere waste of time to go on with the consideration of the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE was compelled to enter his protest against the somewhat impassioned, not to say stilted, eloquence of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, who had so vehemently objected to the House abandoning the long-cherished right of being the tribunal which had to adjudicate upon its own delinquencies. He had been impressive on the evils of a trial conducted by a Judge without a jury. Might there not, however, be something even more objectionable than this—namely, a trial conducted by a jury without a Judge. No one could say that the country felt that absolute respect for the purity and independence of Election Committees which ought to be entertained in order to make the institution respected. He appealed to the conscience of all who had sat upon Election Committees to say if they were not conscious of the little respect with which counsel treated those before whom they were pleading, compared with the manner in which they would have approached a tribunal presided over by some bonâ fide jurist. He did not impugn the honest intentions of the members of Election Committees; but he asked, how could persons who were antecedently political partizans go to the work of discrimination with dispassionate and judicial minds? How could five promiscuous Gentlemen chosen because three of them happened to belong to one party and two of them to the other—none necessarily educated to sift evidence—proceed without misgiving to adjudicate upon some difficult case of abstruse law hanging on hazy facts dressed out for them—law and facts together—by the skilled advocacy of trained and paid advocates, when perhaps they were all of them under the torture of the consciousness that upon the decision to which they arrived the fate of a party contest and all their own material future might turn? If, then, the House meant to show that it had an election point of honour, it must at once and for ever cast to the winds that vanity which made it keep in its own impotent hands the trial of these election cases. It was bound to do so at this moment, when by its own act it had been put upon its trial before the people of the realm. The hon. and learned Member had descanted on what he represented as the narrowness of a judicial award. In reply he (Mr. Beresford Hope) would only ask what was so likely to produce judicial narrowness as ignorance or inexperience, while the habit of adjudication which was incident to a Judge's existence created that breadth of thought which legitimate self-confidence alone could engender? There was one objection to this Bill stated by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets in which he entirely agreed—that it was most undesirable to make it apply to England alone. Unfortunately, both parties in 1866 and in 1867 had followed the tradition of 1832, and brought in separate Reform Bills for England Scotland and Ireland, which were followed up by a separate treatment of the ancillary measures; but he believed it would have saved a great deal of confusion and delay if they had brought in one Reform measure applicable to the three kingdoms. He believed that the House would last year have passed such a measure almost as easily as the Bill for England alone, which was now being re-manipulated in the hands of Scotch and Irish Members. Wishing well to the main principle of establishing a judicial extra-Parliamentary tribunal for Election Petitions, he advised the Government not to push this Bill through in its present form. The more haste, the less speed. Let the Chairman report Progress; let this Bill be withdrawn, and another be introduced at the earliest moment, and certainly during the present Session, applicable to Scotland and Ireland as well as England.

MR. M'LAREN said, he wished to say a single sentence with regard to the allusions that had been made first by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson); then by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton); and, lastly, by the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), who had just sat down, respecting the want of uniformity in this Bill, and the alleged defect of its not applying to all the three kingdoms. Now, as far as regarded the Northern portion of the kingdom, he thought he should be able to relieve the anxiety of those Gentlemen who had taken it under their wing, by reminding them that there was a Return on the table of this House which showed that, since the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, there had been 252 Petitions presented to Parliament alleging corrupt practices, and that of these only four came from Scotland, and of the four only two were found to be substantiated. Now, he thought when a Petition had been presented on an average only once in every nine years from Scotland, it would not require any addition to the Judges in that part of the kingdom to decide or report upon them. The general opinion in Scotland was that they had too many Judges already, and there would be no difficulty whatever in sparing one of the Judges to try a petition when there was one to be heard. He had no hesitation in saying that in half-an-hour he could frame a clause—a perfectly operative one—in this Bill, which would make it as suitable for Scotland as in its present state it was to England. He had no doubt the learned Lord Advocate could frame the clause in a shorter time, and in much better terms. He said therefore that hon. Gentlemen might be relieved from their fears about Scotland, for the matter could be managed in a few minutes. He must say he heartily concurred in the principle of having one Bill for all portions of the United Kingdom; and if they had taken the view of the hon. Member (Mr. Beresford Hope), and had passed one Reform Bill for the whole of the United Kingdom, he thought they would have had a better Bill that would have occupied less time in discussion, and that they would have heard fewer extraordinary speeches—that they would have saved the very extraordinary speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and possibly have got all they were still looking for.

MR. DISRAELI regretted that the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Denman) should have moved that the Chairman report Progress, because he thought there was a fair chance of making progress with the Bill in Committee that night. The hon. and learned Gentleman founded his proposition on the ground that there had been no discussion on the principle of the Bill; but unless his (Mr. Disraeli's) recollection deceived him very much, that statement was not entirely correct. He recollected that the hon. Member for Berwick (Mr. Mitchell) opened a discussion upon the Question that the Speaker leave the Chair, and that that discussion, which was upon the principle of the Bill, was not a short one; and the House having decided after that discussion to go into Committee, he must express his disappointment at their not making any progress. At the same time it was not his inclination to attempt to check legitimate discussion in this House; but still at that late hour he saw no chance of proceeding in Committee with any advantage, and therefore he would consent to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman to report Progress, so that they might proceed with the other Business of the night.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not know how to understand the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The Bill raised a question extremely interesting to Members of this House; and, as far as he could judge, those who were considered authorities were, without reference to parties, singularly divided in opinion on the subject. Now he thought when the right hon. Gentleman appointed this Bill for the Business of the evening, he might have anticipated, from the gravity of the question of the transfer of jurisdiction over contested elections, and the state of opinion on the subject, that it would lead to a lengthened discussion. He (Mr. Gladstone) was not at all inclined to disagree with him in principle as far as this—to entertain the transfer of jurisdiction for the sake of the great advantage of local inquiry; but there was a great difference of opinion on this point, and that transfer, in his judgment, could not be made apart from the very prevalent opinion of the House. To carry the transfer by a bare majority would not be satisfactory, because they could not then confide in the stability of the system. If the Bill was to stand over he should like to know what were the views of the right hon. Gentleman as to any further proceeding on it. The Bill contained important provisions connected with the transfer of the jurisdiction of the House, and Notices had been given by many private Members of Amendments affecting the purity of election, which it was very desirable should be discussed. Under these circumstances he was anxious to know what were the views of the Government upon the question of the transfer of the jurisdiction, and upon the Notices which had been placed upon the Paper. If the right hon. Gentleman were—as in fact he might not unreasonably be—of opinion that the obstacles under present circumstances were too great to admit of a discussion of the particular method he proposed for the transfer of the jurisdiction, he could not help thinking that it would be for the advantage of the House that that should be made known at once. But while admitting that the Government might be right in desiring to postpone the question of the transfer of jurisdiction, there were other questions affecting the satisfactory conduct of elections which that House ought to have an opportunity of discussing, and which would, he had no doubt, be dealt with calmly and impartially, and in a temper entirely free from party feeling. He should be sorry to learn that it was the intention of the Government to drop the Bill altogether.

MR. DISRAELI said, the right hon. Gentleman had entirely misunderstood him. The Government were not prepared to give up the Bill, or any part of it. The provision relating to the transfer of the jurisdiction of that House, which he looked upon as the main principle of the Bill, had been discussed upon the second reading, and could have been discussed in Committee, and if the result of their labours in Committee should not prove satisfactory, might be discussed again upon the third reading; but as far as the Government were concerned, they wanted to pass the Bill in its entirety. He had hoped that they should have got into Committee upon the Bill at an early hour, and should have passed the evening in discussing its provisions; but as it was then late, and there was an evident disposition to discuss the principle of the Bill in a desultory manner on the Motion to report Progress, and as he despaired of getting on with the Committee that night, he thought it would be better that Progress should at once be reported, and that they should proceed with the other Business. Had the House adopted the suggestion which was made on behalf of the Government, at an early hour, they would have been discussing the provisions of the Bill long ago.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that when the hon. and learned Member behind him (Mr. Denman) moved that Progress be reported, he did not do so with the object of stopping the consideration of the Bill. The discussion upon the principle of the Bill in its previous stages had been very slight, and it was desirable that it should be more fully gone into. He was a Member of the Committee which recommended the alteration of the mode of trial, but he had for himself opposed the total abandonment by that House of all its jurisdiction on this subject. It was the duty of the Government to let the House know what were their intentions with respect to Scotland and Ireland upon this question, as it would be an absurdity to discredit the existing tribunals, as far as England was concerned, and yet leave them jurisdiction over elections in the other parts of the kingdom. The Government ought to state definitely what their intentions were respecting the present Bill, and also to lay before the House their scheme for dealing with Scotch and Irish elections.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) should bear in mind that the Bill as originally drawn up in accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee was not intended to include either Scotland or Ireland in its provisions. When objections were raised on the part of the English Judges to the transfer of the jurisdiction to themselves, it was thought better that the provisions of the Bill should only refer to England, on the understanding that when once it was decided what principle should be adopted with regard to this country it would be easy to introduce Bills founded upon a similar principle with regard to Scotland and Ireland. The Government had been rather hardly treated that evening in reference to this Bill. They had placed the Bill upon the Paper as the first Order of the Day, in the full belief that the House would go into Committee upon it at an early hour, and would make considerable progress in the discussion of its provisions. A discussion, however, for which the Government were not responsible, had been raised upon another subject, and had occupied some time, and had prevented the House going into Committee upon the Bill until a comparatively late hour; and then the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Denman) had at once moved that the Chairman report Progress, in order, as he said, in the first place, that the principle of the Bill which the Government thought the House had already agreed to, should be more fully discussed; and, secondly, that he might have an opportunity of moving that the Bill be again referred to a Select Committee. He saw but little use at the present moment in protracting the discussion.

MR. DENMAN observed that the Bill as originally drawn was very different from the Bill as it now stood; its principle had not been discussed, and it was for the purpose of obtaining further discussion that he had made the Motion for reporting Progress. He altogether objected to the proposed tribunal. If the Government were able to render the Bill a valuable one, it would be in consequence of the valuable suggestions which had been made during the present discussion.

MR. FAWCETT entreated the right hon. Gentleman opposite to use all the influence which the Government possessed and to persevere with this Bill. There were portions of it undoubtedly to which objection might be taken; but there were many advanced Liberals willing to assist him in getting the measure passed. He feared that the discussion of that evening would produce a singularly bad impression out-of-doors, where an opinion prevailed very extensively that the House was not in earnest in its desire to put down corruption. And when it was perceived—as it could not fail to be—that the discussion and delay had originated on the Liberal side of the House, he could not refrain from rising and repudiating those tactics altogether, or from declaring that there were some at least among the Members on that side who were sincere in their desire to legislate upon the subject this Session. In spite of all that had been said by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman), he still thought he had adopted a very unusual course. The Bill had been read a first and a second time, and upon the proposition that the Speaker do leave the Chair, there had been more than one Motion leading to prolonged discussion. And that night, when hon. Members had come down expecting to have an opportunity of discussing and improving the clauses of the Bill, they were prevented from doing so by the renewed discussion on the whole principle of the measure raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman. What would the country say to-morrow, on reading the discussion, but that this was a repetition of the old game, and that the House of Commons was not sincere in its desire to put down corruption and check election expenditure? For this reason, he entreated the right hon. Gentleman to press on the Bill. ["Agreed."] He wished they were agreed. Reform legislation could not be considered as complete till some measure of this kind was passed; and in his opinion it was not inferior in importance either to the Scotch or the Irish Reform Bill.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER repudiated the notion that there was any desire for delay on the Liberal Benches. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire felt very naturally that this was a great constitutional question, upon which it was important not to legislate in a hurried or incomplete manner. The House ought to be very jealous of its honour; and, in parting with all control over future election inquiries, the House showed a want of regard for, and appreciation of the high character which its tribunals had always maintained. They had always been composed of, and been presided over, by the most trusted Members of the House, in whose hands the honour of the House might be safely left. Under the proposed system, the first notice which the House might receive of an election inquiry was the Report of the Judge to the Speaker that a particular Member had been unseated.

MR. MORRISON rose to support the appeal made by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) to the Government to resist the Motion for reporting Progress.

MR. DENMAN said, he intended to withdraw it.

MR. MORRISON would still suggest to the Committee, as a point of Order, that it was most inconvenient to encourage the practice of Gentlemen making speeches upon the principle of a Bill when once they had got into Committee. Business would be proceeded with much more rapidly and satisfactorily if Gentlemen having opinions which they desired to put forward would advance them at the proper time, and if upon Motions to report Progress or other formal proposals hon. Members would confine themselves more strictly within the four corners of the Motion.

MR. DENMAN said, he was much obliged to his hon. Friend for his lecture. But he must remind him that till that evening he had never had an opportunity of discussing the Bill as a whole. He was quite willing that the Motion to report Progress should be withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if it was the pleasure of the Committee that the Motion should be withdrawn.

Many hon. Members crying "No :"

THE CHAIRMAN put the Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress."

SIR GEORGE GREY asked what course the Government wished the Committee to adopt?

MR. DISRAELI: I thought I had distinctly expressed the wish of the Government to make progress in Committee, if it be not already too late.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Application of Act) postponed.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (To whom and by whom Election Petitions may be presented).

MR. BOUVERIE, who had given Notice to move to omit all the clauses from 5 to 18 inclusive—which relate to the Presentation and Service of Petitions, the Judges and the Trial of Petitions—for the purpose of inserting new clauses, proposing a different system of procedure, said, that the clauses he proposed to strike out completely ousted the jurisdiction of the House, and to that he had a decided objection. The 5th clause provided that the Petition should, in the first instance, be presented to the Court of Common Pleas, and the House of Commons need not know that the election of one of its Members was impugned until the Judge who tried the Petition certified his determination to the Speaker that the Member was duly elected, or that the election was void, and it became necessary to issue a new Writ. He thought that was going much farther in the way of parting with the control of its own affairs than the House would like to go. The objection to the existing tribunal was, that a Committee, though honest and well meaning, was overborne by the Bar, and thus rendered incapable and inefficient. This defect, however, did not exist when the Chairman of the Committee was able and competent; but as a competent Chairman could not necessarily be procured, he proposed to remedy this—and other defects which had at the same time been objected to by the Committees—by a series of clauses. He proposed to preserve the Election Committee in the form of a jury; but, instead of the present plan, the General Committee of Elections should choose from the Election panel a Committee of five Members. This Committee was to be presided over by one of the Judges of the Superior Courts at Westminster (not being a Peer), Her Majesty being empowered to appoint three additional Judges. The trial before the Judge would be conducted in precisely the same manner as a case at Nisi Prius, the Judge deciding questions of law and the admissibility of evidence, the Committee acting as a jury finding as to the facts. At the conclusion of the inquiry, the Judge was to certify to the Speaker the result of the trial; he was also to report in writing to the Speaker the opinion of the Committee as to any charges of corrupt practices at the election in question; and might further make a special Report as to any other matters which may arise in the course of the trial, which, in his judgment, ought to be submitted to the House of Commons. In that way he presumed the objection as to the inefficiency of the Committees of that House as a Court of Inquiry would be got over. In his opinion there was an insuperable objection to submitting the position and character of a Member of that House to the decision of one Judge. Judges were not angels, but were—like other men—liable to be influenced by their political feelings in political matters. A remarkable instance of this occurred in the well-known case of Mr. O'Connell, when the Judges in the House of Lords all voted along with their political party. This was a strong proof that even the most eminent Judges were liable to be influenced in their judgment by their political feelings. But even if political feeling never biased the judicial mind, the public might believe it did, and that feeling, however groundless, would be sufficient to rob the tribunal of all weight. If, then, they could not entrust the decision of an Election Petition to a single Judge, they must call in a jury; and their choice lay between a jury chosen in the ordinary way, and one selected from the Committee of Elections panel, and he contended that a jury selected from the House would be preferable to any other. It must be borne in mind that if the inquiry was to be made on the spot, the jury must be local, and local juries would be sure to be influenced by party motives; but if the jury were a Committee of the House it would not be subject to local influences, and in every way it would be a more trustworthy jury than any that could possibly be devised. He therefore proposed the erection of an intermediate tribunal—one which should avoid the objection of local bias, and at the same time maintain the jurisdiction of the House of Commons. It had been said that the present tribunal was fruitful of delay, and that an inquiry by a Judge on the spot would be expeditious. It was obvious, however, that this result could only be attained by the appointment of a great many Judges; and it should be remembered that, while it would be out of the question to appoint more than a very limited number of Judges, the Parliamentary tribunal was capable of comparatively unlimited multiplication, and a very little alteration in the Controverted Elections Act would enable the House to dispose of any number of Election Petitions in a very short time. As to the proposed inquiry being conducted on the spot, he was sceptical as to the advantages of that method. He had seen a good deal of contested elections, and had always found that, except in the case of a very few better informed persons, both parties were sure of winning; and that, as one party must lose, there was sure to be much disappointment, and strong accusations of bribery and corruption. Rumours to that effect flew about the place immediately after the election; but in nine-tenths of the cases all those rumours ended in smoke. If, therefore, they insisted on Petitions being presented immediately after the election, they would have a great many abortive inquiries. He thought that the inquiry into charges of general corruption and bribery might be more advantageously conducted on the spot; but the inquiry into the merits of an Election Petition could be best inquired into by a Committee of the House, presided over by one of the Judges of the Superior Courts. He believed the scheme he proposed would not be unacceptable to the learned Judges, and on that account he submitted it to the consideration of the Committee.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he had to move an Amendment to the clause, which was the first of a series of Amendments, of which he had given Notice. The Bill, as it stood, was very incomplete; but, at the same time, he thought it, in the main, very creditable to the Government; and therefore he was glad that this Bill was not to be part of the baggage to be thrown overboard, for the purpose of lightening the ship on its last voyage. Incomplete as it was, the Bill was a bold attempt to grapple with an acknowledged political and moral evil; and the Government had not feared to ask the House to do what it greatly disliked—to make a sacrifice of its own jurisdiction. He now asked the Prime Minister to complete his own work—to help those who were trying to help him, and lend the aid of his ingenious and contriving mind, and the able legal assistance with which he was provided, to make this really an efficacious and complete measure. It was no party measure, and no party were interested in passing it, except the party of honesty. They desired to diminish the number of men in this House, who came in, not for the purpose of maintaining any political opinions whatever, but solely for the purpose, by a lavish expenditure, of acquiring the social position which attended a seat in this House, and which, perhaps, was not otherwise to be attained by them. They were not more attached to one side than to the other, except that they were generally to be found on the gaining side. They were the political counterparts of those who were contemptuously described by Dante as “neither for God nor the enemies of God, but for themselves only.” Unfortunately, it was not possible in this case to follow the poet’s advice, “Speak not of them, but look and pass on!” The Bill proceeded on the theory that the law was to be put in motion by the defeated candidate alone. This was contrary to the very idea of criminal law. When the law intended to confer a pardoning power on an individual, it did not grant a criminal process at all, but only an action for damages. The immediate object of the present Amendment was the following: the Bill, if passed, would repeal the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 102; but Section 4 of that Act contained an important provision—namely, that where a Petition complained of general or extensive bribery, and the Committee reported that there was reasonable and probable ground for the allegations, the Committee should have power to order that the costs of the petitioners should be borne by the public. If the House was in earnest such a provision was indispensable; and he therefore intended to propose Amendments, the effect of which would be to restore it in the present Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 29, after the words “to serve in Parliament,” to insert the words “or of general or extensive prevalence of corrupt practices in an Election.”—(Mr. Mill.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Stuart Mill) that it was desirable that there should be every opportunity of inquiring into extensive corruption prevalent at elections; but he took exception to the proposed mode of effecting that object, and would suggest that it would be more convenient to raise the question by bringing up a distinct new clause. The clause then under consideration related specially to Petitions complaining of undue return of Members; and he thought it would not be well to mix that up with other questions. With regard to the particular Act to which the hon. Member had referred he would find, on inquiry, that it had hitherto been a dead letter. [Mr. BOUVIER: There has been a case under it.] The right hon. Gentleman said there had been a case under it. If so, he was not aware of it; but, considering that corrupt practices must have prevailed very largely, that one case would only prove that practically the Act had been a dead letter. He was as anxious as the hon. Member for Westminster that corruption, in whatever form or shape, should be put down; but he thought that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member, while creating some confusion, would not carry out that intention. As to the plan of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), it would give legal knowledge to the present tribunals and tend to uniformity of decision; but, if it were adopted, two of the great objects to accomplish which this Bill had been brought forward would be altogether lost, for neither an immediate nor a local inquiry would be obtained. He did not think that any legislation would succeed to the extent of entirely preventing corrupt practices—for quid prosunt leges sine moribus?—but he did believe that by legislation they might very much strengthen the hands of those who wished to put down those practices. He was perfectly convinced, however, that as long as the jurisdiction remained in the House of Commons they would not be able to diminish the corruption which now existed. If the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman were accepted, all the Election Petitions would still be brought into one focus and would still get into the hands of central agents. There would still be the facility for pairing off and for all that hocus pocus that notoriously was carried on now. He was convinced that, until they localized the inquiries, they would not succeed in getting rid of those arrangements by which corrupt practices were kept in the background. So much for having the inquiries local. Why was it desirable to have them immediate? Because when there was a considerable lapse of time between the complaint and the investigation there was greater opportunity for having resort to manoeuvres—for getting rid of witnesses and such-like proceedings. Besides, when the blood of partisans on either side of a contest was still hot, they were not so likely to see reasons for giving up their enthusiasm in the cause of purity of election. While persons were smarting under a defeat they were much more likely to expose corrupt practices than when time was allowed for persuasion. Then, local inquiry would much diminish the expense of an election case. At present the witnesses on either side were brought to town and fed in the most sumptuous manner. They were also “shepherded”—he believed that was the term—to prevent them from talking to anyone with whom it was thought advisable they should hold no communication. All this was attended with enormous expense. Again, they had persons who would go into the witnesses’ chair in a Committee-room and perjure themselves, knowing that there was no one there who could convict them of their falsehood; but the same persons would hesitate to commit that crime in a Court-house where they were surrounded by persons in the neighbourhood, half-a-dozen of whom could perhaps get upon the table and contradict them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) spoke of his having been in a small minority when in the Committee he opposed the proposition for entirely removing these election cases from the jurisdiction of the House. He believed that minority had consisted of the right hon. Gentleman himself and his Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Sandwich. The Committee were unanimous on having the Petitions tried by another tribunal; but the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Sandwich thought that the Petitions ought to be presented to that House in the first instance. Now, if the House was not to be the tribunal to try those cases, would it be worth while to retain for it that scintilla of jurisdiction which would be retained by having the Petition presented to the House before it went to the Court of Common Pleas? If the meaning of the proposition was that the House should have the right of saying that a Petition never should be tried at all, then he could understand the proposal; but that meaning was not avowed by the small minority to which he had referred. A great disadvantage arising from the plan would be that Election Petitions could not be presented and tried while the House was not sitting—a circumstance which, in many cases, would involve a delay of many months. Believing that the plan embodied in the Bill was that which would give the public the greatest amount of confidence in the decisions on Election Petitions, and that it would effectually tend to check bribery and corruption, he hoped the Committee would not adopt the Amendment now under discussion.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN observed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had applied himself to the clause generally. He submitted that it would be a more convenient course for the Committee to confine themselves for the present to the Amendment which had been moved by the hon. Member for Westminster.

MR. PAULL pointed out that under the Amendment a Member against whom specific charges were brought would be obliged to defend himself against the general prevalence of corrupt practices during an election at which there might have been, perhaps, half a dozen candidates. He ought not to be placed in a worse position than any criminal by having to defend himself against charges other than those specifically made against himself personally or his agents.

MR. HEADLAM said, much might be urged for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Westminster, who was on the right track, for far more might be done by an indictment against a borough than by a contest for the seat. But at present it would be wise to adopt the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. MONK thought the Amendment was misunderstood—a Petition need not necessarily be against the return of any Member. He thought it important that the House should sanction the principle that where extensive corruption had been practised the conduct of defeated candidates should not be ignored. For instance, a candidate sent down from London to a borough where he had no chance of election, and where he spent large sums of money in corruption, ought not to be allowed to go unpunished; and if Petitions were allowed to be presented in such cases they would be a great check upon general bribery and corruption.

MR. LOCKE objected to the Amendment on the ground that it was unfair to make a candidate liable for general corrupt practices with which he might have had nothing to do. It was a sound principle that a man should only be liable for his own offences.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Amendment, not because it might not be expedient to have inquiries into the general prevalence of corruption, but because the Amendment was foreign to the object of the clause, which was to provide assurance that a Member had been duly returned without corruption on his part. He hoped the hon. Member for Westminster would withdraw the clause, which he thought would rather defeat his object. It seemed to him the result would be to produce interminable inquiries.

MR. AYRTON hoped the hon. Member for Westminster would not withdraw the Amendment. In his opinion, the Attorney General did not understand the object of the Amendment. The view of the hon. Member for Westminster was that, besides the successful candidate and the defeated one, there might be certain electors who were indignant at the corrupt practices that had been carried on in the interest of both candidates, and that it was only right their petition for a local inquiry should be attended to. In the interest of purity of election he should support the Motion.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the point taken by the hon. Member for Westminster had not escaped the attention of the Committee; but the Committee were unanimously of opinion that it was useless to retain the method appointed by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 102, for inquiring into general corrupt practices at elections. Under the present law, there were Petitions in which the seat was claimed, and other Petitions alleging corrupt practices generally, but in which no claim was made for the seat. In regard to Petitions of the latter class, the Members had no interest in opposing them; and, in the opinion of the Committee, the Act just referred to had proved entirely futile. But there was, according to the present law, another mode by which the desired inquiry into general corruption was sought to be attained. If, in the course of inquiry on a Petition, the Committee is of opinion that there is a prima facie case of general corrupt practices in a borough, the Committee reports the circumstance to the House, and upon a joint Address of the two Houses a Commission is sent to the spot to institute an inquiry. That mode of inquiry the Committee desired to retain. If the Amendment was carried, the question of general corruption would have to be investigated by a tribunal which was not the best for such a purpose. It was thought that the present tribunal for inquiring into general corrupt practices should be retained; and consequently it was provided in the present Bill that if a Judge, in the course of an inquiry respecting a claim to a seat, found that there was a prima facie case of general corrupt practices in a borough, he might report the circumstance to the House, precisely as the Committee did now, and thereupon the Houses might present an Address praying that a Commission of Inquiry might issue. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that the Committee would not agree to the Amendment.

MR. AYRTON said, his remarks had reference to the clause which provided that the Judge might, at the same time, make a special report to the Speaker as to any matter arising in the course of the trial, an account of which ought, in his judgment, to be submitted to the House of Commons.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, his object was that an inquiry into general corrupt practices should be instituted with the same promptitude and before the same tribunal as the inquiry concerning a claim to the seats. He did not mean, however, as the Solicitor General seemed to infer, that the sitting Member should be at the expense of eliciting such a general inquiry. That matter was provided for in his subsequent Amendments.

MR. LIDDELL thought a distinction should be made between an inquiry into the right to a seat and an inquiry into general corruption, and that the cost of the general inquiry should be borne by the community.

MR. WALPOLE hoped the hon. Member for Westminster would be induced to withdraw his Amendment, and to introduce the subject in a separate clause. It was quite as important that there should be a well-directed inquiry into general corruption as into the right to a seat; but they should take care that they did not transfer to another body any power which belonged peculiarly to that House. The legal right to the seat would be better determined by the Judges than by a Committee sitting upstairs; but, if they directed an inquiry into general corruption, which was to be followed by legislation, they should reserve to the House the power of instituting and directing the inquiry. If the general were mixed up with the particular proposition, they would certainly delay the termination to be arrived at.

MR. HIBBERT hoped the Government would bring in a clause to effect the object of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 219: Majority 145.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, his Amendment would raise the whole question. It was, that the words "Court of Common Pleas" be struck out, and the words "House of Commons" be inserted in the clause. This was the Amendment which he had moved in the Select Committee, and which now stood in the name of the hon. Member for Berwick (Mr. Mitchell), who was not present.

MR. SCHREIBER moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. BOUVERIE said, the Amendments of which he had given Notice would in effect also raise the whole question, inasmuch as he proposed that the Election Committee, consisting of Members of the House, should be presided over by a Judge. It would be better to discuss it now.

MR. DISRAELI said, the issue was clear, as the House was in Committee and understood the question, he thought they ought to proceed.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, there was this difference between his Amendment and those of his right hon. Friend (the Member for Kilmarnock). His right hon. Friend proposed to deal with the Petition after it was presented; whereas he proposed to raise the question to what tribunal the Petition should be presented. If the House should cease to be that tribunal, it would be the only legislative body in the world exercising no control over the seats of its own Members. Standing, as the House of Commons did, in the position of a self-condemned body, it ought to hand over all its rights and privileges unimpaired to that Parliament which would be elected by the enlarged constituencies. If his Motion were carried, the other Amendment would be unnecessary.

MR. HENLEY said, that this was the most important question of the whole Bill, and therefore they ought to have time to consider it. They had not had an opportunity yet of discussing it. He felt strongly upon the matter, and wished to have it fully discussed.

MR. AYRTON called attention to the alteration in the wording of the Act it was proposed to repeal and that introduced into the Bill relative to the subject-matter of complaint to be contained in Election Petitions. He asked the Attorney General on a future occasion to give the Committee an explanation.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION—THE DESPATCHES.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH asked the noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal, What was the cause of the delay in publishing the despatch of Sir Robert Napier?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: For some cause for which we cannot account we have received no recent despatch from Sir Robert Napier. There have been private letters from him; but he either has not written a despatch, or it has failed to reach our hands. The Government has been most anxious to invite Parliament to express its opinion upon the brilliant services that have been rendered by the army in Abyssinia, and the only reason we have refrained from inviting the House to do so hitherto has been the reason I have just given to my noble Friend. But I think it would be useless—and, indeed, improper—to delay any longer a compliment to the army which is so richly deserved; and it is at present the intention of the Government to move on this day week a Vote of Thanks in both Houses of Parliament. Before I sit down I may mention, for the convenience of noble Lords, that it is my intention on this day week to move the adjournment of the House until the following Monday week.

NEW FOREST—DEER REMOVAL, &c., ACT, 1851.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

VISCOUNT EVERSLEY presented a Petition of Persons having Rights of Common over the New Forest and others: That the Report of the Commissioner in charge of the Royal Forests to the Lords of the Treasury (laid before the House on the 28th of February last) may be referred to a Select Committee, said, that by various recent Acts the rights of the Crown and of the Commoners in respect of the game, timber, pasturage, and other forestal rights in the New Forest had been dealt with; and as regarded the Commoners, the petitioners complained that by these Acts the rights they possessed from time immemorial had been unduly abridged and prejudiced, and they therefore prayed for inquiry into the matter. He therefore moved that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the subject.

Moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Operation of the 14th and 15th Vict. Cap., 76., intituled "An Act to extinguish the right of the Crown to Deer in the New Forest, and to give Compensation in lieu thereof; and for other Purposes relating to the said Forest.—(The Viscount Eversley.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he would recall to their Lordships the circumstances under which the Act of 1851 was brought forward. It had been frequently complained in the House of Commons that the Royal forests were not properly managed; and it was alleged, in especial, that the New Forest, which had been transferred to the public, was so managed—or rather so ill-managed—as to be of no public benefit. The matter was inquired into by a Committee, and also by a Commission, who reported that the existence of deer in the Forest was demoralizing to the community, giving rise to the existence of a number of poachers and deer-stealers, while they were of no advantage to the Crown. In consequence, in the year 1851, he (the Duke of Somerset), being then First Commissioner of Woods and Forests, introduced a Bill (the Deer Removal Act), authorizing the removal of the deer and the inclosure, in lieu, of 14,000 acres for the Crown. The measure was very carefully inquired into by a Select Committee, and by a Committee of their Lordships' House; and in consequence of the statements which were made by gentlemen connected with the Forest, he agreed to reduce the number of acres to be appropriated by the Crown to 10,000. In that form the Bill passed. Complaints were now made that the plantation of the Forest had been injurious to the rights of pasturage, and it was said that the foresters did not know that that would be the result. Well, he could only say that their own knowledge and observation ought to have made them aware what would happen. Again, their complaints were inconsistent; for, while they called on the Government to drain the land, they said that the drains prevented the cattle from passing from one part of the Forest to another. The object of the Act of 1851 was to make the land more valuable, and in this it had been perfectly successful. The Act had been carried out as was proposed, and had operated very beneficially.

EARL NELSON wished to make an appeal for an inquiry, not so much on the part of the landowners, as of the poor foresters, who had been seriously injured by the action of the Act of 1851. There were few real paupers in the New Forest, for in fact the forest labourer generally held five or ten acres of land; he was able to keep his cow and his pony, and with his turn-out he was placed above the position of most of the agricultural labourers of the kingdom. Inquiry was needed, because it was plainly seen that numbers of these agricultural labourers would be utterly ruined unless something was done. By other inclosures additional employment was provided, and until the waste land was broken up there was no real damage done to the peasant's right of turning out his cattle; but, in this instance, the inclosure opened no new fields of employment, and the foresters' turn-out of cattle was practically ruined. It was a mistake to suppose that the deer were an unmitigated evil, for they kept down the growth of holly and gorse during the winter, and improved the pasturage; whereas now whole tracts of country were overrun by the underwood, and in the inclosures lately thrown out the rides where alone pasture was to be found were destroyed by the additional traffic through the Forest caused by making new plantations. The understanding, when the Act passed, was, that the land to be inclosed should be taken from the distant parts of the Forest, and not from the best parts; and it was a great grievance to the small holders he had named to find that large tracts of land were proposed for inclosure close to their dwellings. In time the whole Forest would become one vast wood, and it was absurd that in the 19th century such a barbarism should be permitted for the sake of growing timber for the navy, which would not come to maturity for 200 or 300 years, when, most likely, no timber would be required.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that the question as to whether the Act of 1851 was a proper settlement of the matters connected with the Forest, and whether that Act was one which should be continued in its present form or be modified, was one which it appeared to him might be advantageously discussed in a Select Committee. The interests of the Crown and the public were slightly at variance with those of the Commoners; and the question now was, whether the Act of 1851, should, after seventeen years' experience, be modified in some way, if allowed to remain intact. All the statements made that night seemed to point strongly to the necessity of defining the interests in the Forest. The Act of 1851 effected a great improvement on the former management of the Forest; but the result of its working might, he repeated, be advantageously inquired into, and he therefore had no objection to the appointment of the Committee moved for.

Motion agreed to.

NEWFOUNDLAND — GRANTS OF LAND ON FRENCH COAST.—PETITION.

LORD HOUGHTON rose to present a Petition from the Commons House of Assembly of Newfoundland, praying that the Restrictions with regard to Grants of Land on the so-called French Coast, imposed on them by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies in a Despatch dated 7th December 1866, may be removed — said, that as the Petition proceeded from so important a body as the Colonial Legislature he felt it proper to accompany its presentation with a few remarks. The Petitioners stated that—

“Your Petitioners desire to bring under the consideration of Your Most Honourable House a grievance to which your Petitioners in this island are now subjected. Her Majesty the Queen has the territorial dominion over the Island of Newfoundland and its dependencies, and, as a consequence, Her Majesty's Government of this Colony has the authority to issue grants within the island for mining, agricultural, and other purposes.

“This right was never questioned until the year 1866, when, by a despatch from the Right Honourable the Earl of Carnarvon, Secretary of State for the Colonies, to his Excellency Governor Musgrave, bearing date the 7th day of December 1866, the issue of grants of land in that part of this island called the ‘French Shore’ was prohibited.

“The French Shore, referred to in the said despatch, includes at least one-half of the territory of Newfoundland and the restriction thus placed on the Local Government is in effect a denial of the exercise of those rights which your Petitioners most humbly submit belong to the British Crown, and therefore to their enjoyment by Her Majesty's subjects in this island.

“Believing that the Government of this Colony has a clear right to issue grants for mining or other purposes, the Legislature on the 9th day of April 1867, in reply to the said despatch, passed certain resolutions and addresses declaratory of such rights, and transmitted the same to the Secretary of State for the Colonies through his Excellency Governor Musgrave, to which neither his Excellency nor your Petitioners have received any reply.

“The restriction contained in the said despatch has had the effect of preventing the exercise of British territorial dominion, and of depriving Her Majesty's subjects of the power of taking advantage of the mineral and other resources which exist within the said French Shore.

“The importance of this subject to the people of this island is such that your Petitioners feel aggrieved that no reply has been received to the remonstrance of the Legislature, and that, so far as your Petitioners are informed, no action has been taken by the Imperial Government to assert the undoubted right of the British Crown, and to place within the reach of Her Majesty's subjects in this island the mineral and agricultural resources which exist within the said territory.

“For some years past the Legislature of this island, though embarrassed by financial difficulties arising from the distress prevalent amongst the labouring population, have voted large sums of money for the purpose of obtaining a mineralogical survey of the island which will, to a great extent, be valueless if that portion of the island be withheld from the use of Her Majesty's subjects.

“Your Petitioners therefore humbly pray that your Most Honourable House will be pleased to make inquiry into the matter, and to cause the restriction contained in the Right Honourable the Earl of Carnarvon's despatch to be removed, so as to place the Local Government in a position to exercise those functions necessary to ensure to your Petitioners their territorial rights.”

Now for many years our principle of legislation with regard to our colonies had been to allow them, as far as possible, to exercise independent rights; but that principle appeared to have been departed from in regard to that part of the colony which was commonly called the “French Shore,” which comprised a large portion of land which was supposed to be rich in minerals. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) who, then being Colonial Secretary, imposed these restrictions, must have had very strong reasons for his interference; and they must refer, it was to be presumed, to the particular condition of that portion of the colony. Now, Her Majesty by the Treaty of Utrecht had territorial rights over the whole colony, and that treaty was subsequently confirmed by the Treaty of Paris in 1814; but the French possessed with respect to fisheries certain rights, and had put forward certain claims which had long been a source of dispute with the colonists, and which had been matter of frequent discussion between the Foreign Office of this country and the French Government. But, admitting all the French claims to be well founded, there would be still no ground for the restrictive interference of which the Petitioners complained. He would refer to some words of Lord Palmerston to Count Sebastiani, dated July 10, 1858. The noble Lord said—

“I will observe to your Excellency in conclusion that if the right conceded to the French by the declaration of 1783 had been intended to be exclusive within the prescribed district, the terms used for defining such right must assuredly have been more ample and specific than they are to be found in that document. For in no other similar instrument which has ever come under the knowledge of the British Government is so important a concession as an exclusive privilege of this description announced in terms so loose and indefinite. . . . The claim put forward on the part of France is founded simply on inference and upon an assumed interpretation of words.”

At the time of the Treaty of Utrecht, Newfoundland was merely a fishing station. It was so entirely a fishing station that the Admiral under whose command it was had the name of the Fishing Admiral. But the position of Newfoundland had entirely changed; it had become a very valuable colony, and commanded such a position that it was a matter of the greatest interest to us to consult the wishes of the population as far as possible in the view of securing their loyalty and attachment to the British Crown. This question had grown out of the increasing value of the coast. Besides its value as a fishing station there had been discovered large copper mines, mountains of statuary marble and mineral wealth, and also, more lately, the existence of petroleum in large quantities; all of which, if these restrictions on the grants of land were continued, would be excluded from the profitable enjoyment of the colony. There was a separate article of the Treaty which affected the question of the land; but it merely stated that no British buildings or enclosures should be erected or maintained on the shore reserved for French exclusive use, except for the purpose of military defence or of the public administration. Although the French had at different times desired to assert some right of possession of this land, it had never been admitted by the English Government or by the local Legislature of Newfoundland. Throughout the whole of these transactions great care had been taken to avoid all recognition of that claim. Governor Darling, who was supposed by the colonists to have very much compromised their rights, said—

“The residence of British subjects has been always deliberately encouraged by the French, since in them they find the necessary guardians for their establishments when they themselves retire to France at the close of the fishing season.”

The colonization of the French coast had begun long since; several populous settlements had been made on that coast, and no attempt was ever made to move them. At the present moment a very large population, in some thirty or forty considerable stations of English subjects, on the coast were living in a condition of society such as existed nowhere else on the face of the globe. They were squatters living without jurisdiction, without law, without any punishment of crime or enforcement of rights, acknowledging, as it were, no Sovereign. He could not but believe that this condition of things had been rendered much worse by the despatch of the noble Earl, which prevented the grants of land on the French coast. Such grants would, by employing these persons in useful industry, have tended much to promote their civilization; and the question now was whether the prohibition of those grants should not be rescinded; its immediate effect being to prevent the most valuable copper mines in parts of the coast, very close to what was called the French Shore, from being extended in that direction. It also prevented the working of all the marble quarries, which were said to be very considerable and likely to be very productive; and would prevent the use of the discovery of petroleum to which he had already alluded. And what was the condition of the colony which was trying to recover itself? It was in such a condition of poverty that one-half of its revenues were appropriated for the maintenance of the poor. The British fisheries could not compete with the French, which were supported by large bounties, the object of the French Government being not only to extend the fisheries, but to train up a large body of marine. The colonists, therefore, laboured under every possible disadvantage; and there was great temptation to disloyalty and entire separation. Already the voice had been heard, that if they became part of the United States they would receive very different treatment. The present state of things stood entirely in the way of the colony of Newfoundland joining the great Northern Confederation; they did not see their way clearly to any advantage they would derive from it. He therefore hoped their Lordships would give their serious attention to this subject, and, having received all the information that might be addressed to them on the other side of the question, that they would do all they could to direct Her Majesty's Government to remedy what appeared to him a great wrong.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had no fault to find with the noble Lord (Lord Houghton) in presenting this petition, complaining of what he had felt it his duty to do when filling the office of Secretary of State. It might, however, be more convenient to the noble Duke the present Secretary for the Colonies (the Duke of Buckingham) and to the House generally, if he interposed for a few moments with some remarks on the subject. The noble Lord had told them that the petition was founded on a despatch which he (the Earl of Carnarvon) wrote during the autumn of 1866. The case which presented itself for decision was this—a certain gentleman in Newfoundland desired to prosecute some mineral researches upon that part of the coast which was known by the name of "the French Shore;" and he (the Earl of Carnarvon) felt it his duty to hold that for the present it would not be right for Her Majesty's Government to sanction such a proceeding. That might appear an arbitrary course, and perhaps an impolitic one to the noble Lord; but, at the same time, there were grave reasons that led him to adopt it. There was no question of older standing, none more complex, none, perhaps, less understood in this country, and none more capable of mischief than that of the Newfoundland fisheries. The subject was very little understood, and the extent and validity of the French claims had been canvassed by sanguine Ministers in every form. Newfoundland was originally claimed for this country in the time of Henry VII.; it was subsequently occupied by the French; then after a long series of negotiations and disputes it passed to this country by the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713, the French securing to themselves—or, rather, we securing to the French—certain rights of fishery and certain rights on parts of the coast in reference to fishery rights. The Treaty of Utrecht on this point was renewed at a subsequent period by the Treaty of Versailles. That was the basis on which all the claims on both sides now rested. It was important, also, to remember that the object of the fisheries to the French and the object of Newfoundland as a possession to us was not the mere foundation of a colony, but the training up of seamen and the creation of a nursery for the navies of both nations. The notion of colonization or settlement was entirely foreign to their ideas. An enormous variety of points had from time to time been raised upon these treaties, and the mass of correspondence upon them was such, that if he were to attempt to place them before the House he should certainly weary their Lordships and perhaps only succeed in confusing them; but substantially the questions of real importance which had thus arisen were, he thought, these two—First of all there was a claim on the part of the French to certain rights at sea; and, in the second place, there was a claim on the part of the French to certain rights on land. It had been argued on the part of the French that their right was absolute and exclusive, and on the side of the colonists it was argued that it was a concurrent and not an exclusive right. The French claimed not only the right to fish in those waters themselves, but to turn off others who might wish to fish there. The colonists contended, on the other hand, that they had a concurrent right to fish in those waters. On the other hand the French claim to the shore was, as the noble Lord had said, what really amounted to a claim to the occupation of that shore. There had been questions as to how far inland that French right of occupation should extend—whether a few yards or a considerable way into the interior; and there had been the claim, and one that was admitted on both sides, of the French to remove establishments from that shore, inasmuch as they might interfere with their fishing rights. Then there arose the question what the nature of those establishments was—whether they were purely fishing establishments or included shops, warehouses, and other permanent buildings. The noble Lord had argued the case from a purely colonial point of view. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) did not, of course, object to the colonial point of view being urged before their Lordships; but he must remind the House that in as far as it was only a colonial view, derived from colonial information, it was necessarily a one-sided view, and did not represent either the course which the negotiations between this country and France had taken, or indeed the opinion entertained at various times by successive English Secretaries of State, whether connected with the Colonial Department or with the Foreign Office. The noble Lord had quoted the opinion of Lord Palmerston as being very strongly against the exclusive right claimed by the French. On points of that sort the authority of Lord Palmerston was always entitled to great weight; but, on the other hand, other Secretaries of State, whose authority was perhaps as great, had held a somewhat different opinion; and, moreover, if one set of Law Officers had counselled one view on that subject, another set of Law Officers had counselled a view that was far from identical. When, therefore, the noble Lord said the whole stream of authority ran in one direction, he could not quite assent to that assertion; because as they went further back into the history of those treaties and negotiations, he thought they would find that, in those earlier days, there was a greater inclination to admit an exclusive or very stringent right on the part of the French than in subsequent times. Acts had been passed and instructions issued to Governors in that sense; and to such a degree had that view been taken, that an Act was passed in the colony many years ago which absolutely excluded the electoral franchise from extending over any portion of the French Shore. He would not express any opinion as to how far the French claim was or was not just; but the view urged by the noble Lord was by no means so clear and unmistakable as he supposed; for there had been a large difference of opinion on both sides in the matter, and it would be very unwise for any English negotiator to overlook that fact. Formerly constant collisions occurred between the English and French fishermen on the fishery grounds, sometimes leading to very serious results, and ships of war had been ordered up to take part in the difference. Subsequently those collisions had, perhaps, given way to bickerings and quarrels between the two parties. But the Governments of the two countries had uniformly felt—and, he thought, wisely felt—that it was desirable, if possible, to come to such a settlement of this long-vexed question as would at once secure the treaty rights of both parties and give a just development to colonial resources. In 1857, in consequence of the action of the Colonial Parliament, a Convention entered into for that object broke down. In 1859 the difficulties were felt to be as great and as dangerous as ever, and a Commission was issued by the Government to inquire on the spot. Upon the recommendations of that Commission a further attempt was made in 1861, and again the two Governments agreed on the terms of a Convention. But again the Colonial Legislature interposed, and would not consent to conditions which they stated were prejudicial to their own interests; and the hope of an adjustment once more failed. The difficulties were renewed; and in 1866, when he (the Earl of Carnarvon) accepted the seals of the Colonial Office, he found there was some reason to anticipate that negotiations might be resumed with advantage. But he also felt very strongly that it was absolutely necessary, if they were to be resumed, that there should be a clear understanding on their part and on that of the colony, that they should not be subjected a third time to disappointment and failure from the same causes. Believing that the circumstances were favourable at that moment to the resumption of the negotiations, he knew well that, if the issue of grants of land

were to be made in the manner which had been contended for, the existing most injurious state of things must be indefinitely protracted. Therefore, while appreciating the unsatisfactory position of affairs on the French Shore, and being anxious to remedy it, still he had felt that the permanent interests of the colony, not less than the interests of this country and of France, rendered it desirable that one more effort should be made to secure the settlement of that question, which, as long as it remained open, endangered the friendly relations of the two countries. He desired to speak of the colony with great respect; but he must ask whether they had placed this country in a fair position? There were already in existence in British North America questions of a very difficult, complicated, and even irritating nature—questions of boundaries, such as those of San Juan and Vancouver's Island, questions again arising out of the events of the late war; and it certainly was not desirable to have in Newfoundland a fresh magazine of combustibles to be added on the first opportunity to those already existing in Canada, in New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, to imperil our relations with the United States. Let no one suppose that these disputes were the less dangerous because they had lasted for so long a time. As long as our relations with a foreign State were perfectly smooth and friendly, these matters were free from danger; but once let a feeling of irritation arise, and they would assume proportions that they did not possess at any other time. It should be recollected that Newfoundland was the cause of very considerable naval and military expense to this country, and it was therefore not too much to ask that the colony should meet us half way in a matter of this kind. What, after all, were the real facts of the case? Partly by conquest, and partly by treaty, we acquired this territory of Newfoundland many years ago; and, in return, certain rights were secured to the French. Time went on—a colony sprang up—a circumstance which, at the time the treaties were entered into, was not anticipated. English fishermen gradually abandoned the shores, and left them to the colonists; and now British interests having virtually ceased, we were called upon in the interests of the colonists to ask France to yield rights which it was doubtful whether we had not formerly conceded to her. That was not a position in which this country ought to be placed. But our duty was very simple. It was to secure to France all those treaty rights and engagements to which she had a clear claim—the honour and faith of the Crown were pledged to this, and no servant of the Crown would have a right to recommend the Crown to evade its obligations. On the other hand, it was our duty quite as strongly to accept the present state of things, to admit the growth of population and the change of circumstances upon that shore, and as far as we could, within treaty rights, to secure the just and proper development of colonial resources. Hitherto, the attempts made to bring about a settlement of the question had been rather in the way of dealing with special difficulties as they arose out of the early treaties than by placing the fisheries upon a new basis. But as he had held the office of Colonial Secretary, and now that he was out of Office being able to speak with greater freedom than the noble Duke, the present Colonial Secretary, he ventured to make a suggestion as his humble contribution towards the settlement of what might turn out a serious question. One thing was quite clear, that the French and the colonists had power to do each other considerable mischief, by insisting upon particular restrictions. The French might obstruct the formation of colonial settlements on the French shore, and the colonists might prevent the reasonable exercise of the French rights by refusing to sell them bait, and by similar restrictions. Why should not both parties agree to place matters on the far simpler and truer principle of a pure commercial reciprocity? If, on the one hand, the French would consent to abandon their exclusive claim to particular fisheries and modify their power of ordering the removal of buildings on particular parts of the coast; and if, on the other hand, the colonists would consent to throw open the whole of their fisheries to the French, gaining in return the right of fishing in French waters, these concessions would be largely for the benefit of both parties; but in the main the advantage, he was persuaded, would be chiefly on the side of the colonists, who had always urged that the French had possession of the best fisheries. It would be said, no doubt, that the fisheries were not sufficiently large to accommodate both parties, and that the stock would be soon exhausted. But the Report on our home fisheries, made a few years ago, showed that the resources of nature were so prolific that the supply of fish was absolutely inexhaustible. Experience likewise, since American fishermen had been admitted under the Reciprocity Treaty to fish in Nova Scotian waters, showed that these waters could perfectly well bear a double number of fishermen. But such an arrangement as he suggested might be made for a few years, and then when practical experience had been gained of its working, it could be seen whether it was desirable to renew it. In conclusion, he would urge strongly upon the Government the duty of not losing sight of this very important question; and he would also urge upon the colonists that they should not stand on their extreme rights, but having stated their opinions fully and frankly to Her Majesty's Government, taking a reasonable and not a one-sided view, should allow the Government to negotiate with the Government of France with the view of obtaining, if possible, a satisfactory settlement. He would not, however, advise the Government to attempt a third negotiation in the same manner as those commenced on two former occasions, when, after most of the Articles had been agreed upon to the satisfaction of the two great countries, the Colonial Legislature came in between the two Governments, overthrew the agreement, and set everything once more adrift.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that after the statement of his predecessor in Office as to the circumstances under which he had written the despatch in question, it was unnecessary for him to enter into that part of the question; but, at the same time, it was right he should assure the House that the importance of attempting to effect a settlement of the questions arising upon the shores of Newfoundland had not been overlooked by Her Majesty's Government. The state of things existing there was suited to former, but not to present times, having grown up under entirely different circumstances. He agreed, however, with the concluding remark of the able statement of his noble Predecessor in Office, that it was not expedient that the negotiations should be again taken up in the form in which they had twice previously failed. And it was because of that feeling, and because they were desirous of considering how far they could defer to the representations of the colonists, that Her Majesty's Government had not been able to make an earlier reply to the despatch of the colonial Government. The state of things which had grown up could only be approached with any hope of success in a spirit of compromise. It did not appear to him when he assumed the seals of Office that a settlement would be facilitated, or the views of the colony advanced, by withdrawing those restrictions which his noble Friend had thought fit to impose with regard to grants of land within the disputed territory. The question was altogether one of difficulty, and could be met in no other way than in the spirit of compromise on the part of the colonists, the French Government, and Her Majesty's Ministers. He did not think it would be prudent to take up the negotiations at the point where they had been dropped, or to hamper them by contests as to the rights of the several parties in times past. He rather favoured the plan of accepting the position of each, and negotiating in a spirit of compromise on that basis.

LORD HOUGHTON asked whether the noble Duke would object to lay before the House the Papers on the subject?

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, he had intended to lay the Papers on the table later in the Session; but if the noble Lord would repeat his question on Monday, he would gladly state how far he could meet his wishes.

Petition ordered to lie on the Table.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS BILL.

(The Duke of Richmond.)

(NO. 101.) THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^d (according to Order).

LORD REDESDALE moved to re-insert in Clause 22 the following words, struck out on bringing up the Report:—"Nor shall any intimation be sent as to any person to whom the proxy may be given or addressed."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the object of the noble Lord seemed to be simply to place the government of Railway Companies in the hands of those who attended the meetings, and to disfranchise those who were unable to attend. But it was obvious that the largest shareholders, who had most right and most reason to exercise control over the management of a railway, were those who, in consequence of the multitude of their engagements, had no time to be present at the meetings—especially if they lived in the country. It should rather be the policy of their Lordships to place the management of railways in the hands of the richer shareholders, and take it away from the less responsible, who attended the meetings as often from motives of amusement as business. The legislation of Parliament in regard to railways seemed to be minute in the extreme. If the Bill became law, a Railway Company desiring additional powers from Parliament would have to apply for them supported by the decision of a Wharnccliffe meeting, and here again the Motion of the noble Lord would tend to throw the control of these applications into the hands of the less responsible shareholders. He would prefer to leave out the clause altogether; it embodied a most vicious principle. He believed his noble Friend very much in error in pursuing a system of tying up companies by minute and vexatious restrictions. The results of such a course had been most distressing, and he was tempted to say of the noble Lord, "Si monumentum quaeris, circumspice." If anyone wanted to estimate the merits of a paternal system of government, which the noble Lord seemed so highly to approve, let him look at the condition of Railway Companies.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY hoped that his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees would not insist upon the Amendment; because it was important, as the noble Marquess had remarked, that every inducement should be held out to large shareholders and capitalists to select a good Board of Directors and to give such a Board a full and generous support.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD made a few remarks, which were inaudible.

LORD REDESDALE said, it was not advisable to put extraordinary powers into the hands of Railway Directors. The richer shareholders generally knew where to forward their proxies, and it was only the poorer shareholders who required that this should be indicated to them. The consequence was that the extraordinary powers possessed by some of these Boards were the result, to a great extent, of the proxies sent by the smaller shareholders who forwarded them on the indication furnished in the proxies and without due inquiry. No doubt, when a Railway Company had a good Board of Directors, the shareholders were quite right in giving them their support; but there could be little doubt that all the injury done to the affairs of Railway Companies had resulted from the action of the respective Boards of Direction. What was wanted was that the Directors should act under a stronger feeling of personal responsibility. He thought that for this end they required to be reduced in number. The effect of the Amendment would simply be to prevent persons from intrusting their proxies to Directors without knowing who those Directors were.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he consented to the omission of these words the other evening at the suggestion of the noble Marquess, who proposed the omission without giving Notice. It was only subsequently that the full effect of their omission was pointed out to him, and, believing the alteration to be unwise, he should now be prepared to support the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to ; Words inserted.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

COTTON STATISTICS BILL.—(No. 102.)

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that there could be no possible doubt that the object of the Bill, which was to obtain periodical information respecting the quantity of cotton imported into the United Kingdom, the quantity re-exported, and the quantity held in stock, would be of great public utility. An indirect object, which it was hoped would result from the Bill, was to put an end to the present gambling in cotton. The only parties who could possibly be aggrieved by the Bill were the "Warehousers," and the "Forwarders"—that was to say, every person or corporation who carried or forwarded cotton for toll or other consideration—who were required to make monthly returns to the Board of Trade of the quantities of cotton received or forwarded by them. The principal carriers were, of course, the Railway Companies, and the Directors of the lines principally concerned had given their assent to the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF POWIS called the attention of the noble Marquess to the fact that the definitions employed in the Bill were too large, and would render liable to heavy penalties many persons whom the noble Marquess could not have intended to include.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he had no desire to oppose the Bill; but, concurring in the remarks of the noble Earl who had just sat down, hoped that the noble Marquess would see the propriety of amending the wording of the Bill between this and going into Committee.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX opposed the Bill on the ground of the indefiniteness with which some of its provisions were worded.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY hoped their Lordships would not reject the Bill. Whatever alterations might be necessary in detail—and he admitted that the Bill was susceptible of amendment—they might be made in Committee.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")

On Question, That ("now") stand Part of the Motion? their Lordships divided :—Contents 13; Not-Contents 6 : Majority 7.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

NOTICE.

MR. REARDEN: Sir, I beg to give Notice that on Monday next I shall ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it be true that Her Majesty the Queen has been compelled, through delicate health, to retire from England during the remainder of this Session; and, if so, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, out of consideration to Her Majesty's health, comfort, and tranquillity, and in the interest of the Royal Family and of Her Majesty's subjects throughout the Empire, and especially of this metropolis [Loud cries of "Order, Order!"], to advise Her Majesty to abdicate? ["Order, order!" "Chair, chair!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The House has anticipated my decision by the expression—the indignant expression of feeling with regard to the terms employed in the Notice of the hon. Member. No doubt Questions may be addressed by a Member of this House to the confidential Advisers of the Crown as to any matter relating to the discharge of public duties by the Sovereign; but these questions must be addressed in respectful and Parliamentary terms. The Question of the hon. Member is not couched in such terms, and cannot be put.

MR. REARDEN: I beg very earnestly to apologize to the House for putting a Question in any form of words which is either un-Parliamentary or not in strict accordance with the views of this House.

["Order!"] Nothing can be further from my views, mind, or heart, than to do anything inconsistent with strict loyalty to Her Majesty. ["Order!" "Chair!"]

ARMY—MILITARY UNIFORM.

QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he wished to give one word of explanation to make his Question intelligible. It appeared that retired Captains in the Army were not allowed to wear their uniform at Court, but if they had medals they must either wear them over their Court-dress or leave them at home. He would, therefore, beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether there would be any objection to put those Officers who had retired from the Army as Captains on the same footing as regards uniform as those who had retired as Field Officers?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied, that the rule on the subject was not quite so extensive as the hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose. With regard to retired Captains, he might remark that their number was very large, and their names did not appear in the Army List. It would be very inconvenient, therefore, that there should be any general extension of their privileges; but he would take into consideration how far it might be desirable to recommend to Her Majesty that under certain conditions, as regards length of service and possession of honours, the rule might be relaxed.

IRELAND—RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. MONSELL said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Report of the Commissioners upon Irish Railways has been considered by Her Majesty's Government, and whether they propose to submit to those Commissioners for Report the proposals on the Irish Railway system drawn up last year by a Committee of Irish Peers and Members of Parliament; and, if not, what steps it is proposed by the Government to take with regard to the Irish Railways?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the whole subject of Irish Railways has been investigated by the Commission, the Report of which has now been for some time under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. We do not propose to submit to the Commissioners for Report the proposals on the Irish Railway system drawn up last year by a Committee of Irish Peers and Members of Parliament; but we intend to avail ourselves of the very great experience of those Gentlemen in order to assist us in maturing some plan which we hope to be able to submit to Parliament. I cannot say, however, that I have any hopes of submitting that plan during the present Session.

CUSTOMS' EXTRA CLERKS.

QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to amalgamate the Customs' Extra Clerks with the establishment, or place them in receipt of such a scale of pay as will place them on a footing with the establishment and enable them to provide for their families?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in replying, said, he must take the liberty to remark that this was, he believed, the fourth occasion during the last two months on which the hon. Member had placed this Question on the Notice Paper. Now, considering the terms with which the Question concluded, he thought it scarcely fair to repeat the Question so often without explanation. It was not the intention of the Government to amalgamate the Customs extra clerks with the establishment clerks. It was impossible to do so, consistently with the rules of the service. Moreover the scale of pay of the extra clerks had been considered by the Treasury two years ago, and he was not prepared to say that if it were again considered there would be any change in the decision arrived at in 1866.

CONDITION OF THE MAURITIUS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. A. SMITH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government can give information as to the present condition of the Mauritius—firstly, in reference to fever; secondly, in reference to the effects of the recent hurricane?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that the latest accounts from the island were dated the 16th of April, and were received on the 16th of May. Those accounts were, on the whole, favourable. The fever was on the decrease. As to the hurricane, it was the most destructive that had been known during the present generation. Great injury had been done to the crops; but it was hoped that, in consequence of the propitious state of the weather since that time, there would be less scarcity than was at first anticipated.

INDIA—CHOLERA AT FORT WILLIAM.

QUESTION.

MR. NEATE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the second battalion of the 60th Regiment, containing from two hundred to two hundred and fifty raw recruits, has not been recently landed in India, and is now now detained at Fort William; whether the cholera has not broken out at that station; whether, in consequence of the insufficiency of the medical staff, a special medical man, not belonging to the Regiment, has not been appointed "to take charge of it;" whether many deaths from cholera have not taken place in the Regiment; whether the station is not considered an unhealthy one, and whether fresh recruits are not more liable than others to its unhealthy influence; and what reason there is for detaining at that station the battalion of the 60th Regiment?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that the Regiment referred to by the hon. Member arrived at Fort William on the 31st of October last, just at the beginning of the cold and healthy season. No information had been received as to cholera, or which related in any way to the health of the Regiment. He was unable to explain why the troops were sent to Fort William, as that was a matter which rested with the local authorities.

IRELAND—THE ROMAN CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the intentions of the late Government did not appear to him to be sufficiently explained with regard to the Roman Catholic University in the Memorandum of the Chief Secretary for Ireland which had lately been laid on the table. In order to bring out their views more clearly, he would beg to put the Question of which he had given Notice. With reference to the statement contained in the Memorandum laid before the House in the Correspondence relative to the proposed charter for a Roman Catholic University, that the charter, the draft of which was under the consideration of the late Government, was a charter for the Roman Catholic University, to ask, Whether the attention of the Chief Secretary, when preparing that Memorandum, was drawn to the express statements contained in the Letters of the 10th January and 14th February, 1866, from the then Secretary of State, that the charter asked for was understood to be for a College only and not for a University; and that Her Majesty's late Government proposed to remedy the grievance complained of, not by advising the grant of a charter to a Roman Catholic University, but by the other means therein described?

THE EARL OF MAYO: I am glad, Sir, the right hon. Baronet has called the attention of the House to this subject, as there has been some misapprehension in regard to it. As I understand it, the proposal made by the late Government was that, either by the creation of a new University or by the alteration of the Queen's University, an institution should be created which should have the power of affiliating Colleges other than the Queen's Colleges to itself; and it was proposed to the Government to grant a charter to the Roman Catholic University College in Dublin, the draft of which charter was submitted by the Government to the Roman Catholic prelates. Now, that, I admit, is not clearly set forth in the Memorandum, as the word "College" was inadvertently omitted after the word "University." I am quite ready to admit that the words in my Memorandum have reference to the proposal of the late Government to grant a charter to the Roman Catholic University College in Dublin.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there was no mistake as to the first part of the statement; but the noble Lord had not quite correctly stated the intentions of the late Government, which were expressed verbally and in correspondence.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to ask what were the intentions of the present Government?

THE EARL OF MAYO: The hon. Member had better, I think, give notice of his Question.

SIR ROBERT NAPIER AND EX-GOVERNOR EYRE.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL: I wish, Sir, to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government. Assuming that the Abyssinian Expedition was organized for the sole purpose of releasing certain of Her Majesty's subjects who had been taken prisoners and kept in confinement by the Emperor of Abyssinia, and that purpose having been accomplished by the liberation of the captives, it is obvious that the bombardment of Magdala resulted in the post facto death of the Emperor and several of his subjects. The question I wish to ask is this, Whether in the event of certain Members of this House conspiring with certain other persons out of the House to persecute Sir Robert Napier for in the manner described having caused the death of the Emperor Theodore, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to defend that gallant Officer, or to leave his defence to the voluntary action of a just and generous Nation?

THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION.

QUESTIONS.

MR. STANSFELD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, When the despatches received from Sir Robert Napier will be published?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the despatches received from Sir Robert Napier were extremely short, nothing more in fact than the telegraphic despatches which had been published communicating the facts of the release of the captives, the storming of Magdala, and the death of the King. A subsequent despatch announced that the troops were on their way home. There was some reason to suppose that despatches had been written and sent, but which, however, had not yet reached the Government. It was, however, hoped that they would be received before the Motion of which his right hon. Friend the First Minister had given Notice. But the information which the Government already possessed was sufficient to justify that Motion. The circumstances of the campaign were peculiar in this respect, that they had received information by telegraph which of course anticipated the written despatches.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask, If any later information had been received from the troops than the 18th of April?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the last telegram received by the Government was dated the 18th April, and the troops were then encamped on the plateau of Dalanta.

MR. LAYARD said, that no information with regard to the Expedition had been laid before the House. He wished to know, Whether the Despatches already received would not be presented to Parliament before Friday next?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE replied that a collection of the despatches of Sir Robert Napier from the time the troops landed in Abyssinia until now were in course of preparation, and would be laid upon the table, bringing the information down to the latest date, and will be in the hands of hon. Members before the Vote of Thanks is proposed.

THE PROSECUTION OF EX-GOVERNOR EYRE.—QUESTIONS.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, after the Question that had been put by his hon. Friend the Member for Fermanagh (Captain Archdall), the hon Member for Westminster would not be surprised if he should ask him a Question, Whether it would not be more in accordance with decorum that the Jamaica Committee, who have hounded down the man who preserved to the British Crown one of our finest colonies, should leave their victim in the hands of their counsel and abstain from appearing on the Bench during a judicial investigation in which they are the prosecutors?

MR. SPEAKER said, the rule with regard to Questions was, that Questions are permitted to be put to Ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs, and to other Members relating to any Bill or Motion connected with the Business of the House, in which such Members may be concerned.

MAJOR JERVIS said, he wished to put a Question on this subject to the First Minister of the Crown. It was his (Major Jervis's) duty about eighteen months ago to ask the right hon. Gentleman who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether, in the case of a prosecution of Governor Eyre, the Government meant to afford him that legal assistance which he had a right to expect? He was then informed that the Government meant to do what was right, and that they would render him all the assistance in their power. He now wished to ask, Whether, under all the circumstances, it was still the intention of the Government to afford ex-Governor Eyre, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, that legal assistance to which a man in his position was entitled at their hands; or whether it was to be understood for the future that a man who undertook the defence of a Colony rendered himself liable to be put in the felon's dock without receiving the slightest assistance from those who should stand by him?

COLONEL STUART KNOX: I will again ask the hon. Member for Westminster the Question I have addressed to him on Monday next, and I hope he will be prepared to give me an answer.

MAJOR JERVIS: As I have not received an answer, I will put my Question on the Paper, and ask it again.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH ABYSSINIA.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the first account of the fall of Magdala was contained in a Despatch received directly from any British authority in Egypt? He asked the Question, because it had been stated—and not contradicted—that the news of the fall of Magdala was known to the Emperor of the French twenty-four hours before it was known to Her Majesty's Government.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE replied that he was unable to state when the news was known in Paris; but it reached him in the ordinary way by a direct telegram from Sir Robert Napier, sent via Egypt. That telegram was received in London on the night of Saturday, the 25th ultimo, and was forwarded to him at Osborne, where he was in attendance upon Her Majesty; and it was owing to that fact that earlier publicity was not given to the despatch.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE—"THE ABERDEEN ACT."—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LAYARD said, he would withdraw his Notice, "To call attention to the Act of the 8th and 9th Victoria, chapter 122, commonly known as the 'Aberdeen Act,' and to move, 'That in the opinion of this House the time is now come for the repeal of that Act.'" He understood that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office was willing to accept it, and desired to bring in a Bill to effect the object he had in view.

LORD STANLEY said, he entirely concurred in the view taken by the hon. Member. Whatever might have been the merits of the "Aberdeen Act," it had ceased to be necessary. The Brazilian Government had kept good faith for many years past, and the slave trade with Brazil had entirely ceased; and therefore the continuance of the Act could only be a source of irritation. He had personally made no secret of his opinion; but he could not pledge himself, in the present state of Business, to bring in a Bill to repeal the Act during the present Session.

NAVY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BAILLIE-COCHRANE said, he would defer to the wishes of the House and postpone the Notice he had given to call the attention of the House to the circumstance that the daughters of Seamen killed or disabled in the service of the Country do not enjoy the privilege of maintenance and education at Greenwich Hospital. At the same time, he would call the attention of the Government to the position of private Members, who were continually compelled to postpone important Motions on matters which ought to be discussed. Of course, private Members ought to give way when questions of general interest were brought forward by the Government; but now they had to give way for private Members and measures they did not approve. He was happy to defer to the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) and the important question raised by him; but the House ought to consider the position of private Members. He would postpone his Motion to Friday, the 5th of June.

PARLIAMENT—FORMS OF THE HOUSE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH, who had given Notice to call attention to Rule 164 of "The Rules, Orders, and Forms of Proceedings of the House of Commons," and to its frequent infraction or evasion; and to move that it be rescinded, said, he was always ready to defer to the wish of the House on all proper occasions, and if the House were equally forbearing they might get on better together. He would consent to postpone his Motion, presuming that the Government would postpone Supply.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

Lord Stanley

BILL.—[BILL 117.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Sir George Grey, Mr. Lawson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GLADSTONE, in rising to move that this Bill be now read a second time, said: Sir, I cannot do otherwise than recognize the great courtesy of hon. Members universally in refraining from occupying the time of the House with preliminary discussions, and also the justice of the remark made by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) with reference to the anomalous position in which I stand as the mover of a Bill upon a great question of national policy, which, under all ordinary circumstances, if entertained by the House at all, would be in the hands of the Government of the day. I do not propose to enter upon any explanation of that anomaly, because it would lead to a discussion of deeper matters extraneous to the debate that is now about to take place, and which, whether they require to be discussed or not, I am very anxious to keep apart from all debate on the merits of this Bill. I think I shall not have occasion to detain the House at any great length; but so much interest is felt on this subject, and it is so difficult to possess the public mind clearly, even with propositions which one has endeavoured to state in the most explicit form—and of that difficulty I receive such constant testimony—that I should wish to remind the House, and those who may become acquainted with its discussions, of the exact position in which I, at least, and I think others on this side of the House, conceive the question to stand. It appears that at the commencement of the present Session Her Majesty's Government were of one mind with those who sit on this side of the House in the opinion that it was not possible—or, at least, that it was not politic or desirable—to maintain the existing religious and ecclesiastical arrangements in Ireland. Accordingly, when Her Majesty's Government proceeded, through the mouth of the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) to state to Parliament their policy for Ireland, they intimated that they were disposed to favour extensive plans of change. An earnest of these plans was given in the shape of a proposal with respect to a Roman Catholic University, and their general character was indicated in two parts of the speech of the noble Earl—one in which he stated that the Grant now made to the Presbyterians, under the name of Regium Donum, was miserable in its amount and inadequate for its purposes, and would require to be considerably or largely increased in order to make it worthy of its aim; and the other in which, going beyond the case of the Presbyterians, he recognized fully, and, of course, in the main—though not exclusively—with reference to the Roman Catholics, the doctrine of religious equality for Ireland, and said there would be no objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to establish that religious equality, provided it were done by giving, and not by taking away. Of course, any construction put upon the words of the noble Earl is put by me, and I have no right to make him responsible for my assumption of what those words import; but I apprehend there can be no serious division upon the meaning of those very grave and important words to which I have referred; the meaning was that the Government recommended us to proceed to the removal of anomalies in Ireland, but to proceed by the method of concurrent endowment — of establishing, by means of public funds, other endowed Churches in addition to that which now exists; and the position of Her Majesty's Government may fairly be considered as thus defined. Sir, to that method of proceeding it appeared to us that there were insurmountable objections. We are entirely at one with Her Majesty's Government—though I do not know how far we are at one with the bulk of those who sit behind them—in adopting the principle of religious equality for Ireland. But we think that the attempt to found a variety of endowed Churches in Ireland at the public charge, or even if it had taken a different form, to which I need not refer particularly—I mean by the division of the ecclesiastical property—that the attempt to found a variety of endowed Churches for Ireland is a plan that would be found to be diametrically and fundamentally opposed to the sentiment and conviction of the great mass of the population of Great Britain, while on the part of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, who form the great bulk of those whom it would be intended to aid, such a plan has been generally and emphatically repudiated. We, Sir, therefore, proposed to proceed by a method opposite to that of Her Majesty's Government, and to attain the great aim of religious equality for Ireland, which we have in view in common with the Members of the Cabinet, by that other process which is commonly known, and with a sufficient accuracy of phrase for popular purposes, as the method of disestablishment and of general disendowment. The House, therefore, has been asked to vote, and has voted, that the Church in Ireland now established should cease to exist as an Establishment. It has also voted that all personal interests and all proprietary rights should be carefully respected; and an opinion certainly has been given, and I think has met with considerable acceptance, that, in addition to strictly defined interests and rights, in every question of feeling the House would be disposed, in contemplating so serious and extensive a change, to mitigate its operation, to soften the period of transition, wherever it could be done consistently with the attainment of the principal and fundamental objects. It has also been understood and has been voted by the House—not at my instance, but certainly with my concurrence—that the Maynooth Act should be repealed, and the Regium Donum discontinued. There are certain other propositions which I have presumed to state as opinions of my own, and they are briefly these — In the first place, that all the principles of consideration and equity upon which Parliament has distinctly shown its intention to treat the present Established Church should be fully and fairly applied, in consonance with the spirit of a just analogy, to the settlement of any other question affecting other religious bodies in Ireland; because if these principles were not so applied we should not establish the religious equality which we have in view as the main purpose that is to be accomplished. Then I have ventured to say, and I believe it is the deep conviction of all those who sit on this side of the House, that in proposing generally to disendow the Established Church of Ireland we emphatically renounce all idea of endowing in its stead any other religious communion; and, as I ventured on an early occasion to express it — perhaps, with no great precision, but still, I hope, with sufficient clearness to make my general view well known — that we finally and entirely abandon for Ireland the maintenance in any form of a salaried or stipendiary clergy, whether that clergy be supposed to be maintained out of public funds voted by this House, or out of the property which is now given for ecclesiastical purposes in Ireland. I also ventured to say, and I thought it was right and fair to say, that, so far as I could judge, either by my own sense of justice or by the opinions of others, there was certainly no intention that the Established Church of Ireland should be disestablished for the benefit of the Consolidated Fund; but that, whatever might be the final judgment of Parliament as to the wisest application of those funds when they came to be realized, they should be devoted, and that we should understand from the first that they should be devoted, exclusively to Irish purposes. As to the Irish Church itself, I expressed the opinion — which is an opinion only, but it appears to me a just one — that, having been itself deprived of legal privilege and position, it should be invested with perfect freedom. I own that, speaking as an individual, I cannot for a moment share the apprehensions — idle and visionary apprehensions they appear to me — which are entertained on this subject in high and dignified quarters, and among persons of great authority in the Church. I am astonished to find them so devoid of faith in the religious principles they profess, as to entertain the altogether idle and visionary apprehensions that those who hold our faith and religion in Ireland are not competent to direct themselves in their religious affairs, and that the moment those persons are released from restraint they are to astonish the world by their pranks and caprices in matters ecclesiastical. This I take to be the general position of this question, so far as regards the 1st and 4th Resolutions, and so far as regards the illustration that I may say they have received either from myself or, I think from the generality of those who, in the discussion of this question, have taken an active or leading part in favour of the Resolutions. Then we come to the Suspensory Bill, of which I have now to move the second reading, and I own it is to me matter of some disappointment that we have failed to obtain from the Government any recognition of the justice and propriety of this Bill, considered not as an original proposition, but as a natural sequel to the measures we have adopted. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government went so far on a former night as to state that he considered, not the 3rd, but the 2nd Resolution to be a corollary of the 1st. I entirely agree in that doctrine. I think it was a most

just and wise view of the case which prompted him to say that if the House was of opinion that the Irish Church should be disestablished, it ought to give effect to that opinion so far as the time and the circumstances permit. But what disappoints me is that when the right hon. Gentleman, on the part of the Government, has thus allowed that the 2nd Resolution was a just consequence of the 1st, he should now refuse to allow that the Bill is a just consequence of the 2nd Resolution. Why, for the House to have passed the 1st Resolution and to have rested content with an abstract declaration of opinion might have been impolitic; but for the House to have passed the 2nd Resolution, and declared that it was expedient to make a legal provision against the growth of new vested interests in the Church of Ireland, and then, forsooth, to have halted in its career and declined to pass a Bill on the subject, would have been not only impolitic, but nothing less than ridiculous. The importance of this Suspensory Bill I am very desirous to carry home to the minds of all who hear me. It is no abstract sense of its propriety, no eagerness to give immediate effect to an opinion merely because we have expressed it and made ourselves responsible for it, that leads me, for one, to urge this Bill upon the House. It is because the passing of this measure lies at the root of all dealing with the practical difficulties of the case. Now, if we were content to proceed in approaching the question of the Irish Church — and I am satisfied that we are not content so to proceed — in the manner which has been in fashion in various continental countries, and in our own in former times, when Churches have been disestablished, religious orders abolished, and the members of them turned out-of-doors — if it were our national manner to proceed in a mode like that, nothing would have been simpler than the way to deal with the Irish Church, and we should not need to preface our proceeding by a Suspensory Bill. I do not disguise from myself or any others that the working difficulties when a definitive Act is passed will be very great; they must be very great. To effect by form of law the transition of a considerable religious communion, from the condition of an Established Church to that of a voluntary society, is a most grave and serious matter; and when it is not done by a mere act of violence, but with the recognition of proprietary rights, and, above all, of vested interests, which the House, I am certain, regards as fundamental in any honourable or satisfactory arrangements, it is then the difficulties arise. Because vested interests carry with them the question not only of a certain amount of money, but of the continuance of a certain state of law; and it is conceivable—nay, probable—that in the beginning you would have two kinds of law in operation in the same country. You would have parishes and dioceses where the Bishops and clergy now in possession would be alive, and you would have other dioceses and parishes which had been voided, and where consequently people had come in under a new system perfectly different. Now, it is evident that the continuance of any mixture of that kind, which seems inseparable, at least at first view, from the case, would be a matter of considerable public embarrassment and inconvenience. Therefore, it appears to me the most natural thing in the world—indeed, I do not know how anyone can hesitate to admit it—that we who have concurred in the Resolution to disestablish the Irish Church should not be disposed to allow the prolongation of that period of embarrassment. It is a period which, when the time comes, I think the good sense of all parties concerned will seek to curtail and to bring to a close by some arrangement which may be then found practicable. But, in fact, nothing can be plainer than that it is the duty of a House of Commons which intends to disestablish the Irish Church, and at the same time to respect existing vested interests—that is, to preserve the Bishops and clergy, not only in their pecuniary receipts, but in their social position—nothing can be plainer, I say, than that in a matter of such complicated conditions, entailed by the necessity of the case, it is our imperative duty to prevent the unnecessary prolongation of these inevitable embarrassments by putting a stop to the growth of new vested interests. I must confess I should have gone one step further. I should have hoped, if this matter had not assumed a polemical aspect in consequence of its association with our debates upon disestablishment, that Her Majesty's Government, and even many of those who sit behind them, might have been disposed to acquiesce in the reasonableness of a suspensory measure. Undoubtedly if there be Gentlemen, and there may be some, who contend that the existing ecclesiastical condition of Ireland calls for no legislative measures, then they would be perfectly consistent in opposing such a Bill as I have submitted to the House. But such is not the position of Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government have themselves submitted to us a Motion in which it was distinctly declared that in all likelihood "considerable modifications" in the temporalities of the Established Church in Ireland might result from the inquiries of the Royal Commission. Well, what is the meaning of these words "considerable modifications?" They mean the extinction of some bishoprics, or the reduction of the income of some bishoprics, or both. They mean the withdrawal of the parochial machinery from those portions of the country where there are few or no Protestants. Every one will admit that this is the only natural and rational meaning of these "considerable modifications." But if there are to be those "considerable modifications," if you are going to reduce the income of bishoprics, or even, as it is reported, to extinguish a great number of them, if you are going to do away with what are commonly called "the scandalous abuses" of the Irish Church—a phrase by which I would be unwilling to describe the case of tolerably or even well-endowed clergy who have no duties to perform or parishioners to look after—if these things are to be brought to an end, and you think it your duty to do so, I ask, why do you not concur with us in passing this Suspensory Bill? At least the public evils, the public waste, and public scandal which will be caused if you continue to appoint new rectors to unnecessary parishes, new Bishops to unnecessary sees, and with unnecessary incomes, would be prevented. Why do you not consent, nay, why do you resist the proposition to put a stop to the growth of those new vested interests which will endure for twenty, thirty, or forty years hence? If my 2nd Resolution be a corollary of the 1st, and if this Bill be a corollary of the 2nd Resolution, I ask, speaking of its principle and not seeking to commit Gentlemen to its precise terms, is it not a corollary of any honest deliberation of the principle that there are to be "considerable modifications" in the temporalities of the Irish Church? Sir, I do not think that I need much longer detain the House, but I am anxious not to sit down without giving an answer to an appeal which was made by the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) a few days ago to this effect—"Why proceed with a Suspensory Bill when you must be, in fact, aware that there is no chance of its becoming law?" Now, any appeal proceeding from the hon. Member, who adheres with unfashionable strictness to political principles in a day when they are not in vogue, has a special claim to respectful attention over and above what applies to his position in this House and the assiduity and ability he displays as a Member of it. I will answer that appeal most explicitly, and I think he will admit that, from our point of view, my answer is not an unreasonable one. The substance of his argument rested upon the supposition that, though a Suspensory Bill might pass this House, yet it would not receive the assent of the House of Lords. My answer is, in the first place, that I do not think it compatible with the dignity or even the duty of this House that, with regard to questions profoundly involving the highest public interests, we should be governed in the adoption of this or that particular measure by doubts or misgivings which any among us may entertain as to the judgment which may be passed upon it by another branch of the Legislature. We are the representatives of the people, having distinct and definite duties of our own to perform; and I am persuaded that the safest course for us is temperately and deliberately to perform those duties, and to rely upon the wisdom of others, who have also their duties to perform, to direct them in the right path. And I must admit that I am very unwilling on this particular question to entertain the supposition that the event will happen which the hon. Member anticipates as likely to occur. I certainly will not charge that upon the House of Lords. If I have seen in the course of a lengthened career instances in which I have thought that House somewhat rash and precipitate, I certainly have seen more instances—and conspicuous instances, too—in which it has acted upon the dictates of an enlightened prudence. Were it true that this Motion had been made by us merely as a Motion intended for the purposes of party—[Cheers—] I assure hon. Gentlemen that I do not in the least need those cheers in order to make me cognizant of the fact that such is their conviction devoutly entertained; but, still, we have another view of the matter. It is possible in this free country that there may be two opinions upon the subject; nay, it is even possible that the opinion entertained by those hon. Gentlemen may be wrong; but I, for one—though I have sat very patiently, in common with those who sit on these Benches, under the imputation of party objects—will never cease to maintain, now that the proper time for doing so has come, that, so far from being ashamed that this proposal has been made, or of the time at which it was made, I should have been ashamed of myself if at such a time, under such circumstances, with such facts as the condition of Ireland has presented to us, and such necessities as the whole relations of the Empire to them inwardly and externally involve—I say I should have been ashamed of myself if at such a time the Motion had not been made. With that conviction, I do not abandon the belief that in "another place" likewise these urgent facts and necessities may be recognized. But, Sir, even were I to descend to the lowest ground, were I to assume that the hon. Member is right in his unfavourable anticipation, and that this Bill on reaching, as I confidently trust it will reach, the House of Lords, backed by the authority of a commanding majority of this House, will nevertheless be doomed to rejection,—even then, though for myself I repudiate that anticipation, I say it could not act upon us in the least, for experience has shown us, with regard to, I had almost said a thousand measures, that the sooner you begin to knock at that door the sooner you will open it. I will not detain the House by entering upon any considerations of detail in connection with this Bill. In fact, as far as I know, there is but one subject which is not distinctly intelligible upon the face of it, and that is the question of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The Bill has been framed in the belief that its provisions, when combined with those of the Church Temporalities Act of 1833 and of the general Ecclesiastical Law, are sufficient to enable every function and operation of the Established Church in Ireland to go forward, in different hands, indeed, but just as really and efficiently as they would go forward if the Bill were not passed. I refer to the subject because an opinion has been expressed by some that the ecclesiastical jurisdiction as a whole, or that portion of it which is exercised through the Spiritual Courts, would lapse under the Bill. I contest that opinion, and I think we shall have no difficulty in disproving it. But even were it true the matter could be easily arranged in Committee on the Bill; and it would be idle to magnify it into the importance of a cardinal consideration upon the present occasion. With regard to the Bill itself, I think I have said enough on this and on former occasions to justify us not only in proposing it; but in strongly urging it on the acceptance of the House; as being, in fact, a full acquittal and discharge of our immediate duty; for while we admit that the magnitude of this question is such that it cannot be definitively dealt with except by a Parliament approaching it, I might almost say, in the first days of its youth, yet perceiving that it is in our power materially to settle the limits of the question for the Parliament that is to come, we recognize that operation as a duty incumbent upon us, and accordingly I propose that the Bill be now read a second time, in the hope and belief that it will pass into a law.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY * The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) began his address on this occasion by laying the foundation, as he said, in the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. Now, I do not intend in the outset to accept the statement which he has made of our intentions, nor the interpretation he has thought proper to put upon words used on a former occasion by my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that religious equality was put forward by my noble Friend as the basis upon which we were going to act. I venture, however, to say that throughout the whole discussion that occurred, and in which I took part, religious equality was argued upon as a thing which could not be made the groundwork of measures like these without its being also made the groundwork of an attack on the English Establishment, and that therefore it was a thing we did not recognize nor make the basis of our policy. Moreover, the only measure which we brought forward in this House indicative of the policy of Her Majesty's Government with respect to any religious institution in Ireland was with respect to a Roman Catholic University. It was proposed to charter a Roman Catholic University in Ireland, and, the Correspondence on the subject being on the table, the House will have an opportunity of judging of our conduct respecting it. As to the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy, my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government stated most distinctly that no such intention had ever existed, and I may add, speaking in the presence of my noble Friend, that neither the increase of the Regium Donum nor the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy was ever discussed by the Cabinet, or brought forward in any shape or form before the House. [A laugh.] The hon. Member (Mr. Layard) laughs; but I venture to call upon him to support his incredulity by facts, if he can do so. So far, therefore, from being at one with the right hon. Gentleman upon the question of religious equality, I say it is impossible that we who have contended for religious Establishments in connection with the State can be at one with the right hon. Gentleman or the party he represents on that particular groundwork of religious equality which he has laid down for us. I have never concealed my belief that religious Establishments in connection with the State are to the interest both of the State and of the Church itself; but, I think, of greater interest to the State than to the Church. I do not at all agree with the right hon. Gentleman that because we support endowment and connection with the State we therefore manifest fear of the religion which we profess not being able to maintain itself without them; but I wish to put this to him—if Establishments be of no use for the support of religion, but rather a hindrance and impediment, I presume he will think it right to cast them away in this country as well as in Ireland; and, in support of that religious equality of which he has become so fervent an apostle, to let all religions in England and Scotland, as well as in Ireland, fight their battles without any assistance from the State, or, indeed, without any assistance from the pious endowments of those who have given them on the faith of their being protected by the State. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), in the discussion last night, which had no real bearing upon this subject, and I therefore did not then reply, said we ought to take the opportunity of making a concession on this question in order that we might receive concessions upon some other subject; and the right hon. Gentleman has told us to-night that he thought or expected that we, who have ourselves admitted that modifications might be required in the position or condition of the Church in Ireland, ought to jump at the opportunity of a Suspensory Bill, and ought not to oppose or show ourselves hostile to what would serve our own purpose as well as his. On that I will say something presently. This is the first Bill introduced into this House, within the recollection of any of us, avowedly for the purpose of confiscating Church property and devoting it to secular purposes. Yet we are called upon, in the discharge of the duty which we owe to our principles, to our friends in the country, and, as we believe, to the interests of Church Establishments, to accept such a Bill as this without discussion, to allow it to pass through this House as if it were not opposed, and then, no doubt, to be charged with having deceived and defrauded the right hon. Gentleman, when those who sit with us in the same Cabinet oppose it on its reaching, if it ever does reach, the House of Lords. Now, there is a Commission sitting upon the question of the Church in Ireland, and when that Commission issues its Report, it will be received with the respect and consideration due to those who form that Commission; but to tell me that I am to assume beforehand what their recommendations will be; that I am to suspend the operation of the ordinary law in Ireland, to effect a purpose of which I know nothing—that I am to prevent the appointment of clergymen to benefices of a class and character, for instance, which it may be the intention of the Commission to foster and encourage and support even more than they are supported at present—this is a proposition so unreasonable in itself that were it not put forward by such great authorities as the hon. Member for Birmingham and the right hon. Gentleman, I should certainly not have thought it worth while to notice it. Now, it is not my intention to go much into the details of this Bill, though I think the right hon. Gentleman would find, if he were to consult some of those who are well acquainted with ecclesiastical affairs in Ireland, that in some respects it will not carry out the intentions which he professes. First of all, let me take exception to the Preamble of the Bill. It states what I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would not have wished to state, for it states that which is not the fact. It says—

“Whereas Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to signify that She has placed at the disposal of Parliament for the purposes of legislation during the present Session Her interest in the Temporalities of the several Archbishoprics, Bishoprics, and other ecclesiastical dignities and benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof.”

Now, Her Majesty has not made any such statement. Her Majesty has stated her willingness to waive any opposition which she might have made to the consideration of measures by Parliament; but does the right hon. Gentleman mean to tell me that the Queen has assented beforehand to legislation proposed by this House, and that she has for the purposes of legislation, whatever that legislation may be, abdicated any right she may possess in the future? [Mr. GLADSTONE: No!] The right hon. Gentleman says “No”; but I say that the recital of the Preamble presumes that it will be so, and I say that if a recital was necessary there should have been recited the Address of the right hon. Gentleman, and the Answer given to that Address, in the terms which Her Majesty was advised to use, and which she used advisedly, with reference to this subject. Her Majesty has no constitutional right to abdicate that part of her Prerogative which entitles her to put a veto upon any measure she thinks fit. The Preamble, then, is inconsistent with the fact, and states that which is not a legal or constitutional doctrine. Again, the right hon. Gentleman asks us to pass by without remark the statement that it is expedient to do certain things, and he says that statement is founded upon what we did with respect to the Resolutions. But it should be recollected that, when I stated to the House the course Her Majesty’s Government would adopt with respect to the Resolutions, I did it in the most distinct terms, and I informed the right hon. Gentleman that he was not to regard our waiving a division on them as any sign that we did not entirely repudiate and oppose them. I told him that when a Bill was brought before the House, we should announce how we should deal with it. Well, the right hon. Gentleman, in consequence, I presume, of that statement, put a question to my right hon. Friend, and was answered at once that we should give our opposition to the Bill. In conformity with that reply I put a Notice on the Paper, and I am now discharging the duty I undertook in opposing the second reading. But, Sir, I do not think, with the views I entertain with respect to this Bill, that it is any part of my duty, or any part of the interests of those with whom I act, that we should attempt to amend this Bill in any respect. It is, in my opinion, a Bill bad in its construction, bad in its principle, bad in its expediency, without precedent, and entirely without justice. The Irish Church has defects, and many defects, as I am afraid there are in every Church; but for those who consider that the Irish Church is in itself good, that it has done good, and that it is doing good—for those who believe with me that in the truth which I believe that Church to hold there is in it the element of progress, which, although it may for a time be stayed, will yet eventually prevail—for those who are of opinion that the Irish Church is not injured by connection with the State, it is impossible to assent to the principles and the statements laid down in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion took me to task for speaking of the State as upholding the Reformation in Ireland, and he said, with a taunt, "Why, you support Maynooth and give money to a Roman Catholic University, to Roman Catholic schools, and a variety of other things of that kind." That is true. But Maynooth was endowed long before I had a seat in this House; and with regard to the Roman Catholic University as a place of education, I shall be glad to give my reasons when that is discussed for what has been proposed by the Government for establishing a University in Ireland. With respect to education, it is true that denominational education prevails, and that money is freely granted by the State for the education of the children of all creeds. But, Sir, is France, or is it not, a Roman Catholic country? In that country payments are made for other religious purposes than those of Romanism. Does, therefore, the Emperor of the French not deserve the name of the eldest son of the Church, and does he not uphold the Roman Catholic religion? When we speak of these things we speak of ourselves as a nation. It is true that the logical position which State Churches used to occupy may have passed away, and that means are provided to educate and instruct those who hold different creeds and opinions. But this nation, as a nation, upholds the Reformation, and although these lesser things are done, I have a right to say that the State of England does uphold the Reformation, although I am sorry to say there are those who are anxious to put an end to it. I do not deny for one moment, nor have I ever denied, the power of Parliament to deal with these great questions; it is the moral not legal right which is disputed. I have spoken on former occasions with respect to the Union, and its bearing and weight on this great question; but I am aware that Parliament has the power, which must reside somewhere, to deal with these matters. And there can be no other power than that of the Imperial Parliament in a country which is not a federation, but an incorporation of two States. If it had remained a federation, the Parliaments of the two countries would have had to agree together to rescind a Union solemnly established. But with an incorporated Parliament there is no other body but the Imperial Parliament which can alter the arrangements existing between the two countries. But by the step which you take in this Bill, and which you hope to perfect in a future Bill, you are, in fact and in law, repealing the Union. ["No!"] I say that, having consulted a very eminent lawyer on this subject, he told me, and I believe him, that unless you put in such a Bill as that which you project for the destruction of the Establishment in Ireland, (a fundamental and essential part of the Union) a saving clause reserving the Union, it is doubtful if the Union will not be ipso facto repealed. ["Name!"] I am willing to adopt that statement, and therefore, as far as I am concerned, I make myself responsible for it. Much has been said, but not by me, with respect to the Coronation Oath. I will say that Mr. Burke, in the strong opinion expressed by him, never made a distinction between the Legislative and the Executive capacities of the Crown with respect to the Coronation Oath. And even in later years that great authority so frequently cited in this House, and respected by no one more than the right hon. Gentleman himself—I mean the late Sir Robert Peel—in speaking of the Coronation Oath, treated it as binding on the Monarch to a certain extent in his Legislative as well as in his Executive capacity. The passage is so short that I will read it to the House. Sir Robert Peel said—

"He had never thought that Oath bound the King to maintain the Church and all its members in possession of every right and privilege which they might have possessed in 1688. It did bind him to consult all the essential interests of the Church, to provide to the utmost of his power for its security; but it left a discretion to take the course which the King in his conscience might believe best for those interests and that security."

And, therefore, the position of Sir Robert Peel was that the Monarch was not bound by that Oath as to every single thing connected with the Church which might be modified, but yet that modification must not be for the destruction, but for the advantage, of the Church. I said before that I regarded this Bill as inexpedient, and I consider it inexpedient on the ground which the right hon. Gentleman, by the almost contemptuous terms in which he spoke of the other House—["Oh, oh!"]. Then let me say—with reference to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman with respect to the House of Lords that it is inexpedient, with the views which I entertain of that independent branch of the Legislature, that a Bill of this importance should be advancing to that House before it has been called upon to give any vote on this subject. I think it is most expedient that when you are dealing with a great institution such as this that the House of Lords should have been consulted by means of a Resolution, or by means of a joint Address to the Crown; and then we should have ascertained whether those prognostications which the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) has made were likely to be verified or not. I object again to this Bill because it seems to me to be an attempt to paralyze the action of the Church of Ireland before any real decision has been come to with respect to it. It is like the method of some of those animals we see in the Zoological Gardens, which have the power of numbing their prey before they proceed leisurely to devour it. I think that this is an attempt to do something of the same kind, to paralyze the Church in Ireland, to create alarm, and to throw it into confusion, in order that its disconcerted adherents may not be able to resist the further progress of measures of this description. I say it is inexpedient in the House to pass a Bill which, for the first time in my recollection, enacts that money to be derived from the suspended bishoprics, archbishoprics, livings, and benefices, shall be paid into a separate chest by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and that they shall keep this money distinct from all other, to be afterwards disposed of in such manner as Parliament shall direct. I decline to entrust to the chance of any future Parliament the disposal of money which we are in a position to vote upon, and to say what shall be done with it. For the first time, and in distinct language—for it was never distinctly said before—we have had a strong disavowal from the right hon. Gentleman that there should be any part of this money employed for the endowment of any other religion. But I should like to ask something further. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of endowments to Maynooth, to a Roman Catholic University, and for Roman Catholic education. I should like to know what he includes in the term "endowment." I would ask whether he means merely to disavow payment to the priesthood or ministers of such and such religions; or that the money shall not be devoted to the purposes of any other religion in any way whatever, but devoted to purely secular purposes? We have had no authoritative statement on that subject. We are told that the Roman Catholics have absolutely repudiated having anything to do either with endowments from the State or with the proceeds of the money derived from the present Church of Ireland. Far be it from me to suppose that these statements are made without meaning and without the determination so to act. But I cannot help looking back on former pledges and promises—to those statements which prelates in Ireland were authorized to make about never intending either to attack the Church in Ireland or to alienate her revenues; and I cannot help thinking that there is at times an action from without upon the prelates of that Church, and upon those under their guidance, which may leave it to be said afterwards that those promises and pledges apply only to the present time, and that when there is a difficulty as to the disposition of the funds some will be found of a different religion from the Established Church who will not shrink from taking them. I object again to this as an inexpedient measure, because it is an absolutely hap-hazard proposal. Where the blow may fall nobody knows. It may fall on Belfast, with its crowds of worshippers belonging to the Church of England; or it may, and it no doubt will, fall on some of those smaller places to which the right hon. Gentleman has adverted. He says, "Why will you not adopt this Bill? The Commission may wish for such alterations as it proposes, and you yourselves will find it very useful." Now, if we knew, as was known in 1833, what was to be done in respect to every part of the Church Establishment in Ireland, you might lay down your rules by a Bill, and apply suspension in cases where steps were to be taken for alterations. But this Suspensory Bill hits right and left in every direction. Last year 138 benefices became vacant, and in ordinary years we may take about 120 as the average. Of these 138 vacant last year, about 127 were in what is called public patronage. Well, Sir, these livings, many in most important places, would fall into the hands of the Commissioners for the undisclosed objects of this Bill. This Suspensory Bill may be valuable for the purposes of destruction, and that is the object of its promoters; but it may affect just those places which those who wish for the stability of the Church desire to maintain, and cannot therefore meet our views. Why, Sir, is it expedient that a poorly endowed curate should be placed in a parish where even the regular incumbent had not been overpaid—for few are overpaid—in a large parish with schools and charities to conduct, most of them owing almost their whole existence to the rector or vicar, and that for the year in which this Bill is to take effect you should have one unable to assist in their maintenance? He will have small interest in the parish, and he does not know how long he may be there; and during that year the schools may fall into decay, and the charities may come to nothing, even although you ultimately destroy the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. Now, Sir, besides that, I say, as I said on former occasions, it is not the Church people only who are concerned in this matter. As regards the temporalities the clergy are indiscriminate in their charities. They do not confine them to Church people. The blow you aim would fall as heavily on the poor of Roman Catholic and Presbyterian faiths as on those of the Church of England. Is this necessary? Is it necessary to the scheme you have in view? Is this just and generous Parliament so hostile to the Church in Ireland that, despite of, if not vested interests, yet good and well-founded expectations, you will interfere to check the course of promotion of the miserably paid curate, who has been working his way up for many a trying year under great difficulties. Should it happen that in the course of the coming year some remuneration for his services should be in immediate prospect, will this great Parliament of England step in and say, "We won't allow you to get it?" Is the sum you are taking worth saving? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire told us on a former occasion, in the first speech he made on this subject, that he will have regard not only to the vested interests now in existence, but to the vested interests coming into existence. I will ask him, is this the fair, generous, considerate treatment which he held out as a lure? Again, let me ask him—as no doubt some will reply for him who can answer the question—what his Bill means by the words "trustees acting in a public capacity?" In Belfast there is an endowment, which I believe amounts to £20,000, made up by subscription, and managed by trustees, for the benefit of the Church. Are they public trustees, or are they not, for the purposes of this Bill? Are you going to prevent them from using the money furnished by the exertions of themselves and other subscribers? If so, nothing so iniquitous was ever attempted by Parliament. I should also like to know whether the livings under Trinity College, Dublin, are within this Bill? [Mr. LAWSON: No!] Then you treat the interests of Trinity College, Dublin, as private interests. I hope that will be considered when we come to talk of throwing open that College. We must bear in mind, then, that you treat it as a private institution administering private funds. Well, now, I say of this scheme that, first of all, you are not clear in your definition. You cannot tell us how far this Bill extends. Is it one just to the clergy? If it would be unjust to the Fellows of Trinity College to thwart their just hopes, is it not unjust to the clergy at large? Those favoured clergy who are connected with private proprietors, their chances are not impeded; if they be on the road to preferment, their promotion is not stopped; but those who have been rising by merit, those who have been watched by the Bishop of the diocese, those who have been rising by ability, learning, and devotion to their duties, it is their promotion you are about to stop. To those who may be fortunate enough to be connected with gentlemen exercising private patronage there will be no difficulty; but those whom the Crown, the Bishops, or the public may deem to be worthy of promotion will be stopped on the road. What do you do this for? In order to effect a miserable saving, to put a little more into the sacrilegious coffer which you have provided by this Bill for the funds of the Church which you propose to seize. I wish to ask another question. It appears that throughout Ireland there are many parishes situated like one respecting which I have received a statement. A Fellow of Trinity College succeeded to a living; on doing so he had to pay £1,000, which was a charge on it. The trustees of his marriage settlement advanced him the money to do so, on the understanding that the £1,000 would be a charge to be paid by his successor. If that gentleman dies during the continuance of this Bill, who is to pay his relatives back the money which he advanced on the living? I wish to ask that question. I know that the Bill contains these words in reference to benefices seized by the Commissioners—"subject to all charges legally affecting the same." [Mr. LAWSON: Hear, hear!] The right hon. and learned Gentleman may cheer; I have read his Bill, and I think it a very bad one. It does not meet the case I have put. Might the Ecclesiastical Commissioners between this and the 1st of August next year pay £1,000 to the family of that gentleman, they being in ignorance of what you ultimately intend to do with the living, or what may become of your grand scheme of confiscation? You must remember, that, in the case of a successor to the present incumbent, that successor would be expected to pay the money over at once; and every one knows, in the case of the widow and children of clergymen, how important it generally is that they should at once be put in possession of money which that clergyman has advanced for the benefit of the parish. Nothing can be more monstrously unjust than to arrest the action of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners before you come to any decision as to what you are finally about to do. I hold in my hand a statement received from Ireland, and vouched for on the authority of one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. I applied for information on the subject, and I hope the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson) does not think that there has been any breach of trust in furnishing me with it. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland increase small livings, and I should assume that some of those livings would come under the benefit of the operations of the Commissioners during the next year. There are many greatly needing it. I find that, in the diocese of Armagh, the benefice of Annaghmore has a present income of £105, and a Church population of 1,200; the benefice of Brackaville, a present income of £100, and a Church population of 1,375; the benefice of Milltown, a present income of £130, and a Church population of 2,340; the benefice of Portadown, a present income of £175, and a Church population of 3,800. In the diocese of Clogher, the benefice of Newton-Saville has a present income of £120, and a Church population of 1,300. In the diocese of Connor, the benefice of Ballymena has a present income of £129, and a Church population of 1,500. I might cite other cases equally strong, but those I have quoted will serve for an illustration. I ask the House, I ask hon. Members opposite, whether in their zeal—I may admit their honest zeal—for getting rid of what they may deem to be abuses, they ought to interfere with the action of the Commissioners in the case of these small benefices. Speaking of the Church in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) said, "Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" I say, "Let it alone for this year also; let it alone under such circumstances as those figures disclose, and do not tell those working clergymen that their prospects are to be destroyed, and all chance of even a moderate remuneration for their services to be for ever cut off." These unfortunate men may be told to starve on with the miserable pittance they now receive for their work; but I trust in the honour of English Gentlemen. It not being necessary for their purpose that they should suddenly arrest all those clergymen who are now on their way to preferment, I hope they will not interfere with the really vested interests of those who have so small a pittance in a prospective increase. I was taken to task by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite for proposing to use the Church funds in the different parts of the country where they might be most needed, taking from Connaught to use in Leinster; but you are going to stop the flow of this money, in its local channel, and take it into your own hands, for I know not what purpose, except that it is to be an Irish one. You are going to dry up the sources of charity. ["No!"] Yes, you are going to stay the hand of those almoners, the endowed clergy, and to put curates in these suspended parishes instead of permanent ministers. And this you propose to do without telling us to what purpose you intend to apply the funds. We know, at least, that you are not going to spend them on the spot; but, while you will not tell us what you are going to do with them, those who are now interested in them are to be deprived of their interests, both donors and receivers, and that without any provision for compensation to either. While on this point I may remark that the right hon. Gentleman, on a former occasion, said that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland had the power of creating new benefices. No doubt he has since discovered his mistake. What he referred to is known as an episcopal union. [Mr. GLADSTONE admitted that he had been mistaken.] I will not, then, dwell further on that point. Now is there any precedent for the course which the right hon. Gentleman asks us to adopt? We have been told a good deal about the Church Temporalities Act. Let me allude to it. I find in the Resolutions adopted previously to the passing of that Act what the object of those Resolutions was, for what object the Bill founded on them was intended, and what course was taken at that time in reference to the Irish Church. I need not read those Resolutions at length; but one of them states that the course to be taken was—

Moreover, that was recited in the Preamble of the Church Temporalities Act, so that it is clear that that Act was not intended to destroy or injure the Church in Ireland, but to conduce to its stability and permanence. There are, I believe, present in this House Members of that Government who know that that was the course then adopted. In order to carry that plan into effect, certain things were done by the Bill, which cut down the bishoprics in Ireland, and also contained a clause supposed to bear some resemblance to the present measure, with respect to suspending certain benefices. But those benefices were benefices where there had been no services in the church for three years, and anyone who takes the trouble to examine the 116th clause will see what ample provisions were made for providing officiating ministers to look after the spiritual interests of the people in those thinly-peopled scattered districts. Care was taken that, if money were taken away, it should, at all events, be applied to better purposes within the Church and for the maintenance of the Church, and it was with such objects and for such legislation that the King placed his interest in the temporalities at the disposal of Parliament. Now, although the object of this Bill is not disclosed on the face of it, yet we know from the Resolutions which have been passed that it is the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church. Its funds are to be taken away absolutely and entirely, never to be returned; and we know everything about what is and is to be proposed, except on the most important point of all—namely, the purpose for which we are gathering all this money together. Why the House does not demand an explanation on this point I cannot understand. The Church Temporalities Act then affords no precedent whatever; for there was no suspension except in those cases where there had been no service for three years, and power was vested in the Commissioners to restore the minister in any such district, should such restoration be deemed necessary. But will not the measure now under discussion be a heavy blow and a great discouragement to these scattered populations. I have already spoken of the blow falling upon the great centres of population. There it would fall heavily enough; but how much more severely would it fall on the scattered populations? A clergyman in the county of Cork has sent me an account of the large district in which he resides. He has no parsonage, and but very small endowment; but the Church population, which at one time seemed to be absolutely dispersed, has been gradually got together again. There is now a Church population of 240, and there are seventy-nine children in his school. Instances like these show how much good is being done by these gentlemen; and until you are prepared to deal permanently with the question of the Irish Church, it is unjust to cut off the supplies. As we have heard the fatal words in his sense of them, “religious equality,” again to-night from the right hon. Gentleman, I will not be prevented from expressing that which I deeply feel—namely, that this is an attack, not upon the Irish Establishment only, but upon the United Church of England and Ireland. Not long ago, Sir, the noble Lord who has been the Prime Minister, and who has been conspicuous in the annals of Parliament ever since the time of the Reform Bill, and I may say long before—I mean Earl Russell—took the chair at one of the meetings held in support of the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, and by whom was he supported? Let us see whether the supporters of the noble Earl stop short at the Church Establishment in Ireland, or whether their intentions have not a far wider range. Why, the noble Lord the Leader of the Whigs appeared upon the platform, surrounded by Mr. Mason Jones, Mr. Miall, Mr. Beales, and Mr. Potter; and the "troops of Friends" who should "accompany old age," where were they? Where were the Whigs who once surrounded him, and who brought him to the high position of Prime Minister of England? At that meeting the noble Lord gave up his prejudice in favour of Establishment. He said, "I have my plan and you have yours, but we are both aiming at the same object—religious equality." And there was made the last bow of effete Whiggism at the shrine of Liberationism and Radicalism. The idea that this so-called religious equality can be confined to one part of the Empire is perfectly absurd, and the men who have theories on this subject, and who have agitated them honestly, uprightly, and in a manly manner, as Mr. Miall has always done—these men, though they do not prominently put forward upon all occasions their ulterior views, yet they would, if pressed, admit that what they have at heart is the destruction of all religious Establishments, and the absolute separation, or, as they call it, the freedom of religion, from the control of the State. These men speak of what is being done, not as you do who assert that it will increase the safety of the Church of England, but as supplying a vantage ground on which they may plant their batteries with the certainty that the principles which you are establishing will insure the fall of the Church. Some gentleman sent me a few days ago a speech delivered by the late Bishop of London in the year 1835, and I cannot express in more forcible terms the feeling I entertain in regard to the present measure than he used respecting the measure then before the House of Lords. He said—

"What would be more calculated than the passing of such a measure to inspire with fresh courage and confidence that hostile band of men, neither few in numbers nor contemptible for talents and influence, who view the Protestant Establishment in both countries with feelings of malignant hostility, who meditate its destruction, who, either by storm or snp, by force or fraud, by open and manly hostility, which it is easy to encounter and resist, or by insinuations and innuendoes and false reproaches, with which it is painful and difficult for honourable men to contend, are bent upon effecting the subversion of the Protestant Church of England, but who know, nevertheless, that it is hopeless to attempt it while the Protestant Church of Ireland stands."

[Mr. BRIGHT: What measure was that?] It was the Appropriation Clause in 1835. We are told that these are theories which are made use of for Tory and party purposes; but I read them in the Nonconformist, in the speeches of those who hold the opinions promulgated by the Nonconformist, and in the accounts of the proceedings of the Liberation Society. If I were to put to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) the question whether he did not consider that by a successful attack on the Irish Church he would not obtain a vantage ground from which an attack might be made on the Churches of England and Scotland, I should feel that I was offering an insult to him, because he has so consistently and so honestly proclaimed his hostility to all religious Establishments. I maintain that by this Bill you interfere not only with the position of those who have vested interests, but likewise with the progress of individuals who ought not to be stopped by a measure of this kind in the promotion which they deserve. Thus you will not merely effect the existing, but stop the supply of clergy in the Church of Ireland; but also impart distrust to the mind of everybody connected with it, and all this is to be enacted suddenly and at a few weeks' notice. The clergy will see that you are stopping them in their career before you have proposed to deal with their interests on a large basis, and they will consequently believe that you will deal with them harshly also in the future. Is it no degradation that men of learning, ability, and devoted to their duties—as all admit—and who have hitherto occupied a position independent of their congregations, and who have relied on the funds of the Church for their support, should hereafter be the stipendiaries of a congregation? Is this desirable in the interests of truth, in the interests of right, and in the interests of religion? I believe it is not, and therefore I have taken this opportunity of opposing this Bill. I oppose this Bill because, when it comes into operation, it will have been practically announced by the Parliament of England that in Ireland the Imperial Government is for the future to be purely secular. In that case, I do not know what course you are to adopt with respect to your gaols, your workhouses, and your hospitals—how far this absolute disestablishment is to go, and whether you are to leave to the voluntary system the inmates of these unhappy places. When, however, you deal with the criminal and the pauper population and the inmates of hospitals, you must find means of affording them religious consolation and instruction, unless you neglect one of the first duties of the State. If, therefore, you are to be logical you ought to maintain a religious Establishment. The hon. Member for Birmingham in a speech which he delivered a short time ago remarked that the Church population in Ireland was not a large one, and he proceeded to cut it down to 500,000. The Census, however, was taken with too much accuracy in Ireland to admit of that, and I will, therefore, take the Church population as it appears in the Census at 693,000—or close upon 700,000. The hon. Member proceeded to say,—“Suppose all those persons were gathered together in one town, it would only be about the size of Liverpool or Manchester.” Now, I will take that illustration. If there were such a consentaneous and homogeneous mass of men collected in one town, having one religious interest, and an Establishment supporting their religion, I should like to see this or any other House dare to attack it. It is because the Irish Churchmen are scattered, and as you suppose from that cause, weak, that you are attacking them. I will take the Corporation of London, which represents, I suppose, some 100,000 people. The Corporation of London has been reported against by a Commission, and spoken against by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) for many years, but it still stands, and you can do nothing with it, because its members are all banded together to resist any attack made upon it. Do not suppose that everything is to go against the Church of Ireland so smoothly as the right hon. Gentleman seems to imagine. There are 700,000 people in Ireland interested in the maintenance of the Church; there are in this country large masses of people, increasing day by day as this question becomes understood, who will be more and more prepared to stand by their Irish brethren. I believe there are in this country and in Ireland many Roman Catholics who, in accordance with the principles of their own Church, favour the union of Church and State, and are reluctantly following the right hon. Gentleman, while some are turning round and refusing to do so. There are some of that religion in this country who, desiring to maintain the principles of their faith, object to see the funds of the Irish Church secularized, and who, believing in, and contending boldly for the faith which belongs to them, hope that some day it will be in the ascendant; they, therefore, will not see that which our wise forefathers gave for religious purposes thrown away for ever by such a measure as is contemplated. I have said that in honour and duty the members of the English Church are bound not to forsake their Irish brethren. You who are urging on this scheme have before you measures by which you can obtain speedily that which you profess to desire—an appeal to the people. We desire it also; we desire that this great question shall be laid before the new constituencies, if you will enable us to reach them. We are prepared to appeal to them on this great question, and are not afraid of the answer. It is a remarkable thing that Gentlemen who have been always praising the legislation of the last thirty years, and telling us that the House has so admirably represented the country, seem to think that with a change in the constituency there is to be an entire change in the policy of the country; which seems like an admission that they have been for thirty years misrepresenting the working men, doing that which is injurious to their interests; that there is all at once to be a sudden turn of the wheel; everything uppermost is to be put under, and everything we esteemed is no longer to be admired. If you put boldly, honestly, straightforwardly before the people the interest they have in the Church Establishment—and for them it exists as such—I do not hesitate to say that, especially as a Reformed Establishment, they will stand by it, to the last. I quoted just now the Bishop of London in 1831, and, perhaps, addressing brother churchmen, I may be permitted to conclude what I have to say in his language—

“By the gratitude you owe to that Church from which you have imbibed your Christian principles and knowledge, in whose consolations I trust you delight (and may you experience all their efficacy at the closing hour of your existence), I implore you not to give your consent to a measure which will destroy the Protestant Church in Ireland without benefiting the poor Roman Catholic population; which will starve the meritorious dispensers of God's truth without adding to the comforts of those who are engaged in diffusing religious knowledge under a different form; a measure of which it is not too much to say that it commences with spoliation and sacrilege, and must end in ruin and confusion.”

I move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. LAWSON said, he desired to call the attention of the House to some statements made by the right hon. Gentleman, which he thought were the most remarkable that had ever proceeded from a Cabinet Minister in that House. His right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had justified himself in propounding a policy with respect to the Church of Ireland, on the ground that a policy of a different character had been proposed by the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland on an occasion when he must be supposed to have spoken the well-considered opinion of his Colleagues. It would be remembered that, after the change in the Ministry, a noble Duke in "another place" stated that the next evening the noble Earl would explain the policy of Her Majesty's Government with respect to Ireland. The noble Earl then said—

"There would not, I believe, be any objection to make all Churches equal in Ireland; but the result must be secured by elevation, and not by confiscation. Our policy is to make, and not to destroy."

The noble Earl commented on the insignificant character of the Regium Donum, and intimated that there would be no objection to increase it. How could that be reconciled with the statement just made that the increase of the Regium Donum and the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy were never discussed in the Cabinet at all? The Government was in this dilemma—either a Cabinet Minister was instructed to come down to that House and make statements calculated to raise expectations amongst the people of Ireland for which he had no warrant from the Cabinet, or else he spoke the sentiments of that Cabinet; and yet the right hon. Gentleman ventured to tell them that these important subjects which formed the staple of that speech were never even discussed in the Cabinet of which he was a Member. He left the right hon. Gentleman to choose which horn of the dilemma he would. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire had argued that, as the Government themselves admitted that important changes would be recommended by the Commission, his Bill was wise and expedient in anticipation of such changes; but the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would not assume that such changes would be made. Yet the right hon. Gentleman must have been cognizant of the Amendment which the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs moved on behalf of the Cabinet, and which on the face of it admitted that changes must be made.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I said I would not assume what changes might be made; and that therefore this Bill might not be at all suitable to them. I did not say that no changes would be made.

MR. LAWSON thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the admission. Then the right hon. Gentleman left the argument of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire entirely unanswered. It was admitted that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs spoke the sentiments of the Government when he said that considerable modifications in the temporalities of the Irish Church might, after pending inquiry, be found. Did the House remember the language of the noble Lord, who said he would not for a moment justify the abuses and anomalies which existed in the Irish Church? If considerable modifications were to be made—if bishoprics and benefices were to be reduced, what was the argument against the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the case of the poor curate; but he left the Bishops out of his calculation altogether. Seeing that in Munster and Connaught only 3 and 4 per cent of the population were members of the Established Church, was it not worth while to prevent the creation of new vested interests by the filling up of vacancies—even in anticipation of the correction of those abuses the existence of which was admitted by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary? There were several bishoprics in those provinces; and if one of those fell vacant and this Bill had not passed, there would be created a new vested interest of a Bishop to administer to the wants of a few scattered Anglicans in that district. The right hon. Gentleman was now trying to disconnect himself from the policy of increasing the Regium Donum—of endowing a Roman Catholic University and the Roman Catholic priesthood—in order that he might be able to raise a Protestant cry in the country at the coming elections; but he could not disconnect himself and his Government from the offers on this subject which had been submitted to the Cabinet of the Earl of Derby, and approved by them. But the right hon. Gentleman almost admitted the case he was attempting to disprove by his reference to the Emperor of the French and his remark that there was religious equality in France. [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: I did not say anything of the sort.] Well, in France, Protestant and Catholic ministers were alike paid by the State; and that was the very kind of religious equality which the noble Earl announced to this House. Then the right hon. Gentleman added that he had been advised by an eminent lawyer that, if this Bill passed, it would have the effect of repealing the Union.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman misrepresents me so frequently that I am obliged to interrupt him. ["Order!"] I shall not be put down in stating that I have been misrepresented. I was misrepresented with respect to France. I did not say anything about religious equality in France. ["Order!"] I wish to make a personal explanation simply.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Member is aware that the rule of the House is that it is at the option of the Member in possession of the House to give way or not to an immediate explanation.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The right hon. and learned Member did give way.

MR. SPEAKER: Then the explanation should be confined to the single point.

MR. LAWSON said, the right hon. Gentleman rose to explain with reference to the opinion of an eminent lawyer on this Bill.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Then all I have to say is that it was not upon this Bill that I referred to the opinion of an eminent lawyer; but upon the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to introduce for the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland.

MR. LAWSON asked, whether the House had understood that to be the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the opinion of this nameless lawyer; and whether, if so, it was germane to the matter now in hand? The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, saw the absurdity in what such an argument would involve him, because if this measure amounted ipso facto to a repeal of the Union, the right hon. Gentleman was in the happy condition of a Minister of the Crown, who had advised his Sovereign to sanction the introduction of a measure having that effect. In spite of his criticisms, the right hon. Gentleman had not succeeded in pointing out one single blot in this Bill. The Preamble was quoted from the Church Temporalities Act, and in the proper and legal form stated that Her Majesty had been pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament during legislation her interest in the temporalities. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the Queen had given no such Answer to the Address; but he (Mr. Lawson) maintained that Her Majesty's Answer did, in fact, amount to that. She graciously desired that her interests should not stand in the way of the consideration of the question by Parliament with a view to legislation during the present Session. What did this mean if it did not support and warrant the wording of the Preamble? And what was the value of the special pleading of the right hon. Gentleman on this point? The right hon. Gentleman asked whether the advowsons belonging to Trinity College were included in the Bill? Certainly not. The words of the Bill were carefully framed with a view to prevent any such construction. They were limited to any advowsons of which certain Archbishops, Bishops, and dignitaries of the Church, as such, had the disposal. Many of the advowsons of Trinity College had been bought in the market, some of them for considerable sums, and were as much private property as any advowsons in private hands. Then the right hon. Gentleman asked what was the meaning of the words referring to trustees acting in a public capacity. Well, there were certain advowsons in Ireland in the gift of certain persons acting in a public capacity—namely, The Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, the Archbishop of Dublin, and certain of the Judges—and it was to meet that case that the words were introduced. No one who had read the Bill could be, for a moment, under the delusion that trustees, acting for a private congregation, or for persons who had subscribed to build churches, would come under the clause. Would they be trustees acting in a public capacity? A more outrageous supposition could not be imagined. With regard to the charges upon the rents and profits which became vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners under this Bill, the Commissioners would, of course, take them subject to the liabilities, and the claims of the representatives of the deceased incumbent would be satisfied much more quickly than if they were left to be dealt with by his successor, who would not be compelled to pay until six months after entering on the living. Much stress had been laid upon the inconvenience which would arise from the want of any adequate provision to meet the case of a living which became vacant in a populous parish; but his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) had called attention to Section 116 of the Church Temporalities Act, which made a careful provision for the discharge of the duties of such a cure so suspended. The provision was that the Commissioners were to authorize the appointment of a minister if necessary, or confide the duties to the minister of an adjoining parish; and were to give him such moderate stipend as they thought proper. But his right hon. Friend, in considering this Bill, that this was not a sufficiently liberal provision; and accordingly at the close of Clause 2 in this Bill inserted a proviso—

“That in regulating the salary of the officiating minister regard should be had to the nature and extent of the duties to be discharged.”

So that the largest possible discretion was given to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He conceived that the right hon. Gentleman spoke rather disrespectfully of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners when he talked of their sacrilegious coffers. The right hon. Gentleman said that they were trying to prevent the Ecclesiastical Commissioners from augmenting the incomes of benefices where there was a large Anglican population, and only a small amount paid to the minister; but he did not allude to the amount of the augmentations that had taken place in the instances to which he referred. Under the voluntary system which the right hon. Gentleman condemned there was no doubt that the minister of such a parish would not be left with an income of £120 a year to be augmented by doles of £10 or £20 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. That House by large majorities had affirmed the principle of the Resolutions, and he therefore declined to follow the right hon. Gentleman into his argument on the merits of Establishments; but when the right hon. Gentleman told the House that the effect of this Bill would be to dry up charity in the country, he begged leave to say that it would be directly the reverse. For what was the state now of the Protestant parochial population of Ireland? They were in this condition. They had everything done for them by the State. Their church was built for them, it was warmed for them, it was kept in repair for them; their sexton was paid, their organ-blower was paid, their minister was paid for them; there was no demand upon their purses. But, instead of such a population being left to depend upon the State, they ought to be taught to do something for themselves. They ought to learn to walk alone. When he said that the very elements of the most sacred rites of the Church had to be paid for out of the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners he need add not another word. He believed that a much healthier state of things would result if the measures of his right hon. Friend were carried into effect, and that the ministers who were really deserving the good-will of their congregations would find their positions vastly improved. Instead of languishing on small stipends, with scarcely any duties to discharge, they would then find a much wider sphere of usefulness. The Home Secretary had charged the Opposition with a design to take away private endowments; but he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to show any grounds for the accusation; and the statement was opposed to the right hon. Gentleman's assertion that, while those who looked for advancement in the Church to public patronage would be for a time deprived of all promotion, the friends of lay patrons would enjoy all the advantages of the existing system. The fact was that the Bill would necessarily and properly reserve all private rights. Again, it was said that there would be danger to the English Church if the Church in Ireland were disestablished; but to his mind they were not the friends of the English Church who propounded that argument. No one could believe that the abolition of the State Church that was kept up for the benefit of a small and wealthy minority of the people of Ireland, involved the destruction of the State Church that was deeply rooted in the affections of the people of England. They were no friends of the English Church who advised them to confide its fate to the same bark which the Irish Church was now sailing in, even though it might for the moment carry the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his fortunes. This Bill had been brought forward, not by the enemies of the Church, but by some of its best friends—by men who had a conscientious conviction that the time had come when religious equality ought to be established once and for ever in Ireland. For that reason he had supported the measure. It had commended itself to the understanding of Parliament and — notwithstanding the prophecies of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—to the sentiments of the country, in which he and his friends had entirely failed to evoke the spirit of a "No Popery" cry.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE contended that those who sat on that (the Ministerial) side of the House were justified in the resistance which they were prepared to offer to the Bill. No battle was hopeless until it was lost, and if the decision of the House was against the Irish Church that decision would be reversed by the country. He believed that the main reason which had induced the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) to bring forward the measure was the emergency of party. He confessed that it was with surprise he heard the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State say that the question of the Regium Donum had never been considered by the Cabinet. For himself, he was prepared to stand by the Irish Church, and he was equally prepared to affirm that the Regium Donum was justly granted to Presbyterians in Ireland, and that they would have a fair claim to compensation if it were withdrawn. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had spoken strongly against the anomalies of the Irish Church, on the ground that it was highly paid, that its members were few, and its abuses great. But on more than one occasion he had ventured to bring under the right hon. Gentleman's notice that, whatever might be the case in some parts of Ireland, in Ulster, at all events, the state of things was very different, and to that he had never received any answer. He had got a detailed account of the revenue from every source of every parish in Ulster, and the number of the Church population in each, and he would state to the House the results in the several dioceses. In the diocese of Armagh and Clogher the total revenue of the Established Church in 1861 was £82,922, the Church population 150,778. In Derry and Raphoe the total revenue was £56,252, the Church population 65,951. In Down, Connor, and Dromore the total revenue was £44,783, the Church population was 153,467; and in Kilmore the revenue was £27,277, and the Church population 31,196. Summing up these figures the result was that in Ulster the revenue of the Established Church amounted altogether to £211,234, the Church population to 401,392, the number of clergy was 684, the average endowment £308, and the average flock of each clergyman 580. That did not include the Presbyterians. These facts had not been and could not be answered. Why, then, should Ulster be included in this Bill, and appointments to livings in that part of Ireland suspended? As to the compensation to be given to the clergy, were not the congregations also interested, and ought not every individual who enjoyed advantages from the present state of thing to receive compensation? How the right hon. Gentleman could estimate the amount of compensation for life-interests at three-fifths of the value of the capital of the property he could not understand, for in twenty or thirty years the bulk of the property would be altogether diverted. If, indeed, he had proposed to allocate a certain portion of the revenues in accordance with the wants of the population, and that where adequate congregations existed there should not be total disendowment, he could have understood the estimate. With regard to the voluntary system, it was very well in theory; but it would not work except in the large towns and where there were numerous congregations. The members of the Established Church scattered here and there over Ireland would not be able to keep up their congregations, and a Protestant family placed among a population to a certain extent unfriendly, and having little chance of communication with clergymen or members of its own faith, would either remove to the large towns, or, which was more likely, would be absorbed among the Roman Catholic population. It being agreed on all hands that the question was to be definitively decided by the country and by a new Parliament, it was not just to suspend the entire operations of the Church, and to condemn it by anticipation, when the ultimate verdict might be different. It was not worth doing this for the sake of, perhaps, one bishopric and a few small livings, for the Report of the Commission, when it appeared, would show how miserable the great proportion of the livings were, and would surprise those who had heard of the wealth of the Establishment. He did not believe the measure would be productive of peace, and he protested against it because it would substitute Papal supremacy for the supremacy of the Crown; because it would unjustly confiscate the property of the Church ; because it would excite illusory hopes on the part of the Roman Catholic population, leading to disappointment and disaffection ; because it would virtually abrogate the Union ; because the voluntary system was an impossibility, being inadequate and unsuitable to the wants of Ireland ; and, lastly, because so sweeping a scheme ought to be accompanied by a definite plan showing how the confiscated property was to be dealt with.

MR. LIDDELL admitted that there was some force in the ingenious argument that the Bill might be supported by those who wished simply for modifications in the Irish Church ; but, its avowed purpose being disestablishment and disendowment, he must strenuously oppose it. The right hon. Gentleman had expressed a hope that the other House would be guided by an enlightened prudence in dealing with this Bill. Now, he hoped they would be guided by the dictates of principle, and would not forget the duty they owed as an important branch of a Protestant Legislature to a Protestant people. The right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished disciple of a distinguished school of politicians, against whom his (Mr. Liddell's) only complaint was that they had shown themselves at times too apt to sacrifice principle to that species of political prudence called expediency, and he thought the latter consideration had weighed with the right hon. Gentleman and had made him forget Protestant principles. Nobody believed that this question would be finally settled by the present Parliament. All admitted that it must be remitted to the new constituencies. Surely, then, these discussions were a sheer waste of time, and this charge, he thought, the right hon. Gentleman had quite failed to rebut. The right hon. Gentleman had restated to-night an argument already used by him—he had said that he was surprised at the friends of the Church expressing alarm at the prospect before them in the event of disestablishment. But, was it surprising that apprehension should be felt that the Church of a scattered minority should be unable to maintain itself ? He opposed this measure on three clear and distinct grounds, that the separation of the Irish Church from the State would be unjust, unwise, and unnecessary. It was unjust, because nothing would persuade him that, under the specious pretext of doing justice to Ireland, they ought to inflict an act of gross injustice upon a very considerable portion of the inhabitants of Ireland. No man, and no body of men, were entitled to do evil that good might come. If it was wrong to maintain the Established Church in that country, it was a wrong which had been sanctioned and consecrated by the traditions of 300 years. He believed that the Bill was unwise, because the action of certain leading statesmen opposite could not fail to evoke among the people of England a feeling of hostility against their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. It was all very well to accuse the Ministry of raising a "No Popery" cry, but those who really evoked that cry and the evil passions which accompanied it were the promoters of the Bill. He maintained, in the third place, that the measure was unnecessary. He had lived in Ireland, and he did not believe that the people of that country—and he spoke more particularly of the peasantry—had any strong feeling in their minds against the Established Church. It was no doubt very easy for their spiritual guides to get up a momentary feeling, and cause strong expressions to be used against the Establishment, but there was no deep-rooted sentiment of animosity, such as was sometimes assumed to prevail. The Opposition were exceedingly unanimous in supporting this first attack upon the Irish branch of the Protestant Establishment, but did they expect their unanimity long to continue ? What were they going to do with the endowments when they got them ? That question had never been answered. The right hon. Gentleman had been very cautious in his statements on this subject ; but the Opposition were like an army who were attacking a strong fortress—to succeed in the assault they were compelled to stand shoulder to shoulder—but who would find it difficult to maintain their discipline when the fortress was carried, and the troops disposed to divide the plunder. He regretted that the great party to which he (Mr. Liddell) belonged were in Office when such a measure was before the House, because he believed their power of obstruction would be much greater if they were in Opposition. He must express the doubt he felt that if hon. Gentlemen opposite had been on those Benches, the question would ever have been introduced in its present form, or the present sweeping proposals enunciated. He was one of those who held that extensive modifications were necessary in the Irish Church, and the Government unquestion-ably entertained a similar opinion, as appeared from the Amendment and the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He did not believe that the Government would propose to retain anything which could be called an abuse in the Established Church of Ireland. If the clergy failed in their duty, which he did not believe, let them be recalled to a sense of it, or if in certain places there were no congregations, then let its limits be contracted. But why destroy the Irish Church because our co-religionists were in a minority, and were scattered far and wide over the country? On these grounds he cordially opposed the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and he regretted that a different mode of settling this exceedingly difficult question had not been attempted. It was perhaps rather late in the day to talk of the endowment of the Roman Catholic priesthood, because it was assumed by Gentlemen on both sides that the Roman Catholics would not accept it for their clergy. But the offer had not yet been fairly made, and he must question whether if an offer had thus been made it would have been refused. If that had been done thirty years ago it would have brought peace to Ireland and to England. But the dissensions that prevailed in both countries would only be aggravated by the present measure. When he remembered that the band which had joined in the attack on the Church was composed of parties who entertained widely different views amongst themselves, and who were only united to accomplish, from various motives, a work of destruction, he could not doubt that when the question of dealing with the endowments came — if it ever came — to be considered, the unanimity which was now so remarkable would disappear at once, and perhaps for ever. He should cordially record his vote against this measure, regarding it as the first step in a violent, unscrupulous, and unnecessary attack on the Irish Church.

MR. SYNAN: I cannot but feel, as every Member of the House must by this time feel, that it is very difficult to offer anything new on the subject under discussion, and that it is most wearisome to hear the same statements, the same expressions of opinion, and the same arguments repeated. I shall, however, in the little I have to say confine myself as much as possible to observations in reply to the hon. Member for Londonderry, and the hon. Member for Northumberland, and perhaps I may commence with the concluding statements of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. He said that if Her Majesty's present Government had remained in their old places in the Opposition they could have defended the Irish Church more effectually than they could now that they were opposite. Well, if on the Treasury Bench they can offer a less effectual resistance to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire than they could in Opposition, the evident conclusion is that the sooner they go into Opposition the sooner will their defence of the Church become effective, which it is not likely to be so long as they prefer remaining on the Treasury Bench. I think that is a fair conclusion from the argument of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman said further that he believed Her Majesty's Government had the interest of the Irish Church so deeply at heart that they would be ready to make for it any sacrifice they consistently could. Well, if they are prepared to make a sacrifice for the Irish Church, what sacrifice could be less for patriotic men than to cross the floor of the House, for the sake of being able to make a vigorous defence of the Church from the Opposition Benches? I am sorry that not more occupants of the Treasury Bench were present to hear that advice tendered to them; but perhaps they may nevertheless be convinced by an argument whose strength I have never known surpassed. The hon. Gentleman has supported his argument on the present occasion by something which, to me, at all events, partakes of the nature of a paradox. He says that the Church Establishment in Ireland ought to be maintained because it is the Church of a poor minority. He tells us, also, that having lived for some time in Ireland, he is very intimately acquainted with that part of Her Majesty's dominions. I am sorry the hon. Gentleman knows so little of Ireland, as he shows he does; but I, coming from Ireland, and certainly knowing my country and my countrymen well, know that the Irish Church is the Church of as rich a minority as any minority of any country in the world. It is the Church of a minority; but the minority comprises nearly all the landed interest of the country, and to a great extent the proprietors of the mercantile wealth of Ireland. The Irish Church had been described as the Church of a small minority; but admitting the facts as peculiarly distinguishing its members, it is paradoxical that it should be urged as an argument in favour of an Establishment. But that is not the only argument the hon. Gentleman has addressed to us ; for he, as well as the hon. Member for Londonderry, has rested his case upon this, that the Irish Church is at all events the Church of a scattered population — and the principles upon which Church Establishments were to be supported now and hereafter is this, that wherever there is a scattered population, be it rich or be it poor, there it is the duty of the Government to establish a Church to teach its religion to the scattered population. May I ask the hon. Member for Londonderry what is to become of the scattered Presbyterian population of the North of Ireland? Why has not the Government provided a Church for them to teach the tenets of their religion? And what is to become of the scattered Roman Catholic population in England? Why is there not a separate Establishment for the purpose of teaching them also? Well, then, I think I may leave this argument to answer itself. Church Establishments are evidently not founded on any reasons of such a nature. They were institutions the expediency of which was to be determined by every people for itself ; that people fully represented in its Government, expressing their opinions deliberately and freely, and saying whether they wished to have a Church for the teaching of a particular religion or not, or whether they are so earnest, so zealous, and so religious in their sentiments themselves that they would support their religion and their pastors. I say, then, let the zeal of the Protestant Church supply the means for providing its own religious teaching, and let not the zeal of the other religious denominations be called upon to supply it. The argument which the hon. Gentleman has used is not an argument that ought to be addressed to the House as the foundation of a Church Establishment in any country whatever. But the supporters of Her Majesty's Ministers are not satisfied with indulging in the paradoxical arguments to which I have referred ; but they adduce others from which there ensues a perfect reductio ad absurdum. Thus the hon. Member for Londonderry refers to the case of Ulster, and asks what is to become of the Protestant population of that province, where, he says, there is only a sum of £50,000 available for the religious requirements of 100,000 persons, or an average of 10s. a head to support religious teaching in the province? Why, if the same amount per head was allowed to the Protestants of England the sum which they would have at their disposal annually for religious purposes would be £10,000,000 instead of £3,000,000. If then, as the hon. Member for Londonderry contended, the Protestants of Ulster had not funds of adequate amount at their disposal for religious purposes, it followed that the funds of the English Established Church ought to be increased to at least £10,000,000 annually, and that instead of being, as it was, something like 2s. 6d. per head of the Church community, it should be increased to 10s. The favourite remedy which the Government advocates in these circumstances is that known as "levelling up ;" but how much would the Catholics of Ireland be likely to receive under the operation of any such principle? How much was paid by foreign countries for religious purposes where the "levelling up" principle had been adopted? Why, in France the amount was 1s. a head, and in Saxony it was 6d. There was little probability, at any rate, that they would, even in a financial point of view, be so well off as the Protestants of Ulster, whose 10s. a head for religious purposes the hon. Member for Londonderry thought not excessive. Well, when we see such arguments as those adduced in support of the Church of Ireland, is it not clear to the comprehension of any man of common sense, of any disinterested person who has not allowed himself to be influenced by the "No Popery" cry, that the cause is really indefensible whose advocates resort to arguments so ridiculous? And here I would leave the case that has been attempted to be set up on behalf of the opponents of the Bill ; but that I desire, before doing so, to advert to the appeal which has been made to one's feelings by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. Several hon. Gentlemen turn on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire with the charge that it is we (the Opposition) who have evoked this "No Popery" spirit, that has set class against class and sect against sect in this country. Well, in reference to this charge I will say this—that if the demand for justice causes those who maintain injustice to excite the spirit of "No Popery" for the purpose of defeating the claims of justice, those are the men who evoke the mischievous spirit, and not the men who demand that the injustice shall cease ; it is the spirit of evil, ever ready to prompt to animosity and violence, that is responsible, and not the spirit of good, which calls for the performance and fulfilment of what is just, and commends itself to the appreciation of honest men. But that the "No Popery" spirit has been evoked I do not believe; nor do I believe that it will be evoked with success, as it has nothing to support it but the intense bigoted feeling which exists in some parts of the country, and which at one time manifests itself in burning down of houses and chapels, and at another in the sale of obscene publications, upon which the condemnation of a tribunal has been pronounced. It is yourselves that you ought to charge with any kindling of religious animosity. If it has been aroused at all it has been aroused by you; and upon your own heads will be the consequences. But I believe that this feeling which you say has been evoked is only an alarm, got up for the purpose of frightening those who, whether in this House or out of it, support a just cause against formidable opponents. As the great English poet has said, "the fear of death is most in apprehension;" so I believe just in the same way that this fear of the destruction of the Irish Church exists most in apprehension, and if you did destroy it there would be no ground for the fear, the alarm, or the apprehension which you profess as the result of such a measure; but, on the contrary, that there would be laid in Ireland the foundations of peace and order. And that brings me to another argument used by the hon. Member for Northumberland—namely, that the peasantry of Ireland did not feel any interest in this question whatever.

MR. LIDDELL: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. What I said was, that they cherished no antagonism to the Church.

MR. SYNAN: In that opinion I can fully agree with the hon. Gentleman. I know my country well; and he is right in saying that no class in Ireland felt animosity against the Church Establishment. What they do feel, however—and what they would be the veriest slaves on the face of the earth if they did not feel—is the inferiority of their position. That they do most deeply feel; and if they did not feel it, the iron of slavery would have entered their souls. They feel the rule of Protestant ascendancy above them; the foundation of that ascendancy is the Established Church of Ireland, and until you throw that barrier that separates one class of the population from another you cannot lay the foundation of peace and prosperity in Ireland. The Irish Church Establishment is the root of many of the social ills that afflict the country; it is the cause of its present insecurity and the origin of class hatred; and I say that the first step to be taken for the purpose of getting rid of the difficulties of the Irish question is that of disestablishing and disendowing it, while the first step to disestablishment and disendowment is to pass the Suspensory Bill now before the House. In conclusion, let me only say further that I am astonished, after the debates which have taken place and the Resolutions that have been passed in this House, Her Majesty's Government should be opposing, by all means in their power, a Bill which was the necessary consequence of steps already taken. Upon what principle is it you adopted the first Resolution after it had been carried by a large majority of this House? Upon what principle is it that you adopted the second and third Resolutions without a division, and as the natural and necessary corollary of the first—and yet refuse to allow the Suspensory Bill, which is merely intended to carry out the object of the second Resolution, in the same manner as the second and third Resolutions carried out or flowed from the first—and yet, I say, refuse to allow the Bill to receive a second reading? Will you answer that plain and simple question? Upon what principle I say do you oppose it? Surely it is as much a corollary of the Resolution which was carried in the House by a majority of 65 votes as the second and third Resolutions were; and on what grounds, on what principle can you justify your hostility to a measure which appears to those out of the House to be a matter of course following necessarily upon the proceedings which we have already taken? Sir, I can only account for the opposition to those proceedings, taken as they have been for the pacification of Ireland, by the supposition that the Government are depending upon the chapter of accidents. Her Majesty's Government have given opposition to every step taken in this matter, not because they think they can stop that which they know must necessarily pass—not because they believe they have any hope of defeating the Bill or resisting successfully the spirit which is now abroad, and which calls for the disestablishment of the Irish Church; but for the purpose of taking advantage of anything that may arise to trip up those who are carrying on these proceedings, and for the purpose—in case a General Election should take place — of appealing to the bigoted feelings of a class of people in this country, and of raising the “No Popery” cry throughout the length and breadth of the land. But, Sir, I am satisfied that in this House no chapter of accidents will enable them to avail themselves of that advantage for which they look; and I hope the good sense of the English people is too strong to be influenced by appeals to the “No Popery” cry of former days, which did sufficient mischief in its time, and which alienated not alone one portion of the people of this country from another, but placed the people of England and of Ireland in direct antagonism. Sir, I tell hon. Members opposite that this is not a safe line of action and of argument for them to adopt. It is not safe for them to tell the Irish people that it is their fears for the English Church that leads them to maintain the Church Establishment in Ireland. It is not safe to tell the Irish people that it is for the purpose of preserving the Protestant Church in this country that a wrong is to be perpetuated in Ireland, and that the justice which they demand is to be denied them. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Liddell) said that a wrong was not to be done in order that good might come from it. Is not the hon. Gentleman running in the face of his own argument? [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] Is he not saying that a wrong must be done to the Irish people in the maintenance of the Church Establishment—the Church of a rich minority—in order that there may be no attack made upon the Church of England? Is that not doing a wrong in order that what the hon. Gentleman thinks is a good may come from it? Well, if it is, upon what ground can such a course—even upon the arguments used at the other side—be justified? You have often charged the Roman Catholic Church with doing wrong that good might result from it. The charge was false—but now you are admittedly doing that which you condemn, and you are telling the Irish people that you are doing so. And do you think when you are sowing the wind in that fashion that you will not reap the whirlwind? I tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that it is their duty not to sow the wind, and their interest not to reap the whirlwind; and I call upon them from considerations of interest, and above all, of duty, to join with us in doing an act of justice to the Irish people, and to aid us at this side of the House in carrying a measure which will have the effect of establishing peace and tranquillity in Ireland.

MR. VERNER said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) appeared to have given himself over to the Ultramontanes and the voluntaries, who arrived by cross roads at one point—namely, the disestablishment of the Irish Church. It had been for centuries the object of the Church of Rome to humiliate England, because of the high and honourable position assumed by her as the champion of truth against error. He knew that for saying this he should be put down—as a noble Lord expressed it in a late debate—as an uncivilized being using the bludgeon of argument. As such he was prepared to stand there. He contended that at present religious equality was enjoyed in Ireland. Practically, there was no prohibition to the entertainment and exercise of the peculiar views of every religious sect in that country. Would Roman Catholic ascendancy be equally tolerant? If they did away with the privileges pertaining to the outward position and manifestation of the Protestant Established Church, would they not at the same time do away with the fundamental principle of the Monarchy, and upheave the pillars of the Constitution? He might quote the testimony of Roman Catholic laymen upon this point. That given by the late Right Hon. Anthony Blake was peculiarly strong. He stated before a Committee of the House of Commons that the Established Church was rooted in the Constitution, being established by the fundamental laws of the realm; and that, in his opinion, it could not be disturbed without danger to the general securities for liberty, property, and order in this country. He could not regard this measure as other than an infringement of the Act of Union—a positive breach of faith, unjust to English as well as Irish Protestants. But the Church of Ireland did not rest on the Act of Union alone, for it had been united ecclesiastically with the Church of England ever since the year 1172. There appeared to be many on the Benches opposite anxious to prove that the proceedings of Parliament were a farce; for they had been told that the most solemn Acts of the Legislature were little better than waste paper, and nothing was binding to-morrow that was done to-day. But this was a two-edged sword, which it was dangerous to use. Apart from what might be called the statistical argument, what else was relied upon by the supporters of the Bill might be condensed into the convenient phrase of "Justice to Ireland." That was the cry of the Liberals; and what did they intend to do? They had done wrong to Roman Catholics in former times, and they now thought they could wipe out that stain by doing injustice to the Protestants of Ireland, who numbered 1,250,000, and were the best educated, most energetic, and most truly loyal portion of the community. It was said that the Irish Church, as a missionary Church had been a failure. But what had been its history? Conflicts had arisen between the priests and missionaries; Scripture readers were assaulted, and fights and riots had occurred even over the graves of converts. The Protestant incumbent was not a missionary among a hostile population; but a minister devoting his time to the interests of his own flock, and being, at the same time, respected by the Roman Catholics of his district. A proof that the clergy of the Irish Church had well performed their duty was to be found in the fact that the number of Churchmen in Ireland was greater now, in proportion to the population, than in 1834. If the clergy had not succeeded in converting the Roman Catholics, at least they had guarded the Protestant population of the South and West from the proselytizing activity of the Irish priests. If the present blunder should be completed, and the Church should be disestablished, the people would still hear the sound of the Church bell; and the minister, converted into a missionary, would be in their midst. And the expectant peasant would not be one penny the richer, for the machinery which the Church of Rome had placed in the hands of the priest would compel the peasant to pay for the support of his Church as he did at present. If the Irish Church was disestablished what would follow? It had been said that the liberality of Protestants would keep the lamp lighted even when the number of Churchmen was too small to support a church and a clergyman. He endorsed that opinion, and believed that if the Bill were to pass, those societies which undertook missionary work in Ireland would receive £1 where they now received only 1s. In every parish in the South and West a missionary would be placed. This result, considering how missionaries were treated in Ireland—one having been stoned and almost murdered—would hardly be agreeable to those who declared that they desired to see religious peace. What the people of Ireland really wanted was some substantial measure of justice, which would relieve their condition and elevate their character; but beneficial effects of that nature were not to be obtained by making the country the battlefield of party, or by the action of those who had brought it to its present state of degradation. If hon. Members desired to promote peace in Ireland, he called on them to beware of adopting a measure which, while it stung and outraged the feelings of every true Protestant, could not but disappoint the Roman Catholic population, and prove a fertile source of irritation and heartburning on all sides.

MR. WHALLEY said, that, in reply to the hon. Member for Lisburn (Mr. Verner), he would advance two or three reasons for supporting the second reading of this Bill. He maintained that nothing could be more unsound, in the apprehension of every lawyer who had studied our Constitution, than the view of those who held that the Church of England and Ireland formed any part of that Constitution. That Church was as distinct and separate from the Constitution itself as was the army and navy, or any other institution of the country. The Established Church in England and in Ireland was nothing more than an experiment with the view of encouraging what he might call a religion of home growth instead of a religion connected with and recognizing an external authority. The principle of our Constitution was that no foreign Prince, prelate, or potentate should exact tithe, or toll, or exercise any interference in this realm, and to that the Crown was pledged; and, but for the weak props and buttresses by which, after the Revolution of 1688, it was sought to bolster up that artificial and anomalous institution, the Established Church in England and in Ireland, that institution could have no position or strength in the country. In confirmation of his statement that the Church was separate from the Constitution, he would refer to the fact that, in 1405, 1410, and 1414, the House of Commons declared that it was contrary to the Constitution that money should be applied by the State for the purpose of supporting any religion; and they also declared that all ecclesiastical endowments should be devoted to the service of the State. In 1423, household suffrage was done away with, and the 40s. freeholds came into existence. The wars of York and Lancaster followed; and during that period the House was muzzled. Then came the Reformation, which was a compromise between the people and the clergy; and a portion of the ecclesiastical property was applied to secular purposes, and another portion was given to the Established Church, which was founded as an experiment, merely for the purpose of maintaining the clergy who would recognize as their head the Sovereign of the country. Now, that experiment broke down in the time of Charles I., again in that of William III.; and it had broken down in these times. In the words of the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), he said, "Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" If they could not withstand foreign authority, if they could not prevent Popery—the greatest curse of humanity—from assuming power, he said—Give way, and fight with these weapons no more. He wanted no Establishment; the Protestant Church could support itself. He believed that there would be no difficulty in providing for Protestant worship in even the most scattered and remote parts of Ireland—no more difficulty than was found in Wales, and there every nook and corner had its church or chapel of ease. He had come to the conclusion that, as the system of the priests had failed to protect this country against the Roman Catholics, the Church ought to be a voluntary institution under the banner of free trade. The Church in Ireland was no grievance to Ireland; and he, for one, regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had brought forward the measure for the abolition of the Irish Church to meet the attacks of assassins. But they must now depend on the people and the system of free trade, which had been so successful in our other national affairs. The parsons were dumb dogs that barked not; and the time had come when it must be seen what the people could do. The clergy of the Established Church in Ireland had failed in missionary work, which was done in that country by men like the Rev. Mr. Campbell, who went forth as a voluntary, armed only with the sling and stone of his own conscience, and who was knocked down and nearly murdered on account of his attempting to read the Bible to the people. Let them, in regard to this matter, as to several others, rely upon the mass of the people of these realms, and let the Church stand apart from artificial aid. If this were done, not only would the onflowing waves of Popery be prevented from overspreading this country, but the Church of England would go on prospering, and moulding in higher and nobler form the thought of the people. The hon. Gentleman who had recently spoken with so much vehemence against Protestant ascendancy was very much mistaken if he thought that Protestants were not going to insist on Protestant ascendancy. Protestant ascendancy was one thing, Church ascendancy another. They were certainly not going to submit to anything short of Protestant ascendancy, which meant a right to resist, even to the death, any attempt to interfere with the Government of this country on the part of any foreign Prince, prelate, or potentate; and to resist what was even more powerful than an enemy's sword, priests in their slippers, with their confessionals, and encyclicals, and all the paraphernalia of priestcraft. It was because England had, from time to time, made a stand against such attempts that she was now pre-eminent among the nations. He should be ashamed of his countrymen if he could suppose that they required State aid or support to maintain the great principle of Protestant ascendancy, civil and religious liberty. There must be some limit to the attempts which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) was making to keep together what it must be confessed was a somewhat heterogeneous party; and he (Mr. Whalley), for one, could not sacrifice the doctrine of Protestant ascendancy even for that object.

MR. KARSLAKE said, he must enter his protest against the Bill. It professed to aim only at the disestablishment of the Irish Church; but it was the opinion of many hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House that a disestablishment of what was inaccurately called the Irish Church must lead sooner or later to a disestablishment of the English Church. The truth of that warning was conclusively shown by the words uttered by the great defender of the faith who had just addressed the House. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) had told the House that he was going to vote for this Bill, because it was time to put an end to parsons of all denominations, and to establish free trade in religion. The hon. Member was an instance of the strange supporters that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had gathered around him in his attack upon the Irish branch of the United Church of England and Ireland. The speech of the hon. Member showed how enormous was the power which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had obtained over those opposite ; and it would appear that his "Open sesame !" to the heart of the hon. Member was "free trade in religion." It was asked how those who had permitted the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions of the hon. Member for South Lancashire to pass as corollaries upon the first, could object to the second reading of this Bill. But the answer was obvious. The Resolutions were mere expressions of opinion, whereas this Bill would be a positive act. It was an act which, as it seemed to him, would paralyze not only the Irish Church, but the new House of Commons. He (Mr. Karslake) did not, however, entirely agree in the opinion of the Prime Minister, that the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions should be treated merely as corollaries of the first. The 3rd Resolution was something more than a corollary of the 1st, because it tended in the direction of action. There was a difference between the present House of Commons expressing its opinions, and going so far as to prejudge a question which would have to be decided by the Reformed Parliament. He asked hon. Members, and legal Members in particular, to adduce a precedent for this Bill—a precedent for an expiring House of Commons, in a provisional state of existence, not only expressing an opinion upon a matter to be decided by a new Parliament, but prejudging it by taking legislative action. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that this Bill should pass ; was it worth while, for the purpose of saving an undefined but very moderate sum, to attempt to prejudge this question, which might be decided in an opposite direction by the new House of Commons ? It was singular to see the anxiety of hon. Gentlemen to deal with the question. How was it that, though they had been in Office for years, it had never occurred to them before to bring the subject forward. If the grievance was one that required such a hasty remedy, why had that remedy been delayed till now ? He could quite understand the position of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone). That right hon. Gentleman might to a certain extent have been trammelled by his party relations. He had always been a great admirer of the right hon. Gentleman, and he had proved his admiration, not in words but in deed ; for, at the expense of great personal inconvenience, he had gone down to vote for him as the very best Member that could be selected for his honoured University. When the right hon. Gentleman was the right hand of the most Conservative Prime Minister that had ever borne rule in this country, he might naturally abstain from raising such a question. But other Members who sat on the Opposition Benches had not been trammelled like the right hon. Gentleman. For instance, there was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe). Ever since he (Mr. Karslake) had known him, his views were destructive rather than Conservative. How was it that he, a man respected for his abilities by all, never discovered till last Easter that this was a question of urgency which demanded immediate legislation ; that "the hour and the man" had arrived ? Although hon. Gentlemen had sat here for ten or twenty years without doing anything, they were going to pass a Bill before the 1st of August. This would be for hon. Members opposite to pass a vote of censure on themselves. He thought they were bound to pay more attention to the eloquent language of their Leader. He (Mr. Karslake) was not going to blame a man for honestly changing his opinions. A man who changed his opinions, and declared openly that he had changed them without party feelings or bias, and from no desire of aggrandizement, was a far more honest man, and one more to be respected than the man who shrank from avowing the change through the fear of being charged with vacillation or with motives which were too often imputed in such cases. But he had been struck with the coincidence between the observations of the Secretary of State for the Home Department made early in the evening, and those of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, published in a certain well-known work. He had not got by heart, as perhaps he ought, a passage from the excellent book of the right hon. Gentleman, so he had put it down—

"The union is to the Church of secondary, though great, importance ; her foundations are on the holy hills ; her charter is legibly divine. She, if she should be excluded from the precincts of Government, may still fulfil all her functions, and carry them out to perfection. Her condition would be anything rather than pitiable should she once more occupy the position which she held before the reign of Constantine."

"But the State in rejecting her would actively repudiate its most solemn duty, and would, if the connection is sound, entail on itself a curse."

Now, Sir, an hon. Member asked what was the point? The point was that from such noble sentiments, expressed in such noble language, it followed that this was a question which required consideration, and that it should be kept until next year at least. This question was plainly one that ought not to be hastily decided. They ought to have full time to consider and deliberate upon it, and to bring it first before the leading men of their constituencies, and afterwards before the electors, and then they ought to determine the question with more care and consideration, if possible, than they did any others which came before them. But even were the matter ripe for legislation, the state of business was such that there was no time for entertaining a Suspensory Bill this Session. The title was happy, for its provisions kept Members on all sides of the House in a state of suspense, preventing other and more necessary legislation, while precious time was flying—

"Sed fugit interea, fugit irreparabile tempus, Singula dum capti circumvectamur amore."

There was first the Boundary Bill, then the Reform Bills, Scotch and Irish, besides the numerous little Bills of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare. Only that morning at one o'clock they had given a good deal of time to a Bill to prevent playing at pitch and toss in rustic districts. He appealed to the House not to waste further time on fruitless discussions in this most important Session.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, he hoped the House would not be induced to defer legislation on this subject to another Parliament. It was of vast importance that the hopes which had been excited in Ireland should not be disappointed by the barren result of mere abstract Resolutions. As an Irish Roman Catholic, and speaking for his Catholic fellow-subjects, he declared that, in supporting the present Motion, they were not lending themselves to any attack upon the Protestant Church or Protestant institutions of England. He had never heard of such a suggestion coming from any body or from any individual; nor had he, indeed, ever heard any argument adduced by an Irish Roman Catholic in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church which would apply equally to the English Establishment. He believed that the present condition of Ireland impaired the influence, lowered the prestige, enfeebled the strength, and, in certain contingencies, might endanger the stability of this Empire. He deeply deplored that the Premier should have lent the weight of his name to a statement so startling and unfounded as that of the alleged conspiracy for the severance of Church and State between the Irish Roman Catholics.—[An hon. MEMBER: Irish Romanists.]—Irish Romanists he called them, but he had afterwards disclaimed using the word offensively—and some nameless party in the Church. It was unfortunate that the Prime Minister of this country had been unable to give any satisfactory reason for making such a statement. If there had been such a combination Cardinal Cullen must be a party to it. The only evidence he had seen of any extraordinary combination was when the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with faces in which personal admiration was artistically blended with religious reverence, conducted the Prince of Wales to the Catholic University, where he was received by Cardinal Cullen—regarded in England as a Jesuit of the Jesuits. Why at one part of the Session was a Catholic University dangled before the eyes of the Catholics, and then, when it suited the party in power to get up a "No Popery" cry, why was the idea abandoned? But when he heard one Cabinet Minister denouncing the opinions expressed by another on an important question, he lost the faculty of being surprised. One section of the Cabinet had spent the Easter Recess in ostentatious adulation of Popery, while the Premier directed his efforts to raising the "No Popery" cry. It was inaccurately stated by the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. Dyke) that Fenianism had not been put forward by anyone in debate as a reason for the Irish Church policy of the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had distinctly put Fenianism forward as a ground for adopting a remedial policy, and rightly so, for the man would be undeserving of the name of statesman who would attempt to deal with the condition of Ireland and ignore such a question as that. Irish discontent in the hands of Gentlemen opposite was a very elastic substance. When Arms Acts and measures of repression were under discussion the situation of the country was represented as desperate; but when remedial measures were suggested Irish discontent shrank to the most limited proportions.

It was alleged that the Fenian ranks were composed merely of adventurers and Socialists, finding sympathy only among the very dregs of the Irish population. Some two or three years ago that might have been the case, but it was not now. Some of the outrages which had happened, must indeed, have been the work of ignorant, violent persons. The Clerkenwell explosion, for instance, and the attempted assassination of the Duke of Edinburgh; if, indeed, the latter were a political offence. He believed it was not. ["Oh! Oh!"] Well, he would not discuss the matter; but he believed there was not sufficient information before the country to enable them to judge. Nobody, however, to whom an opportunity had been afforded of watching the Fenian conspiracy, and the amount of discontent in Ireland, could have failed to observe that the Fenian sentiment was spreading widely and had extended into a higher grade recently than it had reached before. Among those who abstained from actively taking part in the organization, there was a wide and increasing sympathy with the principle which it avowed. Passing from the subject of Fenianism, there was a symptom of the times about which he wished to say a few words — namely, the declaration of the Limerick priests. That was a remarkable document, drawn up by a man of conspicuous ability, and was daily receiving adherence from those who avowed their belief that the Imperial Parliament was either unable or unwilling to cope with the difficulties of Ireland. But Irishmen who had confidence in Parliament looked with intense anxiety to the result of that debate, and with unspeakable alarm to the prospect of this Session terminating as other Sessions had done, without the passing of any measures, but measures of repression, such as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. The suggestion that they ought to wait for the Report of the Commission on the Irish Church was regarded by Irishmen with ridicule not unmixed with contempt. For what were they asked to do but to wait for the result of a Commission, the members of which were invested with no power to deal with the evil, and who, if they were, notoriously would not exercise it? But then it was said the Established Church in Ireland had no connection with the unhappy political and social condition of the country. All he would say on the subject was that the Irish Church was best described as the monster grievance of Ireland. Other questions urgently demanded a settlement, but the Church question lay deep at the roots of the social system, aggravating and embittering every other source of discontent. There had been an historical quarrel in Ireland between the natives and a colony of invaders; and under these circumstances the devotion of the national Revenues to the exclusive use of the Church of the alien colonists not only kept alive the memory of past feuds, but was a living monument of foreign conquest and native subjugation. It had been said that it was necessary to maintain the Irish Establishment in order to preserve the Church in England. But if that was so, what stronger argument could be used with the people of Ireland in favour of total separation? The Secretary of State for the Home Department stated, on the authority of a lawyer, that the effect of disendowing the Irish Church would be to repeal the legislative Union between the two countries. He (Mr. Serjeant Barry) could only say that he did not envy the Judge who had to listen to the lawyer who made that statement. One of the four canons of opposition to this Bill employed by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was that in assailing the temporalities of the Church they were striking at the rights of private property. He denied altogether the analogy between the title of a private person to his estate and that of the Church to its temporalities, and for this reason—that in every civilized community every member of that community, as the very condition of his existence, acquired certain rights; but the Church had only an existence derived from the law; it was not, in fact, a corporation, and, even if it were, a corporation had no existence outside the law, and the law which had created could destroy—which had given could take away. He hoped that Parliament would adopt that Bill, which would be a first step towards ameliorating the political condition of Ireland. He did not mean to say that it would remove all the sources of discontent in that country; but it would strike a deadly blow at the root of that discontent. He believed that the passing of the measure would go far towards creating in Ireland a healthy tone of public opinion. It would inspire the people of that country with confidence in the United Parliament, and it would be a large advance towards making the Union between the two countries, not as it was at present, a forced political connection, but a real Union, maintained by a mutual sense of equality, by reciprocal good-will, and a community of interests.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had argued that the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions were corollaries of the 1st, and that this measure ought to be accepted as a corollary of the Resolutions. But it was one thing to pass an abstract Resolution and another thing to introduce a measure of active legislation. A Suspensory Bill assumed that the other House of Parliament as well as that House would disendow and disestablish the Church of Ireland, but he trusted that was an event which never would occur. The Government did not believe that the people of the United Kingdom would consent to the disendowment or disestablishment of the Established Church in Ireland, and were quite prepared to appeal from this moribund House of Commons to a higher tribunal—the Commons of the United Kingdom: and he was sure this appeal would not be in vain, whether it were made to the present or the new constituencies. Burke, writing to Sir Hercules Langrish upon the Union, said—

“The people of Great Britain might be depended upon in cases of any real danger to aid the Government of Ireland against any wicked attempts to shake the security of the happy constitution in Church and State.”

He, as an Irish Member, now confidently appealed to the Protestants of Great Britain for protection against this wicked attempt. He would not on this occasion argue the question as to the desirability of continuing or ending the Irish Establishment; he merely wished to show how impolitic it would be to pass the Bill precipitately. It behoved them to remember the safeguards which the wisdom of our ancestors had placed as buttresses for the Irish Church. He referred to the Act of Settlement, the Coronation Oath, and the pledges which were given when the Emancipation Act was passed. He did not pretend, however, that these were beyond the power of the Legislature to touch. He conceded that Parliament was able to rescind its enactments, and that the Coronation Oath was in the nature of a contract. But these were important and solemn considerations in another point of view, and he asked the House to pause before it scattered to the winds all that the wisdom of statesmen such as Mr. Pitt and Sir Robert Peel had devised for the protection of the Irish Church. Another point he wished to impress upon the House was that the movement against the Irish Church was, indeed, a direct attack upon the Established Church of the United Kingdom. It was only necessary to think for a moment who supported the right hon. Gentleman, to be assured of this. First, there were the Friends of the voluntary system, who were opposed to all Establishments; then came the Roman Catholics, who were unquestionably opposed to the Protestant Establishment of England. [“No, no!”] Who could deny that when Roman Catholic Members were continually asking for religious equality, in calling for religious equality they really called for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England. If religious equality were attempted in England, it must be either by levelling up or levelling down. Were they going to level up by raising the Roman Catholic hierarchy in this country? If not, they must level down and disendow the National Church of this country. The right hon. Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson) had once said upon this subject—

“We should never lose sight of this, and it is the very corner-stone upon which the Establishment rests, that it is not the ‘Church of Ireland’ at all, but that it is the United Church of England and Ireland—and that, as such, it is to be dealt with. And let no man dare to bring forward in Parliament any Motion relating to the revenues or property of the Church without including in it that of which we are a part—the Church of England.”

But the right hon. Member for South Lancashire had dared this very thing, and his right hon. Friend was strongly supporting him. Another reason for postponement was the state of complete darkness in which the House was left as to what was to be done with the funds of the Church when they had been taken possession of. The author of the Bill had said they were to be applied to Irish purposes and not to the clergy of Ireland of any denomination. The Bishop Moriarty differed from the right hon. Gentleman, and claimed the spoil for the Roman Catholic clergy, and he himself could not see what should be done with the money if it were not applied to the Roman Catholic Church. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) seemed to have rather a curious opinion on the subject, and his view appeared to be different from that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. Speaking on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) he had said—

"I will go no further, but to say that whatever is done, if a single sixpence is given by Parliament in lieu of the Maynooth Grant or in lieu of the Regium Donum, it must be given on these terms only—and on that matter I think Earl Russell has committed a great error—that it becomes the absolute property of the Catholics, or the Episcopalians, or of the Presbyterians; it must be as completely their property as the property of the great Wesleyan body in this country, or of the Independents, or of the Baptists, belongs to those bodies. It must be property which Parliament can never pretend to control, or regulate, or withdraw."—[3 Hansard, exc. 1860.]

Thus the several Churches of Ireland would, in fact, become endowed Churches, with property to be held by them exempt from the control of Parliament. This sounds like an admission that ecclesiastical property might exist, so that Parliament could not withdraw it. He should like to know what securities more solemn, binding, or effectual could be proposed for Church property than the Act of Union with Ireland; yet the hon. Member was joined with his Friends in endeavouring to set it aside. If property might be held by a religious community exempt from the control of Parliament, there was no such body with claims equal to those of the Protestant Established Church of Ireland. It had been charged against the supporters of the Ministry that they had offered no arguments in support of the Irish Church; he replied that none against it had come from the Opposition. All the assertions of the Opposition depended on one proposition which had never been established; he referred to the statement that Irish discontent arose from the existence of the Irish Establishment. The hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Serjeant Barry) had said that was the root of Irish discontent. This he denied; but he allowed that the cause as stated by the hon. and learned Member was historical. The cause of Irish discontent was that the races had not mixed, and that the conquering race held not only the property of the Church, but had divided the property of the Irish chieftains. And indeed the complaint on the ground of the Church property seems futile when it was remembered that it was taken from the old priests of Ireland in the time of Henry II., and not at the time of the Reformation. On these grounds, he counselled the House to postpone legislation until the country had had an opportunity of declaring its opinion on the subject.

MR. MURPHY said, that, as a Roman Catholic Member representing a not unimportant constituency, he was anxious to express his views on the subject. He wished to treat it in its political and social aspect, as distinguished from its polemical and religious side. He could assure the House that he expressed the views of every Roman Catholic gentleman of education in Ireland when he said that the disestablishment of the Anglican Church in Ireland was not supported by them as an aggression on the religion of their fellow-countrymen, or for the aggrandizement of any Church. The question, as it presented itself to their minds, was, whether the Anglican Establishment was to be continued in Ireland as the Church of the minority of the nation, and as a type of hereditary political ascendancy, created by statesmen in days gone by, altogether for political purposes, and without reference to the religious feelings of the people, the only real basis of such an institution. That Church created a discontent which was widely spread amongst the masses, and permeated every stratum of society in Ireland; and for that reason all the soundest politicians and deepest thinkers of this and preceding times had come to the conclusion that all its political and sectarian ascendancy should be abolished. The stock argument against this proposition was, that the Irish Church had been so inseparably united with the Church of England by the Act of Union, that if you attempted to infringe the temporalities of the Irish Church, you necessarily must deal with those of the Church of England. The late Lord Plunket—a man of whom every Irishman might be proud—expressed, in the year 1835, when the same question was raised upon the Appropriation Clause, the opinion that the partial appropriation of the Irish Church property to educational purposes was not in the slightest degree a violation of the principles of Protestantism, or of the Act of Union, and that the 5th Article of that Act, while it identified the Churches of England and Ireland, with regard to worship, doctrine, and discipline, did not identify them with respect to temporalities, for otherwise the whole system of composition for tithes was in violation of it. It had been urged that this Church, having been consecrated by ages, should not be disturbed; but the House would recollect that Lord Melbourne once said that it was never contemplated to have in Ireland a Roman Catholic population and a Protestant clergy; that the intention was the eradication of the Roman Catholic and the substitution of the Protestant faith; and that that policy having been abandoned by the repeal of the Penal Laws, an opposite course ought now to be pursued. It was said that the Protestant people of England and Ireland were unanimously opposed to any meddling with the revenues of the Irish Church; but he could not agree in that opinion, and as an instance that the assertion was not true, he might refer to a meeting in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, held three weeks ago in the city he had the honour to represent—Cork. The meeting was called in compliance with a requisition signed by upwards of 10,000 persons. A Protestant Lord Lieutenant of the county was chairman, and the speakers (amongst others) were Protestant noblemen and persons of the highest position in the county. It was not true that all members of the Established Church in Ireland believed the present position of the Church subserved the interests of true religion. With respect to that, he might state he received a letter recently from an eminent Protestant clergyman in Ireland, in which he said—

“I have no desire to see the connection between Church and State in Ireland continued for one week longer.”

In conclusion, he trusted the House would inaugurate a new and happy era in Ireland by passing the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire.

LORD ELCHO: I can assure the House that I shall trouble them but for a few moments, and in doing so I shall not attempt to follow the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Serjeant Barry) in his argument as to whether there is a crisis in Ireland sufficient to justify the course of policy pursued by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), or whether the policy of the right hon. Gentleman will or will not put an end to dissatisfaction in Ireland, or will maintain or do away with the Union. On that point I hold a very strong opinion, which I have ventured to express before—that logically this Bill leads to the disestablishment of all Churches or to the repeal of the Union. Now, I am opposed to this Bill, because it appears to me to be a stretch of the power of a majority to force this legislation through this House. It is a stretch in this way—I do not believe it to be necessary, and, certainly, such a course is unprecedented; it is logically the result of the circumstance that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South

Mr. Murphy

Lancashire has spoken so strongly against the policy of bringing forward an abstract Resolution. Having so spoken, Sir, it seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman feels himself bound to bring forward this Bill, lest it should be said that he had moved an abstract Resolution which could produce no results. I shall oppose this measure with my vote on the same ground that I opposed the Resolutions which were brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman. Both the Bill and the Resolutions have been brought forward on the ground of religious equality. Now, I deny the possibility, under our present Constitution, of establishing the principle of religious equality. You may have the principle of religious toleration, to any extent; but the principle of religious equality, I maintain, directly, logically, and I believe practically, does lead, and will lead, to the disestablishment of the Church in Scotland and in England, and, as I have stated, to the repeal of the Union. I have but a very few words to say upon this subject, but I hope they will be very much to the point. The hon. Member for Dungarvan, with a view to calming the apprehensions of those who desire to see the continuance of the connection between Church and State, says that the party with whom he is connected—the Irish Roman Catholics, and, as I take it, the Roman Catholics of England also—do not look in any way to further legislation on this question of Church Establishment—that no ancillary measures are intended—that they do not wish to attack the Established Church of England or our Protestant institutions. Now, Sir, that is language which has been heard within the walls of Parliament before, and from the same quarter. It was heard forty years ago. It was heard on the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, at the time of Maynooth, and it will be heard in this House again and again till there is that religious equality which those Gentlemen who represent Roman Catholic constituencies contend can lie only in the supremacy of their Church—[“Oh, oh!”]—if not in its supremacy, at any rate in its perfect equality. Now, what does perfect equality mean? When the House was kind enough to hear me on the Resolutions I said that to establish perfect religious equality in Ireland you must throw open the Lord Lieutenancy to Roman Catholics, I said that in England you must have the Wool-sack open to Roman Catholics, and I said—or, if I did not say it I intended to say, that you must go further—you must repeal the Act of Settlement, and that the Throne of this country, if you were to have perfect religious equality, must be thrown open to Roman Catholics as well as to Protestants. That statement was no doubt laughed at at the time. It was regarded as a day-dream; but what has occurred since? This question now stands before us in a very different light from that in which it appeared last time I addressed the House. A Notice which has been given since that discussion may have escaped the attention of some hon. Members, inasmuch as it was handed to the clerks at the table instead of being publicly announced. It is a Notice given by an hon. and learned Gentleman who has been most prolific in his attempts at legislation—an hon. Gentleman who the other night brought forward a Motion with reference to a residence for Her Majesty in Ireland, and to show that this hon. Gentleman is not a mere enthusiast, to show that he is not an unreasoning and unreasonable man, I will appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, who on the occasion of the Motion being brought forward by the hon. Gentleman, who is a Baronet, gave him a character, and said that his hon. Friend was "remarkable for his intelligence and his moderation." Now, Sir, what does this Roman Catholic Member, this "intelligent and moderate" Roman Catholic Member, propose? Here it is—

"Sir Colman O'Loghlen,—In Committee on Promissory Oaths Bill:—To move the following Clause:—(Sovereigns of Great Britain and Ireland, after the passing of this Act, shall not be required to take the Declaration against Transubstantiation, &c. at their Coronation or at any other time.)"

It goes on to say—

"After the passing of this Act no Sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland shall be required to take, make, or subscribe at his Coronation, or on the first day of his first Parliament, whichever shall first happen, or any other time, the Declaration commonly called the Declaration against Transubstantiation and the Invocation of Saints and the Sacrifice of the Mass as practised in the Church of Rome, anything in the Bill of Rights or Act of Settlement to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding."

Will the hon. Member for Dungarvan now say that there is nothing ancillary to this measure, at least in the mind of one "intelligent and moderate" Roman Catholic? With that Declaration on the table of this House this question assumes a different light. Why is this measure brought forward? It is brought forward as a cure for Fenianism; it is brought forward to produce content in Ireland; and here we have before this measure has passed the second reading a Motion on the table which says that those whom it is sought to satisfy by this policy and by this measure will not be satisfied at all until they have complete religious equality—an equality that can only be obtained by repealing the Act of Settlement. I stand here as an independent Member of Parliament. ["Oh, oh!" and laughter.] Those Gentlemen who make those pleasant noises behind me—I would ask any one of those Gentlemen who indulged in the sound to get up in his place, and to show me, by words uttered by me in this House, or printed in addresses to my constituents, how I have ceased to be an independent Member. For a time I gave my support to Lord Palmerston. I owe no allegiance to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and if there were cross-Benches in this House, I should sit upon them. There are no cross-Benches in this House, and, upon the whole, my sympathies being more with the Liberal side, I sit upon the next thing to the cross-Benches. I repeat I stand here as an independent Member. The consistency of the right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House or on this side of the House is a matter of indifference to me. I do not care whether the one says, "We will attain religious equality by levelling up," or the other, "We will attain that object by levelling down." To-night the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has denied that there ever was any question in the Cabinet of levelling up by endowing the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland. As an Independent Member of this House, I see that the Government are prepared to the best of their ability to resist this course of legislation, and to maintain the Constitution as secured by the Act of Settlement. On the other side, I see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire—I give him credit for sincerity in the matter. ["Oh, oh!"]—I am sorry that it is offensive to hon. Members near me that I should give the right hon. Gentleman credit for sincerity, but, nevertheless, I do give him credit for sincerity—embarked in a policy which I honestly and conscientiously think sooner or later will end in the results to which I have already referred. Feeling and believing that these results will surely follow the policy of the right hon. Gentleman if it be adopted. I shall give my cordial support to the policy of the Government in preference to that of the right hon. Gentleman. I know not what is going to happen. I know not whether we are or are not to have an appeal to our constituencies; but I think it desirable that the country should clearly and intelligibly see what possibly may be in store for us should the policy of the right hon. Gentleman be adopted; and I only hope that the Motion of which I have read the words, and which has been put upon the table of this House, will be written in big letters in every borough and in every county in this great country. No doubt, if we are to have a dissolution upon this question, it will be a great inconvenience and a great expense to every Member of this House; but all I can say is that in such an event, I shall go to my constituency with a clear conscience and with a full confidence as to the result.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the noble Lord who had just sat down had taken great pains to prove his right to the title of an independent Member, but he could assure him that he had put himself to unnecessary trouble. The noble Lord had stated that his sympathies were generally on the Liberal side, but if that were the case, he certainly exercised a most remarkable control over himself by not yielding to those sympathies. He could assure the House that he would detain them but a few minutes while he made a few observations on the Bill before them. Although feeling deeply upon the question of the Established Church in Ireland, he had not taken part in any of the debates which had occurred upon the subject, and he should not have risen upon that occasion had it not been for one remark which fell from the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Warren) just before he sat down, in which he expressed his surprise that hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House could suppose that they were doing anything by this course of legislation to stay the discontent which existed in Ireland. In that remark lay the whole drift of the question, and he would shortly state why he thought they were doing a great deal to still the discontent in that country. A great deal had been said about the Act of Union. The noble Lord who had just sat down said, he believed the Union would be in danger if this legislation were carried into effect; but he, on the contrary, believed that the Union would be in the greatest possible danger if this legislation were not carried out. Why had we this discontent in Ireland? Hon. Gentlemen told them they were pandering to the Fenian agitation. He supposed hon. Members on that side of the House had as great a contempt for the Fenian agitation as hon. Members opposite could have, and as great a determination to put it down, but they saw very well that behind that agitation there was a feeling in Ireland which alone made it possible for that agitation to take any hold. And whence arose that feeling? It arose from what he was compelled to believe was a reasonable and natural feeling on the part of Irishmen at this moment. Much had been said about religious equality, but something should also be said about political equality. What were the real conditions of the Union between England and Ireland? Upon what conditions would an Irish patriot desire to preserve that Union? Certainly not upon the condition of the absorption of Ireland into England, but upon as fair conditions of political equality between England and Ireland as between England and Scotland; that there should be a common Legislature for Imperial purposes, but that the special legislation for each country should be in accordance with the feelings and with the interests of the country affected by that legislation. Was there any patriot in Ireland who would ask for the preservation of the Union on any other ground? Was there anything that came more nearly home to a man's interest and feelings than his religion? The feeling of the enormous majority of the Irish people was against the Irish Church Establishment. If Parliament wished to preserve the Union, it must do one of two things—either trample down the feelings of Irish nationality or admit Ireland to union with England on terms of equality. It was said that the Irish Church was an Imperial question, and that the condition of the Union was that the Established Church should be maintained in that country. But was that the condition of the Union between England and Scotland. Was it to be said that the influence and interests of the English Church were so great that, whatever Irish patriots might demand, Parliament could do nothing for them? He did not believe that an argument fraught with greater danger to the Established Church in England could be devised. He wished for the preservation of the English Church. He was not brought up in it. He was born and brought up as a Dissenter. But he believed that the English Episcopal Church as an Established Church was a great blessing, and that this was the feeling of the English people. But on what other ground, except upon this feeling, could the English Church be maintained? If the English people wished it to cease would it be continued? The people of Ireland did not wish the Irish Church to remain. He trusted that those who felt it to be necessary to the stability, and almost to the existence of the Empire, that Ireland should be contented would not be told that they must choose between the English Church and keeping up a Church in Ireland which the majority of the people disliked. It was impossible, as he had said, to inflict a greater blow upon the English Church than an argument of that kind. In the one case the great majority of the people of England, and even the Dissenters, wished for the preservation of the English Church. The strength of the English Church was not in her hierarchy, or in the presence of the Bishops in the House of Lords, but in her parochial system, and in the feeling that this ideal was not always, but was still fairly fulfilled, that there was a man in every parish of good character, more or less devoted to the high objects set before him, and in a position to look after, not only the spiritual and moral, but also the temporal welfare of the people of his parish. There was no such state of things—no such parochial system was possible in at least three of the provinces of Ireland. A right rev. Prelate, for whom he had the highest respect, had threatened them with 20,000 parsons using their pulpits for election cries if the Irish Church question should be settled according to the wishes of the Irish people. There was no one for whom he entertained greater respect than for that right rev. Prelate; but he was sure when he came to consider what were the real interests of the Church, of which he was such an ornament, he must feel that was scarcely the kind of argument he should have used on this question. He had not intended to trouble the House with any remarks on the present occasion; but, being on his legs, he would venture before sitting down to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown what was the real opinion of the Government with regard to the question of religious equality on which his noble Friend who last spoke seemed to differ from them, his sympathies being, as he said, with that side of the House while he always so efficiently supported the other. The words of the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) had been quoted this evening; they were alluded to by the Secretary of State for the Home Department in a particularly marked manner. He said he did not accept the interpretation which his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire put on those words; but he very carefully avoided in any way disowning those words; and, after having simply stated that he did not accept his right hon. Friend's interpretation, he went on to say what he himself was or was not responsible for. He said he never used words implying religious equality, and nobody on that side of the House ever charged him with having done so. All they ever charged him with was this—that evidently entirely disbelieving in religious equality in Ireland—having before, and again tonight, stated how futile, how absurd in his mind was religious equality, he sat quietly by while that one of his Colleagues who was specially responsible for the affairs of Ireland, in a speech in which he was expected to state the policy of the Ministry in regard to Ireland, brought in that remark, not as a personal or casual observation, but at the close of a chain of argument, when they were all looking anxiously to know what the policy of the Conservative Government would be as to keeping up the Established Church in Ireland. The noble Earl spoke with great definitiveness when he said that there could be no objection to religious equality, provided it was not effected by confiscation. What he wanted to ask was, how did the Premier explain that allusion of the noble Earl to religious equality? There was nothing that had been said by the Premier that contradicted that allusion; on the contrary, it was clear that the allusion appeared to fill up the programme of the Premier. He said his policy in Ireland was to create, not to destroy. With his great power of language the right hon. Gentleman was fond of using words which appeared to mean a great deal more than he explained at the time, and the meaning of those words he had never explained. The House had a right to ask the Premier whether he disagreed with the words used by the noble Earl; or, if he did not disagree with them, what interpretation he put on them. It was not fair, as this question was to be brought before the new constituencies, that Gentlemen opposite should go to the hustings with two cries — that they should raise in the presence of the strong Protestant followers of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) he would not say the “No Popery” but a strong Protestant cry; and that, on the other hand, they should go before the Roman Catholics of England and Ireland and say, “You had better not take your advice from the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, but take your advice from Rome, and Cardinal Antonelli will say, ‘Don’t be so excessively earnest to disestablish the Irish Church—rather have faith in that great man, the present Premier of England. He has never listened to the cry of a Free Italy, and has always opposed the Member for South Lancashire, who, though he appears to be on your side, has done the cause of Ultramontanism no good in past days. Don’t be afraid; it is true the Premier will not disestablish the Irish Church, but something very prosperous for the Roman Catholics of Ireland will follow from his action if you will allow him to remain in power.’” It was not fair to lay too much stress upon one speech of any Minister of the Crown; but he thought they had a right to ask the Premier at this last moment to say, whether he disavowed the statements of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and if not how he explained them.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill this evening seemed to complain very much that I should offer any opposition to his Motion, on the ground that the Ministry had not opposed the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions, which he previously moved. We did not oppose those Resolutions, because, as I described them, we looked on them as being corollaries of the 1st Resolution; and the right hon. Gentleman admitted the justness of that description. It does not follow that, when you oppose a policy, you are bound to oppose it on every stage. Common courtesy and the common sense of the House teach us that such a way of conducting public business would be utterly impracticable. We had taken on the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman two divisions in full Houses, and, therefore, I only followed Parliamentary custom in announcing that though we objected to the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions as strongly as to the 1st, yet we should be content not to take any formal division on them, expressing only our protest against them; but that we should reserve our Parliamentary right, when the Resolutions assumed the shape of a Bill, to express our dissent from the measure. I apprehend that the course we took was not only convenient to the House, but consonant with common sense. To say that because we did not take further divisions on the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions we are therefore estopped from opposing the Bill is a proposition which every person, on reflection, will feel to be one that cannot be sustained. But the right hon. Gentleman, not content with maintaining that we are unreasonable in opposing the Bill, because we did not oppose, except by protest, the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions, says that we ought to support the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“Not only am I astonished that you oppose the Bill, but I had every reason to believe that you would deem it your policy and an advantage to support it; because you have consented to the appointment of a Committee to investigate the condition of the Irish Church, and as you yourselves admit the possibility of the Committee proposing considerable modifications in the temporalities of the Irish Church, what could be more convenient than that in the meantime you should pass a Suspensory Bill which would prevent the creation of any new vested interest, which it would be very inconvenient for you to have to deal with by after legislation.”

Well, Sir, I am perfectly willing so far to agree with the right hon. Gentleman, that if he will undertake in Committee to propose clauses providing that all the resources which may accrue from the suspended bishoprics and rectories should, when our ultimate legislation is decided upon, be apportioned and secured to the Established Church in Ireland I will consider his proposition of supporting the present Bill with feelings very much inclined to accede to his request. But the right hon. Gentleman forgets that he introduces to our notice a Bill which contains no provisions of that nature. He does not secure that the results of the suspension of these benefices will be apportioned hereafter to the benefit of that Establishment which we seek to uphold; but, on the contrary, he has to-night given a new version of his policy, and, alarmed by an impression in the House that led to the proposal of a very awkward Motion—an impression that he was prepared, when the results of suspending these benefices had accrued, to allot the sums thus acquired to the advantage of another Church—that is, the Roman Catholic Church—the right hon. Gentleman comes down to-night and tells us most distinctly that his policy is that none of the sequestered revenues of the Established Church in Ireland shall be apportioned to the maintenance of the religious institutions of any other creed whatever. Well, what is the consequence? The right hon. Gentleman has come down to-night to give us a new expression of his policy, to propose that Church revenues—that funds which have been consecrated to religious purposes—shall in future be applied to secular uses. Therefore, the question has assumed quite a different aspect to-night. Sir, I am as much opposed to the new scheme of the right hon. Gentleman as to the one that he was accused of holding during the late debate, and which this evening he has repudiated. I am myself entirely opposed to applying any property which has been once devoted to spiritual purposes to what are called secular uses. I know of no instance in which appropriations of that kind have ever occurred in which they have not ended either in the advantage of some individual or of some family; or, if there has been some more plausible appropriation for a public purpose, it has been applied with the utmost wastefulness, and ultimately with complete misapplication. On these grounds, then, I vindicate my opposition to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, and I cannot agree to support it. But, Sir, these are the two main arguments that were brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman. The rest of the discussion, as far as his own observations and those of his principal supporters to-night are concerned, has consisted in references to an extract from a passage in the speech of my noble Friend the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. We have heard that speech referred to on every occasion on which this subject has been brought under the consideration of the House. Gentlemen opposite have a passage cut out of that speech, and I have observed it passed along as they speak in turn. Sometimes it is in the possession of a noble Lord, then of a right hon. Gentleman, and then it gets into the hands of a Gentleman with a humbler title. It is well thumbed and well worn; and now I am called upon to explain it. In the first place, before I explain it, I wish to know what is the charge that is made against my noble Friend, because it has been expressed in such various terms—it has assumed on different nights such different forms that, before I reply I would like distinctly to ascertain what the precise charge is. We have had it to-night, with candid precision, from the right hon. and learned Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson), and I must do him the justice to say that he made the charge distinctly; and, as one who was the principal Law Adviser of the late Government, I take it for granted that he had well considered the terms—that he had made himself master of the case—that, being a practised master of the forensic art, he placed it before the House most favourably to the views and interests of his Friends. I take it, therefore, from his showing, because the House must have observed that when the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and others have spoken on the subject they have made vague insinuations and inuendoes, calling upon me to explain expressions of my noble Friend without distinctly alleging them; but, while making a certain appearance of urging some odious charge, they have avoided giving any distinct expression of what they meant. In this case that cannot be said, I am bound to admit, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portarlington. What are his charges? He said that the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant came down with an Irish policy, and that he proposed, in the first place, to endow a Roman Catholic University. Well, we have heard that charge before, and it has been contradicted. I myself have said over and over again that it never was proposed by us to endow a Roman Catholic University. ["Oh, oh."] What is the use of saying "Oh, oh!" now that the correspondence is on the table and you yourselves can judge for yourselves whether there ever was such a proposition on our part? On the contrary, there was from others a proposition that a Roman Catholic University should receive an endowment, and that endowment was refused by us. Well, so much for that distinct charge. What is the second charge? That the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant proposed to pay the Roman Catholic clergy. I must say that I myself listened with great attention to my noble Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and I heard no proposition of the kind. I myself took part in the debate. I do not know whether I spoke the same night as my noble Friend, but if I did not I spoke the second night of the debate; and I said then, most distinctly, that we, as a Government, entirely disapproved paying the Roman Catholic clergy. I stated our reasons for that disapproval, and expressed our opinion that the Roman Catholic clergy were sincere—certainly at present—in rejecting any proposition of the kind. Now, these are the two most considerable charges—the endowment of a Roman Catholic University and the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy. I say that we did not propose to endow a Roman Catholic University, nor to pay the Roman Catholic clergy; and that when I announced the policy of the Government in detail, I stated that as a Government we were adverse to paying that clergy. But then it has been strongly urged that my noble Friend used an expression of which I have never yet, either in the references to the speech of my noble Friend or the more general observations of hon. Gentlemen, obtained a distinct idea. The particular expression charged against my noble Friend—supposing him to have used it, though I do not believe he ever did—the supposed expression of my noble Friend as referred to by the hon. Member for Bradford, was “religious equality.” Now, that is a very vague phrase. What do you mean by religious equality? I myself, notwithstanding the observations which my noble Friend (Lord Elcho) has addressed to the House, am of opinion that we have religious equality in England; but I attach to the phrase a different meaning from that given to it by my noble Friend. I conceive that where a man has complete and perfect enjoyment of his religion, and can uphold and vindicate his religious privileges in the Courts of law, that state of things is religious equality. I admit that other persons may associate other ideas with the phrase religious equality; but because a Minister of State mentions the words “religious equality”—if he did mention them—are you to assume that he intends thereby to found on the part of the Government a political system composed of two parts—one the endowment of a Roman Catholic University, and the other the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy? To do so in the very teeth of the repeated statements made by myself in debate appears to me to be practising the arts of Parliamentary representation in a manner characterized by extraordinary dexterity. Well, Sir, what is the third charge? My noble Friend is said to have announced another policy which he never did announce—namely, an increase of the Regium Donum. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department properly mentioned to-night that the Regium Donum had never been brought before the Cabinet. I think I can give as clear an account as was ever given to the House of what my noble Friend said on that subject. What my noble Friend said was that in his opinion the Regium Donum was a miserable pittance. Well, I have myself, as some others in this House have done, received deputations on the subject of an increase in the Regium Donum; and I must say it requires a great command of countenance to describe the Regium Donum as a grant of great munificence. But I had always said, as my noble Friend said, that though I might not consider the Regium Donum as a grant of great munificence, it was utterly impossible in the present state of feeling that we could propose an increase of the Regium Donum. This being the view, how could the Regium Donum be brought before the Cabinet had there not been a proposal to increase and re-constitute the Regium Donum? Such an idea had never occurred to us, whatever may be our opinions as to the amount of the Regium Donum and the manner in which it is administered; and I dare say many members of the Cabinet, and of the late Cabinet also, have not concealed their views upon that subject. Now, because my noble Friend considered and could not resist saying that it is a miserable pittance, it is immediately inferred that one of our propositions was to increase the Regium Donum. There is not the slightest foundation for the inference, nor is there the slightest inconsistency in the statements of my noble Friend and of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State. [An Hon. MEMBER: Levelling up.] Well, “levelling up” is a phrase which has been used in this debate very frequently, and which seems to be a very favourite one with hon. Gentlemen opposite. I should very much like to have their views as to the distinct meaning they attribute to the phrase “levelling up.” That in a country like Ireland there may not be various modes by which you may raise the clergy of the different denominations in a manner more consonant to their feelings of self-respect than you could in a country like England, where the same circumstances do not prevail, no man would for a moment pretend to deny. You have been doing things year by year by which the status of the Roman Catholic clergymen in Ireland has been improved and recognized; and no doubt there are many things which might still be done—without violating the principles of our Constitution, and without inducing you to agree to revolutionary proceedings which may have the most injurious consequences upon the population of the country generally—to soften the spirit of society in Ireland and effect very beneficial results. And if my noble Friend expressed on that and other occasions his desire to support a policy of that kind, he only expressed a desire which is common to every Member of the Government. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for Bradford has made a speech to-night about “Justice to Ireland.” Starting with one or two convenient assumptions which no human being can prove or disprove, and to which no human being can ascribe any definite meaning, he, of course, rapidly arrives at conclusions on the strength of which he recommends the violent policy which it is now attempted to thrust upon the nation. “We must do justice to the Irish people,” says the hon. Member for Bradford. Who are the Irish people? The Irish people consist of several races and of several religions, and the hon. Member wants us to do something to satisfy a portion of the people who may be, and probably are, the majority. But it does not follow that because you do something which you assume may please the majority that you will not offend a very large and very powerful minority of the people, and in your accounts and your calculations as to the character and effect of your policy it is the most unwise thing in the world to disregard the feelings and the interests of powerful minorities. For what will be the consequence of disregarding the feelings and the interests of powerful minorities? Why, that your scheme of conciliation, your attempt to pacify a country and to establish what you call “Justice for the people” would probably end in your creating among other classes who are now satisfied and content the same discontent and dissatisfaction which you allege to prevail in that portion of the nation which you describe as, and which may be, the majority. Now, Sir, I say there is not that similarity between the cases of Ireland and Scotland which the hon. Gentleman, as is common, assumes to exist. In the first place you must as wise and practical men deal with what exists. Here is a Church established for centuries in Ireland with a very powerful and numerous body in direct communion with it, and supported also by the sympathies of another numerous body, who, though not in direct communion with it, look upon it with respect and reverence. And you must remember that a mass of population like the Protestant population of Ireland never existed in Scotland as opposed to the Presbyterian form of worship. It never existed; and, therefore, there is no real similarity between the two countries, And even if there had been, we must remember that what we have to deal with in Ireland exists at present, has been settled for a great number of years, and is now part of history, having settled itself by the force of circumstances, over which we ourselves have no control. We must as practical men consider the position of Ireland with reference to existing circumstances, and, therefore, when the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford comes forward and says the thing is perfectly simple—that all you have to do is to do justice to the people of Ireland, and to do in Ireland what was done in Scotland two centuries ago, and you will then find everything perfectly quiet and everybody perfectly content. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] The hon. Gentleman opposite, who seems to think that everybody will be perfectly content, will probably not be responsible for the legislation which will arise, and, therefore, his mind need not be disturbed. But I say that the statesman who embarks in such a crusade, and who, without the slightest regard to the feelings and interest of the great body of the Protestant population in Ireland, acts in complete disregard of those feelings and interests, but yet supposes that he is going to establish a system in Ireland which is to cure all evils and to satisfy all persons, is embarking in one of the wildest enterprizes that ever the disordered imagination of man conceived. But, Sir, notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Bradford says, I cannot refrain from considering this question with reference to the larger issue which is at stake; and any one who does consider it with a total disregard to consequences is not taking that sound view of the circumstances with which we have to deal, which the necessity of the case requires. I say this act is the first step to the disestablishment of the English Church. You may draw distinctions; you may say it applies only to Ireland; you may say that the Church as established in Ireland is different from the Church as established in England; but you have not proved that. Sitting opposite to me are many Gentlemen who on other occasions have proved just the reverse, and have alleged all the charges they have made against the Church in Ireland against the Church in England also. The most that could be urged by those who dissent from me on the other side of the House is that it is a difference in degree ; but I say the principle involved is the connection of a religious Establishment with the State, and the question is whether you will have it or not. I have heard some comments made to-night upon observations I made early in the controversy. I made none that I regret, or did not make advisedly ; and I do believe most solemnly, so far as the policy which is the consequence of the alleged crisis in Ireland is concerned and can influence us, it is one that will bring about a crisis in England—[“ Oh ! ”]—that is my opinion—and which, if pursued, will disturb the social system of this country to its very centre. I believe that this is an opinion very prevalent in the country, and that every day it grows stronger and wider among those classes who think and reflect, and who never act until they have thought and reflected. An hon. Gentleman accused me of raising a “ No Popery ” cry. Allow me to say I have not heard that cry, but I have heard a cry raised in this country now that I never heard before, and that is the cry of “ No Protestantism.” [“ Where ? ”] I have heard it frequently, and read of it in various places. [“ Where ? ”] It is not for me to refer to expressions which are not used in this House ; if I had heard them here I should have noticed them before. That is the only cry I have heard connected with this matter, and it is one extremely novel in this country. I am not here to impress upon the House my views of what the public feeling is upon this all-important question. I know nothing more idle than to go out of your way to give your own opinion as to the public sentiment of the day ; that will and must declare itself, not from what we state in this House, but from the deep and earnest feelings of the people ; and I only make use of these observations in answer to those who have alleged a view of the public sentiment of the country of a very different character. When I am told we have attempted to raise a cry—when I am told that the country disregards any appeal to it upon this all-important subject—when I am told that there is only one opinion in the country, and that is in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, I am bound to assert that the result of my observation, information, and experience is of a totally different character. I do not wish to dwell upon that now ; but I say that my experience and my conviction upon that subject are of a totally different character. I believe in this country there is a very great agitation upon this subject. I believe there is a strong feeling that the right hon. Gentleman has embarked in a most dangerous policy ; that its consequences may be most serious to the country ; that they may dim the splendour of the British Crown, and lower the character of the people of England. I believe that to be the opinion of powerful classes in this country—of classes powerful not from station merely, but from the possession and exercise of virtues, and who never interfere in political affairs except from the strongest motives of public duty. If this be a right view, or even an approximately correct view, it is most unwise to disregard or affect to despise it. It is not by managed majorities—[“ Oh, oh ! ” and Cheers]—it is not by such means that you can change the opinion of a country. I do not say that we are right ; I do not say that you are wrong. The observation I have made is a general and a true one. Whatever is the opinion of the people of England upon this great question—whether they will maintain the connection between Church and State, and whether they believe that such a connection is necessary for the happiness of the people and the security of the realm—whatever may be their opinion upon the subject rest assured that that opinion will be asserted and will be triumphant.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I think I may say, without fear of contradiction, that no criticisms of any moment have been made upon the mere form, expressions, and particulars of the Bill that is before the House. [“ Oh ! ” and Cheers.] Some of the Gentlemen who differ from that sentiment have not been here during the debate ; but I hardly think that they would differ from the sentiment if they considered its terms. The objections that have been made have traversed a wider field, and have gone to the root of the principle of the measure. We have been involved—and it was natural that we should be involved—in a discussion upon the main points of the policy of the question now before us, and I only made that opening observation to clear myself from any apparent disrespect if I did not feel that, especially at this late hour, it was necessary to enter into minute details. But the hon. Baronet the Member for Londonderry (Sir Frederick Heygate) made an appeal to me, and appeared to be aggrieved because I had never, as he said, taken notice of a peculiar argument founded by him on behalf of the Irish Church upon the state of things in Ulster. He said, "Look at the case of Ulster! You cannot deny that that is quite different from the case of other provinces in Ireland;" and, in fact, the argument of the hon. Baronet seemed to be this—that if we were to part with the United Church of England and Ireland, at any rate we ought to have a United Church of England and Ulster. But what is the case of Ulster, which the hon. Baronet thinks so strong? Why, it is this—that in Ulster the members of the Established Church absolutely amount to one-fifth of the population; and Ulster, thus strong in its proportion of the members of that communion, is thus apparently capable, not only of answering for itself, but even of carrying on its back the whole case of the Irish Church. Now if I am to look at the case of Ulster with 20 per cent, I must look at the case of Connaught with 3 per cent, and I cannot say that, examining the minute distribution, which varies greatly in different parts of Ireland, the complexion of the case is at all altered. There was another remark made in the small hours of the evening by the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell), who said that the power of those who are now in the Government to oppose the Bill proposed on this side of the House with reference to the Irish Church, would have been much greater than it is, if, instead of being in Office, they had been in Opposition. To that opinion of the hon. Gentleman I entirely subscribe. I am perfectly aware that if we had sat upon that (the Ministerial) Bench, whatever efforts we might have made we should not have been able, with the utmost exertions, to achieve the progress which we have actually made. And when I hear discussions upon the general condition of this House, upon the strange and anomalous relations between the Government and the Parliament, and when I hear taunts from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who is mighty valiant in speech, and challenges us to move a Vote of Want of Confidence, I am aware that the responsibility of acquiescence in that state of things is serious; but one capital and determining motive, at least with me, for so acquiescing, has been this double conviction—in the first place, that the question which presses for the welfare of the Empire at this moment is the state of Ireland; and in the second place, that we have been enabled, through the fortunate and happy circumstance of the tenacity with which those (the Ministerial) seats have been held to make such progress in the settlement of this great question as, had the position of parties been reversed, it would have been impossible for us to make. But questions of the greatest interest have been raised—and it was no wonder they should be raised—with respect to our relative position and policy in relation to the Irish Church. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Prime Minister have referred to the declarations made by me in an early part of the evening, which in their view alter the position I had previously endeavoured to occupy, and which they have described in terms of their own. Sir, I do not intend to repeat those declarations; I do not intend to vary from them; I regard them as making no change in what I had formerly said beyond an explanatory addition. And I only refer to the subject because I wish to say that I desire to be bound by the language I have used myself, and not by the glosses, however ingenious, of the two right hon. Gentlemen opposite. ["Ingenious."] No, I said ingenious. But we have had a discussion upon that which is more important, the policy and the declarations of Ministers of the Crown. And to that subject it is necessary that I should advert particularly, because the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford gave the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity for frank and full explanation; and because I wish to fix, as far as I can, in the face of the House and the country, the point to which by the use or the non-use of that opportunity he has brought us. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, adverting to words that had been used by the noble Lord near him, made to us the interesting revelation that the question of the increase of the Regium Donum, and the yet more important question of a general system of concurrent endowment in Ireland, never had been the subject of consideration in the Cabinet. Sir, it is not usual, as far as my recollection goes, for members of a Cabinet to excuse or defend themselves by stating in this House what subjects have or have not been brought under the consideration of the Cabinet. But permit me to say with that matter we have nothing whatever to do. It is a very interesting disclosure; it provokes our curiosity to know the relation that prevails between Minister and Minister; but that curiosity we must restrain. We have nothing to do with such a defence of any Member of the Government. What we have to look to are the official declarations of Ministers, made in their own name, made on behalf of their Colleagues, and, above all, heard by those Colleagues, acquiesced in by those Colleagues, left to abide uncontradicted and unqualified by those Colleagues till weeks and months have elapsed. The right hon. Gentleman in vain endeavours to escape from the difficulty. He says that the words of the noble Earl have been handed up and down this Bench till they are hardly recognizable. Aye, and they will be handed up and down, not only here, but in other places in this country before the question is settled. He seems to think that there is nothing that presses on him except the words "religious equality," and he does not think that those words were ever used. But the noble Earl has never contradicted the use of that phrase. And whether it was used or not, the intentions of the noble Earl and the intentions of the Government—for whom, if ever man was authorized to speak the noble Earl was authorized to speak—were declared with a copiousness, a fulness, and a variety of expression which left nothing to be desired. And if the noble Earl, as we think, used the words "religious equality," I am quite sure he did not use them in the far-fetched—I will not say much more than far-fetched—sense which the right hon. Gentleman has just assigned to them. He said, "I do not pretend to say that justice and policy may not depend to a great extent on the equalization of ecclesiastical arrangements in Ireland." ["Order."] I hope the words were heard. They were spoken on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman by the Secretary of State for the Home Department; the right hon. Gentleman heard them, and he suffered them to remain without contradiction from the 10th of March to the 22nd of May. But the noble Earl then went on to quote those other words that have been quoted again and again, and of which, in the early part of this evening, I understated the effect—

Mr. Gladstone

"There would not be, I believe, any objection to make all Churches equal; but the result must be secured by elevation and not by confiscation."

I beg the right hon. Gentleman to observe that his subtle—I will not say sophistical, for that might give offence—his subtle explanation of the character of "religious equality," even if it has an application under the exercise of his forcible ingenuity to the case of an individual, certainly does not avail to explain this remarkable expression—"there is no objection, I believe, to make all Churches equal." If individuals can be equal when one belongs to an endowed and the other to an unendowed communion, I think the right hon. Gentleman himself will hardly tell me that Churches are equal when one of them enjoys the ecclesiastical property of the country and another has no share whatever in that property. What we have said on former occasions upon this question, and what will be said both here and elsewhere throughout the country, is this—I do not speak for myself; for myself individually, I have not scrupled to own that, with the opinion I entertain of the circumstances of Ireland, I should have thought it or might have thought it my duty to raise the question absolutely—unconditionally, and even without a hope of party support; but taking the facts that have occurred during the present Session, I say that in the enterprise upon which this party has entered with respect to ecclesiastical policy in Ireland, even if we are banded together by common opinions and by common votes, those opinions and those votes have reference to a policy which has been, in point of fact, forced upon the House and on the country, and which has by no means gone in advance or anticipation of the views of the Government. It is the counter plan which we have proposed to the project of the Government—which, if there be meaning in words, was a project of concurrent endowment. It can hardly be thought unfair to put that construction upon the speech of the noble Earl, for the noble Earl himself has never disclaimed the construction put upon it. It will bear but one construction. The noble Earl knows that perfectly well, and he has stood the brunt of it like a man. Moreover, the noble Earl does not stand alone. The declarations of the right hon. Gentleman have been in concurrence with those of the noble Earl. The right hon. Gentleman says he expressed his disapproval of paying the priests. No doubt he said he disapproved of what was called paying the priests. Now, what is called "paying the priests?" Why, the giving them an annual stipend from the State. But there are other ways of dealing with the priests; there are other ways of fulfilling the objects that the right hon. Gentleman has expressed, far more agreeable than the giving them that stipend, dependent upon the annual will of Parliament, which is called "paying the priests." Am I justified in saying that the right hon. Gentleman has contemplated a resort to those methods or not? It is important that the country should be well informed upon this point. What did the right hon. Gentleman say both last year and this year was the key of his ecclesiastical policy for Ireland? He said, "You must create, and not destroy." Had those words a meaning? Yes, they had a meaning, and if illustration were wanted there is abundance of illustration from other quarters. The right hon. Gentleman, twenty-four or twenty-five years ago—[Laughter, and "Oh, oh!"]*—That is premature derision—The right hon. Gentleman, twenty-four or twenty-five years ago, made a speech the sentiment of which he has adopted and made his own in pith and substance within the last six weeks. ["Oh, oh!"*] Is it not fair to refer to the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman made during the present Session? He said, "In my conscience the sentiment of that speech was right." [Mr. DISRAELI: The historical sentiment.] I have not so gathered it, but I accept the addition. The historical sentiment of that speech was right. Why, undoubtedly; the whole speech was historical, and a remarkable speech it was. What was the historical sentiment of that speech? That the true policy for Ireland was to be found in the state of things that was in force in 1636, and that at that time there was a recognized equality between the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches. That was the historical sentiment of that speech, adopted by the Prime Minister on behalf of the Home Secretary and all his Colleagues, and announced to us as the policy of the Government. Well, it is in opposition to that policy that we have proposed a plan which contemplates, not the erecting of a variety of endowed Churches in Ireland, but the doing away with that endowed Church which now exists there. There is another point which, as was to be expected, has been imported into this debate. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department and other

hon. Gentlemen have urged strongly their opinion that, if not the intention, yet the effect of these proceedings must be to undermine and destroy the Church of England. Well, that is a very serious matter. I do not say who is right and who is wrong, but I will venture to state the opinion which I believe to a great extent we entertain on this side of the House. It is idle to tell us that there are in our ranks some Gentlemen—not, I believe, very numerous, whatever their weight may be in other respects—who have declared themselves to be the determined foes of the principle of Establishments in whatever country and under whatever circumstances. I know no reason why those Gentlemen, differing from the most of us upon the abstract principle, yet agreeing with us—or rather, perhaps, I should say, we agreeing with them upon the actual measures that ought to be applied to the peculiar case of Ireland—I know no reason, I say, why, because they are associated with us in the votes they give, we are to be held more responsible for their peculiar opinions than the right hon. Gentleman is to be held responsible for the opinions of every Gentleman who may happen to sit behind him, and who may chance to be connected with an Orange Lodge, or of every foe to the concession of Roman Catholic Emancipation, or of those who would gladly go back if they could in every measure of beneficial legislation in this country of late years. The real difference between the two sides of the House, as it appears to me, is this:—What we hold is that the Church of England is in the main—I use the word roughly—good, that is to say it is an Establishment which exists under circumstances which enable it to perform all the duties of an Establishment; and that, secondly, it performs those duties. And that it is acknowledged to perform them, appears first of all by the warm and devoted attachment of a very large portion of the nation, and in the next place by the willing acquiescence of a very large portion also of those who actually dissent from its tenets. And if I use again a monosyllable for the sake of brevity, and say that the Church of Ireland is a bad Establishment, I do not mean to cast a slur upon the character either of its ministers or its members. I mean that it is bad as an Establishment, because, as tested by the experience of three centuries, it has proved its action to be hopeless in fulfilment of the work for which an Establishment exists. And here allow me to say that the right hon. Gentleman takes an undue liberty when he says that our proceedings are in avowed disregard of the feelings and interests of Protestants. They are no such thing. ["Hear!" and "Oh!"] Gentlemen may be perfectly entitled to say, either in that or in any other way, that our proceedings are in disregard of the feelings and interests of Protestants; but they have no right to say that they are in avowed disregard of those interests and feelings if we disavow that intention; and I claim my right to state that in my conscientious conviction the existence of the Established Church in Ireland is hostile and injurious to the interests of Protestantism. It may seem to some Members who sit in this House a very strange opinion, but it is an opinion that you may just conceive it possible for men to entertain; for, after all, it is the characteristic of a civilized age that people do at length bring into their minds some conception that it is possible for other people honestly and conscientiously to differ from them, and until we have learnt that lesson we have made but little progress in true civilization. Now, the opinion I have stated is one which I believe to be very widely entertained on this side of the House, and much more widely out-of-doors. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "No;" but, as I am informed, nine-tenths of the people of Scotland—speaking roughly—think that the existence of the Established Church of Ireland is hostile to Protestantism. But I will not dwell merely upon testimony of that kind. I happen to have in my hand a speech of the Bishop of Ripon, whose name and character are well-known, and, as I believe, are highly respected by all who know him, made at a meeting for the promotion of the Irish Church Missions, on the 20th of April, 1868. In that speech the Bishop expressed very strong disapproval of the movement in which we are engaged; but what did he say about the interests of Protestantism in the event of the Established Church being removed? He said they would flourish more than ever. Here are his words:—

"Let the State, if she will, break the most solemn contracts. Let her violate the Act of Union, let them call on the Queen to violate her Coronation Oath."

All this proves to you what an excellent judge in this matter the Bishop of Ripon is. You may rely on everything he says. I will continue to read—

Mr. Gladstone

"Let the Church be disendowed and disestablished. The State did not make the Church, and the State could not un-Church. If this did unhappily take place, she would attract to herself the sympathy of the Church of England, and by such an agency as that society, which would become more than ever necessary, the truth of God would be more and more diffused through the length and breadth of the land, and many valuable souls would be brought to know the Lord Jesus Christ."

And, with great respect to Gentlemen sitting opposite, we think we are quite entitled to agree in this view of the matter if we think fit. Disregarding imputations which the right hon. Gentleman is pleased to favour us with, I take leave to declare that the opinion prevailing with us is, that these two Establishments—the one which is good of its kind and the other which is bad of its kind—must not be considered as identical in quality; our doctrine is, that by extinguishing the bad you will increase, and not diminish the good; your opinion seems to be, that an Establishment should be upheld because it is an Establishment; that, whether it be good or bad, is a matter of secondary importance, and that the destruction of what is bad in the Establishment puts what is good in danger. This to me is a paradox contrary to all human experience. But, whatever be the justice or injustice of these respective opinions, one thing is certain, and that is—that if the Church of England be constantly, fervently, enthusiastically associated in the speeches, in the minds, and in the thoughts of a large party with the Church of Ireland, that association, which might have been fanciful, will have become real, and that danger, which should be imaginary, will become formidable. Now, Sir, this is possible from the two controversies between us. One is, whether the Irish Church should cease to exist as an Establishment; the other is, whether the fall of the Irish Church will tend to draw after it the fall of the English Church? My belief is that, as to the first of these controversies, its end is near, and that those who sit opposite to me, though they may deprecate that contingency, do not doubt its early arrival. But this may happen, that the first of these controversies—namely, that which involves the question of the Established Church of Ireland—may be decided in our favour; the second of those controversies—namely, whether the Established Church of England is to be decided by the fall of the Church of Ireland—may be decided in your favour by these persistent declarations that religious equality in one quarter of the kingdom absolutely means religious equality in all, and that it is impossible to draw distinctions between the Church which is the Church of the people in the main and the Church which has not the smallest pretensions to be considered as the Church of a majority. Take care, I beseech you, lest by persistently declaring these things to be truths you make them truths, and by your own imprudence induce consequences that we have never intended and that we profoundly deprecate. Sir, these are contingencies I do hope will receive the careful consideration of Gentlemen opposite. It is not the first time we have seen such things happen in history. It may be that after public opinion has brought about the disestablishment of the Irish Church, those very Gentlemen who are now asserting the impossibility of those consequences will be found standing at this table deprecating their advent; and they may be liable to have the very principles which they are declaring for the purposes of to-night quoted against them. For my own part, I am reluctant to reiterate again and again professions which I own are of very little value. That statement may not unnaturally be received by the noble Lord (the Earl of Mayo) and by other large-minded men with a certain amount of suspicion, and it is far better to be moderate in declarations of this kind; but I must own I have stated the general grounds upon which our argument or contention proceeds—namely, that the removal of an Establishment which does not do its work is in the end, if not a positive advantage to an Establishment that does, yet, at all events, is in the nature of the removal of a very great disadvantage. I think that there is not a man who would deny that the cause of the Church of England against her antagonists, if she has them, is made more arduous and difficult by the existence of the Church Establishment in Ireland. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] Did I hear an hon. Member say “No?” I think the sound proceeds from an hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Stuart Knox) whose courage I never doubted; but certainly on no occasion has he, I think, given a more signal exemplification of that courage than in challenging that statement. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, if I interpret him aright, contends that the cause of the Church of England is improved for the purpose of argument against its adversaries by its association with the Church of Ireland.

If the hon. and gallant Gentleman adopts that argument he is, I am afraid, leading a forlorn hope, for he will not, in my belief, find even in the quarter where he sits any considerable support for that view. Our conscientious belief is that it is for the advantage of the Church of England that this controversy in Ireland should be ended; but at the same time I never desired to conceal my opinion that we must deal with this Irish question as an Irish question, and that nothing could be more impolitic with reference to the highest interests of the Empire than to adopt the course which has been often proposed and which has been proposed by some to-night—namely, that we should tell the mass of the people in Ireland that they have no choice but to endure an Establishment alien to them, and that we have no choice but to force it upon them, lest the making of alterations in the arrangements of the Irish Church should be the means of bringing the same alterations upon the Church in England. That is not the way, I hold it, to cement the Union between the two countries; if the Union between the two countries is, indeed, to be not merely a Union on paper, but a union of the hearts of men. An argument was used by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department upon which I need not dwell for more than a moment, and it is the last topic to which I shall refer. It was that the House of Lords ought to have been consulted by Resolution or Address before an attempt was made to send to them a Bill of this nature. I presume that the right hon. Gentleman was serious in making that statement, but I am not aware that upon any occasions except the very rarest—and I am certainly not aware of any whatever upon which by any except the Executive Government—an attempt has been made to put the two Houses of Parliament in action simultaneously. But if I were to refer to all the great changes which have occurred during the last thirty-five or forty years, to say that we ought to have referred them to the House of Lords, with a view to having them dealt with simultaneously in both Houses, would be the same as to say that they ought to have been extinguished in the bud, and that the country ought to have been deprived of the enormous advantages which have undoubtedly accrued from that legislation.

THE EARL OF MAYO: I hope the House will permit me to trespass upon their attention for a very few moments, and I am sure that hon. Gentlemen on both sides will acknowledge that, after the manner in which I have been alluded to in the course of this debate, I have a claim to their attention for a short time. Of the sentiments enunciated by me on the occasion referred to, when it became my duty to address the House on the part of the Government on the Motion proposed by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), I have no reason to be ashamed, and I have no words to retract. I believe that the opinions to which I then gave expression have for a very long time been shared in by the most eminent men, and by the greatest statesmen, and they are opinions of which no man who knows the state of things in Ireland has any reason to be ashamed. I maintained then, and I hold the same opinion now, that the existence of the Established Church in that country does not involve in any way a religious ascendancy in an offensive sense, by which I mean that the existence of the Established Church does not prevent the complete and free exercise by Members of other churches of their religious worship, or prevent them from placing their churches in any position they may deem desirable. The whole of the remarks I made before I used the words which have been quoted were in furtherance of that opinion. I believe a great change has for years been taking place in Ireland, and that there has been a gradual elevation of churches other than those of the Established Church, very much to the benefit of the country at large. Holding the opinions that the process which has been going on a long time was a salutary one, I firmly believe that it should not be stopped. In expressing that opinion I wished to convey to the House that I thought it was desirable that the course of ecclesiastical arrangements which has prevailed for many years should be continued, and that it should not be violently arrested. That was the opinion I expressed, and that is the opinion I still hold. I never did propose that which I am accused of having proposed — namely, an immediate and large endowment by the State for religious purposes. I defy anyone to quote any single expression of mine which would lead him to think that any proposal of that kind was either possible or desirable. With regard to the Regium Donum, I had the pleasure several times this spring of communicating with gentlemen who are anxious that that grant should be increased. I told those gentlemen what I have before stated in this House—that it was a miserable pittance, and was totally inadequate for the purposes for which Parliament originally gave it; but I told them at the same time that, considering the present feeling of the House and the temper of the country, it would be useless and mischievous to propose an increase of that Grant, so that my opinion upon this point is well known to the persons most interested in the matter. No one who has sat as long as I have in this House could believe that any Government would be wise in proposing a large scheme for the payment of Roman Catholic priests. Looking to the strong feeling in this House and to the repeated declarations of the Roman Catholics themselves as to their acceptance of salaries for their clergy, no man in his senses would think of making such a proposition, and it is impossible to discover from anything that I have said that either I or any Member of the Government ever contemplated such a proposal. But I must remind the House what has been the line of policy adopted by them for many years on this question. I must remind them how the Maynooth Grant has been increased and how the Regium Donum has been over and over again maintained, and how from time to time chaplains of all denominations of Christians have been appointed to public institutions, workhouses, and gaols, and how chaplains of all denominations have been appointed to the Army with the sanction of the House. Throughout my whole speech I intended to convey to the House that I thought that the policy which the Legislature has pursued for some time ought to be continued, and that it might be desirable when the opportunity arose that that policy should be further enlarged. I believe that in expressing those opinions I expressed the opinion of every man who has studied the state of Ireland for the last sixty years, and that I was only enunciating the opinions of Pitt, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Derby, Sir James Graham, Earl Russell, and opinions that had been repeatedly urged for many years with eloquence and power by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. I beg to remind the House that I distinctly stated that of all means to be adopted for remedying Irish grievances I thought confiscation the very worst; and I believe that any proposal for the immediate overthrow of the Irish Church would be attended with dangerous consequences, some of which we have already witnessed, and I announced distinctly as the cardinal policy of the Government, that we were prepared to maintain in Ireland and in every part of the United Kingdom the religious Establishments that now exist.

Mr. NEWDEGATE attempted to address the House, but was inaudible in consequence of persistent cries of "Divide!" and "Question!"

Question put.

IRELAND—PARTY PROCESSIONS ACT.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in the opinion of the Government, the time is not arrived when it would be wiser to repeal the Party Processions Act (Ireland); and whether, in their opinion, the preservation of the public peace could not be equally secured by a strict administration of the Common Law of the land?

THE EARL OF MAYO replied, that, in answer to the Question put to him by the hon. Member for Belfast some time ago, he stated that it was not the intention of the Government to propose during the present Session the repeal of the Party Processions Act. He also stated that he thought that, after the authoritative and lucid manner in which the law had been stated by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, it was quite clear that no uncertainty as to the state of the law could exist. That learned Judge laid down that there were three things necessary to constitute a breach of the law. The first was, that there should be an assembling together in procession; the second was, that there should be the bearing of flags and emblems; and the third was, that the wearing of distinctive sashes and symbols should be such as was calculated to provoke animosity and ill-feeling between various classes of Her Majesty's subjects. At the same time he (the Earl of Mayo) stated that any uncertainty which could possibly arise, must arise from juries taking different views as to the meaning of the words "calculated to provoke animosity and ill-feeling between various classes of Her Majesty's subjects." The Government had considered these words with the greatest care, with a view, if possible, to render them more clear; but they had come to the decision that such an amendment as was proposed was impossible, and that these words could not be altered without materially interfering with that right of meeting for the purpose of public discussion which the Government, in common with the Members of that House, felt ought not to be restricted. He regretted most deeply that a feeling should prevail that the law had not been administered with impartiality. All he could say was, that as far as the present Government was concerned, they had endeavoured to administer the law with the strictest impartiality and fairness; and he felt convinced that Parliament would never be prepared to repeal this Act, unless such a state of things came about, that in the celebration of these anniversaries and meetings parties would abstain from exhibiting those flags and symbols which every candid man must admit were calculated to provoke animosity and ill-feeling between the various classes of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland. He did not think the existence of the Party Processions Act interfered with the Common Law of the land. If a breach of peace should occur in connection with these processions, it would be tried under the Common Law. The Act in question constituted an offence which was totally irrespective of the fact whether a breach of the peace occurred or not.

POST OFFICE—WEST INDIA MAILS.

QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If any decision has been arrived at as to the substitution of another island for that of St. Thomas as the Harbour and Depôt of the West India and Pacific Mails; and, if he will consent that no change or renewal of the existing contract shall be sanctioned by the Government till the whole subject has been submitted to the examination of a Committee of this House, with power to take evidence?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, it has been proposed by the Government to extend the existing contract for a limited period; but in the contract provision is made for the substitution of some other station for St. Thomas, and the Government have been collecting information on the subject and are about to take it into consideration, with the view of arriving at an early decision. It would not conduce to a speedy or satisfactory decision if the matter were now submitted to a Committee of this House. The hon. Member must recollect that, in accordance with the usual practice, the contract, when completed, must be submitted to the House for its approval, and the best course will be to follow the usual precedent in such cases.

DURHAM COUNTY COURTS.

QUESTION.

MR. HENDERSON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why so much time has been wasted and the best season of the year for building purposes allowed to pass away without any progress having been made towards the erection of the new County Courts in the city of Durham, Government having purchased and had possession of a site for that purpose several months, and the house where the present Courts are held being most inconvenient and entirely unfit for the conduct of public business?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH replied, that he was informed that the purchase of land in the city of Durham was not for the purpose of County Courts, but for the construction of offices in connection with the County Courts; and the reason why the building was not proceeded with was because the Estimate connected with County Courts was already very large, and it was thought desirable to give the money to those towns where the accommodation of County Courts was wanted. Durham already had a County Court well adapted for its purpose.

QUEENSLAND—POLYNESIAN LABOURERS.—QUESTION.

MR. TAYLOR said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he can state when the Correspondence relating to the importation of Polynesian labourers into Queensland will be laid upon the Table?

MR. ADDERLEY stated, in reply, that the Bill of the Queensland Legislature, guarding against any abuse of immigration from the South Sea Islands, had only reached the Colonial Office that day, and the Government had not had time to consider it. The allegations of abuse from various quarters had been referred back to those who made them for their authority, and when the answers had been received the Paper should be laid on the table.

POSTAL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, To State the proportions in which the sums collected as postage, in connection with the services referred to in Parliamentary Paper, No. 68 of the present Session, are divided amongst the several contributories in diminution of their shares in the cost of those services; and, if he will lay upon the Table an account of the sums so divided for the years ended the 31st of March of 1867 and 1868, and of the adjustments made with the contributories in question in respect of their shares?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that the sums paid for postage in India, Australia, and England were divided, after certain deductions, equally among the contributory countries; and if the hon. Member moved for a Return of the sums divided, and of the manner of the division for 1867 and the current year, that Return would give a more clear explanation of the point than any statement he could now make.

ARMY—PAYMENT OF MUSKETRY INSTRUCTORS.—QUESTIONS.

MAJOR ANSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is his intention to consolidate the pay of officers and sergeant-instructors of musketry and gymnastics, and reduce the amount on the plea that they only receive working pay, and do not work on Sundays; and, if so, whether this system of retrenchment will be extended to the War Office, and the pay of the clerks in that department diminished by an amount equal to fifty-two days per annum?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, there were several classes of persons under the War Office performing continuous duty, and it was proposed that they should all be paid on the same principle.

LORD ELCHIO said, he wished to know, Whether musketry instructors were employed by the year, month, or hour?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he did not think they were appointed by the year, or for any exact period. They were appointed for a certain duty, and for so long as their assistance was required.

RIOTS AT ASHTON, STALEY BRIDGE, BIRMINGHAM, &c.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE, who had given Notice to ask the Secretary of State for the Home

Department, Whether his attention has been seriously called to the frequent instances of riot and disturbance, injury to person and destruction of property, caused in certain districts of this country by the addresses of a person named Murphy, and his colleagues; and whether he could give any assurance to the House that the delivery of such addresses could be prevented for the future? said, he desired to supplement his Question by a brief statement and that he might put himself in Order, he would conclude with a Motion for the adjournment of the House. He thought if the House would attend to him for a very short time, there was not a Member of the House who would not feel he was justified in calling the attention of the House to the subject of his Question. He was sure that every good and generous man in the country must have witnessed with pain and disgust the systematic attempts which had been for some time past made to excite evil passions and sow dissension among the population in many of the manufacturing districts of the country, by inflaming those prejudices which naturally arose from differences of religion and of race—prejudices which he asserted every Christian man and true patriot ought rather endeavour to allay. There was, as they all knew, a considerable Irish Catholic population in many of the large cities of England; and throughout every manufacturing town in England there was a considerable number of Irishmen and Catholics. Now, he did not claim for his countrymen any peculiar excellence. Like other branches of the human family they had their defects and their weaknesses, but none even of their worst enemies denied that they possessed many sterling qualities and many great virtues, or that they were deeply attached to their country and their faith. He was not in the least opposed to free discussion, and had no desire to stifle the expression of public opinion; but there was a great difference between free discussion and a licence to abuse and outrage the religion of others. There had been during the past twelve months, in nearly all the leading communities, attempts made on the part of a certain organization which he would not mention, to inflame the passions of the English people against the Irish; and the religion of the Roman Catholics had been made the pretext of the assault. He intended only to refer to the late proceedings at Ashton-under-Lyne, and would not allude to what had taken place at Blackburn and Birmingham. This was a matter of life and death to many, and as interesting to the people of this country as any question which could be brought under the notice of Parliament. Wherever this Mr. Murphy and the agents of the society to which he had alluded had gone—wherever they had raised the standard of intolerance the result had been most mischievous. There had been rioting, destruction of property, and sometimes loss of life.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rose to Order. He was far from wishing to deprive the hon. Member of any latitude the House might wish to accord him; but he hoped the hon. Member would not depart from the usual—"Order."]

MR. MAGUIRE said, he believed he was perfectly in Order. He did not wish to do anything to cause ill-feeling in the House or out of it. His only object was to put an end to a state of things which caused bad blood throughout the community, and to enable men of different religious views to live in peace and amity. For the last three or four months the people of Ashton had been kept in constant fear and apprehension by the advent of these emissaries of disturbance; and he had it on the authority of a clergyman that during that time the Roman Catholics had been obliged to stop up night after night to protect their churches and schools. On the 9th instant there was a great tea party, consisting of about 1,000 persons, most of them wearing Orange ribbons. On the next day, which was Sunday, there was an Orange procession. He was sorry to say that the Irish were provoked, and no doubt they were parties to the riot that ensued; but it should be remembered that they had been systematically provoked for months previously. After they were dispersed, at a late hour of the night two Catholic chapels were nearly gutted, and the houses in several of the streets in which the Irish dwelt were wrecked. His complaint was, that the magistrates did not take any active steps to suppress that riot. He made that assertion on the authority of a letter he had received from Mr. Aspland, Chairman of the Lancashire county magistrates, a gentleman who was not a Catholic, but, he believed, a Unitarian, and a man of the highest character. Mr. Aspland stated that the riot was allowed to proceed for four hours without any attempt being made to check it. The riot, which commenced on the Sunday, was continued on the Monday morning though the Home Secretary was asked by some clergymen to afford them protection. Fifty-one houses were wrecked and gutted on the Monday night. He was informed that although 500 special constables had been enrolled during the day, and one of the officers of police who had at his command a large body of policemen offered his services at the Town Hall, the magistrates did not accept his assistance. They seemed to be utterly helpless and feeble, and the result was a state of things utterly disgraceful to a Christian country. One hundred and ten houses and shops, two chapels, one school, one hall, and two priests' houses were wrecked. Wherever this Murphy appeared there was riot and disorder. Speaking of Ireland, Murphy said, "The country can never be quiet until every Catholic priest is hanged." Referring to an execution that took place, Murphy said he would put the rope around the culprit's neck, and around the neck of the priest too. Scarcely under any circumstances had the magistrates of the manufacturing districts been equal to the discharge of their duty. He (Mr. Maguire) would tell the House what he did when charged, under similar circumstances, with the preservation of the peace of his own city, and what these magistrates could have also done. In the midst of the Belfast riots there was great excitement in his city, and at that time a person came to lecture there against "Anti-Christ" and the Pope. He knew that persons would have gone to meet those who assembled to receive that man, and at every risk he stopped him. Being a Catholic, he stopped him at the risk of being charged with bigotry; but there was a time when a man must brave everything to save the peace of the community. Though he incurred for himself the deadliest hostility amongst those who entertained strong views on religion, he had the approval of every man who loved peace and order. He wished to ask the Home Secretary what steps were taken to preserve the peace? Was he satisfied that sufficient precautions were adopted? When the riot commenced was it stopped with vigour? And what steps would be taken to prevent this man from going to other parts of England and producing elsewhere the same terrible results? In his programme, issued at Bury, Murphy stated that he would take his wooden walls to Manchester. Every man knew there was an enormous Irish population in Manchester, and they might anticipate what would be the result. He said that, in spite of the authorities, he would go there. He said he would go to Preston and every town in Lancashire, and would not fail to visit Liverpool. There being 150,000 Roman Catholics in Liverpool they must see what would be the effect of inflaming the passions of the Protestants and Catholics there. Murphy said there were Irishmen in Liverpool whose motto was "No surrender;" and declared that one of them was better than forty Papists. The Duke of Wellington did not think so.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK rose to Order. He objected to the hon. Gentleman reading from a newspaper.

MR. MAGUIRE explained that he had read from the paper because he did not wish to quote from memory, which might prove fallible. Murphy stated in his programme that he intended to make the tour of all these places, and he (Mr. Maguire) asked if the local authorities and the Home Office were prepared to accept the challenge Murphy had given to them? Were they prepared to prevent the preaching of disunion, and to take steps for the preservation of the peace? He (Mr. Maguire) wished that his countrymen would not mind this man; but that was asking from them more than human nature was capable of. He knew also that their clergymen had given them the best advice. The disciples and followers of Murphy wherever they met the Roman Catholics in the Lancashire districts retailed the infamous statements they heard from Murphy's platform, offending fathers, mothers, and sisters and brothers in their dearest and most sacred feelings. The Catholic clergy were outraged in every way, and were actually afraid for their lives, having received frequent threats, and the nuns in the district were made the subjects of the vilest and grossest abuse. The book called Maria Monk, which had been exposed as a lie in America, forty-three years ago, was disseminated by these people as a means of casting the vilest odium on those whom every Catholic reveres and every Protestant gentleman of honour must respect. He hoped the House would consider he had said nothing offensive to anyone in bringing this matter before the House. Although he did not wish to interfere with the Business of the House, merely asking a Question under the circumstances would not satisfy him. He now asked the right hon. Gentleman, in the name of 200 memorialists, that there should be an investigation into the cause of these riots. The prayer of the memorial was in these words—

"That the undersigned magistrates and others whose names and descriptions are herein underwritten, humbly request that a Commission be issued by Her Majesty's Government to inquire into the late riots at Ashton-under-Lyne, the cause of these riots, and the proceedings of the authorities, with the view to the Commission pointing out remedial measures for the suppression of such conduct as has been and is now affecting the manufacturing districts of Lancashire."

That memorial was signed by twelve clergymen, eight magistrates, four medical men, one solicitor, four manufacturers, and 161 others. He would conclude by reading a few lines which he had received from a Scotch soldier—who was a Presbyterian and Christian—with reference to the Notice he had placed on the Paper. He believed that letter would meet with the sympathy of every man in that House. It ran as follows:—

"I am an old officer who has served in the four quarters of the globe, and I have commanded many hundreds of Irishmen and Catholics with the greatest satisfaction. I am an elder of the Presbyterian Kirk; but I have an utter contempt for those who insult others through the religion in which they were born and bred."

Now he (Mr. Maguire) would simply ask for protection for these poor people that they might live in peace in the midst of the society in which they had cast their lot. He might tell those who were the authors of this abominable propagandism that the most grievous consequences, not local merely, but Imperial, would result from the continuance of this detestable strife. He knew that hundreds and thousands of these people had emigrated from the manufacturing districts to America on account of the causes he was deploring. They did not want to increase the feeling in that country against England. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Maguire.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, every one must feel with the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) how disgraceful and discreditable the riots which have occurred in the North of England have been to the parties concerned; and I cannot sufficiently deplore and condemn the excesses committed in Ashton in the wrecking of a whole street, and the destruction of a Roman Catholic chapel. At the same time, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has been altogether just to the magistrates of that place. The Mayor at the time when the riots occurred was absent, but it is stated to me that there was a gentleman named Mason—I believe a magistrate for two counties and also for the borough—who from the first moment that he received notice, while at chapel, was with little intermission in constant attendance during the entire week, and did all in his power to put a stop to the riots. It appears from a statement I have received from the Mayor that in January last there was some apprehension of riots, and special constables were sworn in to the number of 100. The local authorities received instructions to assemble them when occasion required, and they were assembled with the police at the Town Hall on the first evening of the riots, and the troops were also sent for; but on the Sunday evening the excesses do not seem to have gone very far. I do not intend to enter into the circumstances which attended the riots, or to say which party was the aggressor, as that does not come within the scope of the hon. Gentleman's Question. But on the Monday these violent outrages were renewed, and great destruction of property, no doubt, took place. With respect, I will not say to the proximate cause, but to the original cause of those disturbances, the hon. Member attributed them to the addresses of a person named Murphy and his associates, who have been lecturing in the North of England. The Question which the hon. Gentleman put on the Paper, and which is hardly addressed to the point to which the hon. Gentlemen adverted towards the close of his remarks—namely, the issue of a Commission—is whether I could give an assurance to the House that the delivery of such addresses could be prevented for the future? Now, as I understand, the mode which is adopted by Mr. Murphy when he is going to lecture at a place is either to hire a room for the purpose or to make use of a building which belongs to him, and to which persons are admitted by ticket. There is no analogy in such proceedings to meetings held in the open air, and I am not aware that there is any law in existence by which a person can be prevented from delivering controversial lectures either in a room which he takes or a structure which he carries about for the purpose. No person is compelled to attend those lectures. If, however, such a lecturer uses language calculated to lead to a breach of the peace, or of a seditious or blasphemous character there is a remedy; but so long as the person lecturing confines himself to what the law cannot take hold of I am not aware of any means of putting a stop to the delivery of such lectures. The hon. Member said he should be averse from any interference with free discussion; but I am afraid, unless you were to impose a limit with regard to the language used, which would be found intolerable, you must rely under the present law on the moderation of those who lecture, and on the authority of persons of influence on their side, whether in religion or politics, to make them temperate in the language they employ. I am not able to say, therefore, that I contemplate any mode by which persons going to deliver controversial lectures which in themselves are not wrong, in buildings which are their own or are hired, can be prevented from doing so. The hon. Gentleman is aware that it is in the power of any person, who has reason to apprehend that such lectures are likely to lead to a breach of the peace, to swear an information to that effect, and so bring the question to an issue. But that is a question for the local authorities, and not for any central authority in London. With respect to the part I have taken, it has been this—The Roman Catholic clergymen to whom the hon. Gentlemen referred telegraphed to me, and I at once telegraphed back to the chief constable and magistrates of the borough telling them they could have extra assistance if required, and at the same time I called on them to swear in a sufficient number of special constables, and if they could not find as many as they required to apply for military aid. We received an answer to the effect that they did not require any additional assistance, for that the force at their disposal was sufficient. I am not aware that after that there was any extreme disturbance. I believe during the week afterwards they were able to maintain order in the town. There are now a great many persons waiting to take their trial, and I believe, without issuing a formal Commission, the facts of the case will come out fully in the ordinary way before a jury, otherwise I might perhaps have been prepared to issue a Commission; but I believe that such a course now might prejudice the trials about to take place before the Judges of the land. Without entering into detail, which I do not think the present occasion calls for, I will say this, that every effort will be made by the authorities in London to assist magistrates who require aid in their endeavours to keep the peace. But information must be sworn before the local authorities if the protection of the law is to be appealed to; for I am not aware that, without entirely interfering with free discussion, we have any other means of putting down such proceedings as those of which the hon. Gentleman complains.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he should not do his duty if he did not make a remark or two with respect to the conduct of the magistrates of Ashton during the recent disturbances, as it had been impugned by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire). He had gone into this matter with considerable care, and he had come to an entirely opposite conclusion from that of the hon. Gentleman. His conclusion was, that the magistrates and chief constable had shown remarkable skill and firmness, accompanied by moderation, in dealing with the riots. It should always be remembered that the police force of a borough was not constituted to deal with a riot every day in the week, and when a disturbance such as that under discussion sprang up unexpectedly and suddenly, of course the magistrates were placed in considerable difficulty. He begged the House, however, to take this strong fact into account, that, although there was a deplorable destruction of property in one or two streets, and the homes of some of the poor Irish were sacked and their furniture burnt, yet the riots were put an end to without the loss of a single life, and he believed there was only one person who could be said to have received any serious personal injury. As the Secretary of State had said, the rioting on Sunday was not considerable, and, though unexpected by the authorities, it was put down by means of the police and special constables with comparatively little difficulty. It commenced again on Monday evening, and what did the magistrates do? Mr. Mason wrote a letter to the commanding officer, who was in barracks not a mile distant, to keep his troops in readiness, and he also wrote and carried about in his pocket another letter, and kept a mounted messenger by his side to take it to the officer, requiring him to put his men in motion without delay. The magistrates, of course, acted with him, and constables were placed in all parts of the town to watch, so that the force collected at the Town Hall, consisting of special constables and a large body of county and borough police, might be sent to any point where a riot might break out. A riot occurred in a particular street, where houses were sacked and windows broken; but in a few minutes the special constables and police, accompanied by the magistrates, were on the spot, and the riot at once ceased, no resistance being offered to the authorities. After this, information arriving that an attack was being made on St. Mary's Catholic Chapel, the police and special constables were immediately sent to the spot, and that riot also was put down. Now, considering that the disturbances had been suppressed by the use of the constable's staff, and not by the unnecessary use of the military, he thought that, instead of blame being imputed to the magistrates, they ought to be thanked for the skill which they had displayed in putting down the riots without any more serious results. While concurring in that part of the hon. Member's remarks which referred to the lectures of Mr. Murphy, he must call the attention of the Home Secretary to a branch of the subject which had not been noticed. The riot in Ashton on Sunday, the 10th, was not caused by any lecture by Mr. Murphy. Mr. Murphy had been there in the preceding January, and probably a certain feverish feeling existed in the town between Catholics and Protestants; but what occurred on Saturday, the 9th, the day previous to the riots? Why, a great political meeting was held, under the auspices of a society called the Protestant Electoral Union. The clergy of the district were present, and the speeches for the most part condemned in no measured language the proceedings of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). One of the rev. speakers was Dr. Tresham Gregg, who came from Dublin, and described himself as a gentleman who had a valuable living in Ireland; but, from the extraordinary anomalous state of the law, had no duties to perform in connection with that living. He stated that he nevertheless felt it his duty to devote himself to the service of his religion, and that every minute of his time had been occupied in meditation and in thinking how he could benefit the Protestant interest, and promote the cause of religion. He added that he had a plan which would raise all classes to one social level, and would sweep away Popery for ever. Several other clergymen made speeches of a very strong character; but since it might not be in Order to quote them, he would not describe them from memory. Many of the clergy and leading persons of the district were present at the meeting, which was called a tea-party. The president was provided with what was called, at the opening of the proceedings, an Orangeman's hat, which he put on in order to preside in proper form and with due dignity, and there was an immense display of Orange favours. A great number wore these ribands, and the next day whole streets were filled with persons flaunting them in the faces of the Irish. Well, the Irish donned their green, and on that Sunday afternoon the riot began. The authorities had had no apprehension of serious disturbance, the chief constable having given the magistrates an assurance that, notwithstanding the violent speeches, things had since gone on peaceably. Indeed, he had left Ashton for the purpose of visiting some of his relations. Now, he (Mr. Milner Gibson) called upon the Home Secretary to use his influence with his political friends, so that upon occasions of this kind, when there were Orange parties, they might not deck themselves with orange ribands at tea parties, in the midst of a population already excited by the lectures delivered by Murphy and other agitators. Speaking advisedly, he thought it would have been becoming that these clergy should not have attended a meeting of such a strong party character. He had no doubt that the most respectable Conservatives altogether repudiated Murphy; but he begged to inform the Secretary of State for the Home Department that at this Protestant Electoral Union meeting a verse of "Rule Britannia" having been sung, three cheers were proposed for Mr. Murphy, and were received with a will. To a certain extent, therefore, those present at the meeting identified themselves with the teachings of Murphy. He thought the Secretary of State for the Home Department had exercised a wise discretion in not countenancing the idea that there was any case for a Commission; for, deplorable though the riots had been, and attended with much mischief to many poor families, he believed the accounts had been much exaggerated, and he further believed that the magistrates had performed their duty with ability and discretion.

MR. WHALLEY said, he hoped the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton (Mr. Milner Gibson) had been mere badinage, and that he had not gravely called attention to the orange ribands at the meeting of the Protestant

Mr. Milner Gibson

Electoral Union as an excuse for the outrages which had been committed. He was, himself, a subscriber to that in common with many other Protestant societies; and he sincerely assured the House that if all the facts could be fully stated this subject would be one of the most important questions that had ever been brought before them. If, however, the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) imputed to him responsibility for this society or for Mr. Murphy—as from his frequently turning to him during his speech he appeared to do—why had he given him no notice of his intention to bring the subject forward? He had no idea, on coming down to the House, that this discussion would occur. The President of the Union had that day called upon him, and had read to him an account of these transactions, which went to show that at no period of our history had there been a more deliberate organization on the part of the Romish priesthood for putting down freedom of speech. Boys at school, even, were drilled for the purpose of answering the summons of the priest and putting down all obnoxious speakers. Men were drilled in their chapels for the same purpose; and, indeed, there was a system of terrorism for putting down every kind of discussion. As the right hon Gentleman the Member for Ashton had clearly shown, it was not this Mr. Murphy who had excited the disturbances, but the Rev. Tresham Gregg, or some other person; so that the excuse on which the Question had been brought forward was altogether fallacious. For his own part, he had had no communication with this Mr. Murphy for eight or nine months, and he had had no communication with the Electoral Union; so that he was not an interested party in the matter. He believed, however, that a more honest, truthful, and he might almost say a more careful man in his statements, had never appeared as a public lecturer than this Mr. Murphy. As to a Commission, this was by no means the first time that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway had asked for an investigation; but they had invariably shrunk from it when the opportunity had been offered to them. He should be glad to believe that the hon. Member was serious in his suggestion for an investigation; but he really did not mean it, and he defied him to an investigation.

MR. MAGUIRE rose to Order. Was it Parliamentary for a Member to say that another Member had distinctly told a lie?

He had made a certain statement, and meant it in all faith and honour. Now, had any Gentleman a right to imply that he had not spoken truly?

MR. SPEAKER: Certainly not.

MR. WHALLEY said, that on a previous occasion the hon. Member for Cashel (Mr. O'Beirne) challenged him to prove a certain statement; but after an hour spent in vainly attempting to appeal to the honour and rectitude of the hon. Member, so as to be allowed to redeem the pledge, the Speaker interposed, and he had to desist. If he had said anything offensive to the hon. Member for Cork he exceedingly regretted it; and he was sorry he could not believe that the hon. Member had the least intention or expectation of a Commission being granted.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member must not repeat what he had already been told was not in Order or Parliamentary.

MR. WHALLEY said, that as the hon. Member had placed no Notice on the Paper of any investigation he was not justified in making the statements he had made. He believed that, although the hon. Member was of course unconscious of the fact, the statement he had made was the exact reverse of the truth. Would the House permit him to state what he knew on the subject? He had stated that he would be answerable for the statements of Mr. Murphy. Upon two occasions, when Mr. Murphy was lecturing in Birmingham, he had made inquiries in order to ascertain whether the reports of his lectures in the London newspapers were correct, because if they had been he should have withdrawn from the society that sent Mr. Murphy forth. He found, however, that these reports of what Mr. Murphy had said were entirely fabricated, and that not one word of the kind had been uttered by Mr. Murphy. No doubt the tendency of the proceedings was towards the effect mentioned by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Milner Gibson) but that was solely through the reading of documents furnished by Popery itself. Instead of answering him, an organization of men, boys, women, and girls had been got, and this was the cause of the riots at Wolverhampton, Birmingham, and other places. The question was, whether there should be the right of public discussion on these matters in our towns. Why, there was scarcely the right to speak in that House. He most cordially supported the suggestion that there should be an investigation into this subject.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to state a material fact to show that Mr. Murphy's lectures ought to be put an end to. He had himself been present at one of these meetings at Chelmsford, and had not only heard Murphy say that all the convents in England ought to be burnt, but had heard him incite a mob of the lowest description to go and burn the neighbouring convent of New Hall. [MR. WHALLEY: What did he say?] He (Sir George Bowyer) should be the last man to wish to restrict fair discussion; but when a lecturer incited those before him to commit crimes and breaches of the peace that was not fair discussion. In the course of those outrages churches had been destroyed, the houses of Roman Catholics had been gutted, offences against the peace had been committed; there were disturbances wherever Mr. Murphy went; and the reason was that he did not restrict himself to fair discussion, but incited the people to commit outrages against the law. These occurrences deserved the serious consideration of the Secretary of State, in order that he might put a stop to meetings which were not held for purposes of discussion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the greater portion of the speech of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) was not in accordance with the mere Question, of which he had given Notice. The hon. Member had made statements with reference to cases of riot, for which numerous persons had been committed and were to be tried. It seemed to him (Mr. Newdegate) that this was not fair, and that it looked like an attempt to prejudice cases of men who are now sub judice. He rejoiced at the answer given by the Home Secretary. He knew nothing of Mr. Murphy, except that he was connected with the Protestant Electoral Union, a body to which he (Mr. Newdegate) did not belong. When the disturbances broke out last year at Birmingham, the reports of them were at first so uncertain, and so garbled, that he requested a friend to go down and inquire what had happened. It appeared that Mr. Murphy had arrived at Birmingham, and had given notice of his intention to deliver lectures. On the Sunday previous to his lectures he was to hold a service in his temporary hall; but before he opened his lips several persons who were going to the building were knocked down in the streets. Now, that was not what Englishmen were accustomed to, and that was the origin of what were called Orange disturbances at Birmingham. The hon. Member told them that there was a proposal to hold such a discussion in Cork, and that he had exerted himself to put it down. But the people of England were not accustomed to have free, if lawful, discussions put down by violence. From what occurred last year in Birmingham, he believed that there was great danger to freedom of discussion, since the Roman Catholic population appeared to be organized, and committed outrage before the discussion began. They had no right to interrupt discussions in private buildings hired for the purpose; but if they were to be attacked before the discussions began, he thought that the spirit of the people would not bear coercion of that kind, which they knew to be contrary to the law. He was glad to hear that the Home Secretary had decided that these matters should be left to the action of the Courts of Law. One of the strangest signs of the time was an extraordinary decision lately given, by which a book, called The Confessional Unmasked, had been condemned by the Court of Queen's Bench. This book might be per se, objectionable; but the judgment appeared to have been delivered upon a false issue, assumed by the Court itself. The learned Judges seem to have supposed that the doctrines, which this book was intended to expose and to arrest, were not current. There was a case, however, which would be recollected by the elder Members of that House, in which an hon. Member (Sir J. Tyrrell) rose in his place and stated that an attempt had been made by a Romish priest to convert a female member of his family by placing in her hands a book founded upon the authorities, whose doctrines the work known as The Confessional Unmasked was intended to expose. He made that statement to show that while the Roman Catholics appealed against the excitement caused by these lectures, the rights of families were invaded by the secret and insidious introduction of books, such as were condemned by the work in question. The Protestants were not the first aggressors, either in Birmingham or in Ashton; and if the hon. Member for Cork were anxious for the preservation of peace, he must induce persons of his own religion to abstain from outrage before discussions commenced, and during discussion, when that discussion was conducted within the limits of the law, and in places hired for the purpose of carrying it on. Should the hon. Member for Cork feel it his duty hereafter to bring any question of that sort before the House, he hoped he would give such a Notice as would enable hon. Members to be prepared to discuss the topics he might introduce.

Mr. PAULL said, he wished to call attention to the extreme inconvenience of that Motion having been made at all. The custom, often stated by Mr. Speaker, and which he thought amounted to a rule, was that Motions for the adjournment of the House ought not to be made unless some pressing emergency existed; and, he thought it would be a very advantageous thing if Mr. Speaker, on such occasions as the present, enforced his opinion to that effect.

THE CONVICT BARRETT. — QUESTION.

Mr. BRIGHT: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of putting a Question on a very different subject, and I put it with extreme pain, with a great sense of responsibility as far as I am personally concerned, and with no less an appreciation of the responsibility of the Minister to whom I am about to address it — the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. It is with reference to a paragraph that has appeared in the newspapers announcing the decision of the Home Office in the case of the convict Barrett. I know that many Members of the House will blame me for the course I am taking; but at the same time, I beg they will believe me when I say that I never rose to say anything in this House under a stronger sense that it was my duty to say it, or with a greater feeling of pain than I experience in intruding a subject of this nature on their attention. I am not about to make a speech at all; but the House knows that on two occasions the execution of this convict has been postponed, first for a week and afterwards for another week; that an inquiry has been made, conducted on the part of the convict by friends of his, and by his counsel and solicitor, and on the part of the Home Office by some gentlemen sent down to Glasgow from that Department. At least one of the investigations was held in public. The other, I believe, was not; but I am not about to challenge either the one or the other. I merely state this to show the amount of care that has been taken in their conduct; for the right hon. Gentleman has taken great pains, I believe with the view of ascertaining the truth in this matter. I have no doubt he holds, with a very old writer, that—

No time can be too long, no pains too great.”

And he has taken those pains. But the statement made to me is this: that the case has been referred to the Lord Chief Justice before whom the trial took place, and that the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice, which of course must have great weight, is unfavourable to the prisoner. But it is further stated that the points on which the Lord Chief Justice has come to his decision are points which arose out of the evidence that was in the possession of the Crown Lawyers at the time of the trial, but which at the trial was not produced. And it is argued with some force, I think, that it is very unfortunate for a prisoner who has been convicted that a doubt should arise as to the propriety of the conviction, and that then the conviction should be confirmed upon evidence which was in the possession of the Crown Lawyers at the trial but was not then produced. Now, I am able positively to say that persons who are as much interested in the right in this matter as the right hon. Gentleman, and much more so than I have any right to be, are of opinion that the conviction is not to be sustained by the evidence; and more—I beg the House to listen—that it is affirmed that it is within the power of the right hon. Gentleman to have the case retried on another charge of murder arising out of the same unhappy outrage; and that if that second trial took place before a jury, when the whole of the former evidence, and also the whole of the subsequent evidence would be submitted to them, the result, whatever it might be, would be felt to be much more fair to the prisoner and much more satisfactory to the public. I am empowered to say on behalf of those most interested, and on behalf of the prisoner himself, that there will be no plea of a former acquittal if that second trial takes place, and that, therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman has the power—there are many cases, of course, in which it could not be done, but the peculiarity of this case is such as I believe to admit of it—I say if he has—or had—the power, even at this late hour, I would suggest that such a course as that should be adopted. The House will permit me to observe that with all my experience of Home Secretaries—and it has now extended over twenty-five years—I can say of the right hon. Gentleman, as of all his predecessors, that he has taken great pains, with, I believe, as great an anxiety as I could have felt to come to a right decision on the case. I have never known a Home Secretary—I believe there has not been one in our time, and I hope there never will be one—who would not devote all the care that is possible to ascertainment of the truth and the doing of justice in cases of this nature. Therefore in what I say I am not even insinuating a charge of any kind against the right hon. Gentleman. I can only say of him, as of his predecessors, that in cases of this description I think all men ought to show towards the Secretary of State for the Home Department the greatest possible forbearance, and should give him credit for the most careful exercise of his judgment, and should remove out of his way anything whatsoever that could give him pain in the discharge of the tremendous, and, I will say, the appalling duty which the law lays upon him in cases of this nature.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, in rising again I have to ask the permission of the House, because I have already spoken upon this Motion. I have nothing to complain of in the manner, the tone, or the language in which the hon. Gentleman addressed me in calling my attention to this momentous subject; nor, I think, can he exaggerate the importance which belongs to the office which the Home Secretary has to discharge in cases in which appeals are made to him to recommend an exercise of the prerogative of mercy; and more especially in a case such as this, which involves a question of life and death. I will just explain to the House very briefly the position in which this case stands. Upon the trial of the man who now lies under sentence of death evidence was called for the defence, setting up an alibi on the part of the prisoner. That alibi was tried by a jury, and was negatived. Subsequently memorials were sent in, unfortunately not very early but so short a time before the day fixed for the execution that it became my duty, in order that the allegations in those memorials might be fairly weighed, to respite the execution in the first instance, and, having examined them myself, to do what is done in all these cases—namely, transmit them for the examination of the Judge, or rather in this instance of the Judges who tried the case, for the trial was held before the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Baron Bramwell. Therefore, on the documents coming up called declarations or affidavits, but which were not affidavits of such a character as is usual in Courts of Justice, for I doubt whether perjury could have been assigned upon them—on those documents being sent up setting up the same alibi as had been previously raised, and other evidence as to the prisoner having been at Glasgow at the time he was said to have been in London, an officer belonging to the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury went down to Glasgow to make all inquiries, and ascertain the truth as to the affidavits that had been made. Certain other affidavits were made before him there. I am not aware that any search was made for persons to give evidence against the prisoner; but there were persons who came forward and gave evidence of what they knew on the subject, and those affidavits were also transmitted to London and laid before the Judges. In addition to that there were likewise certain documents in the possession, I will not say of the Crown Lawyers, but of the authorities at the time of the trial, and they were not brought forward at the trial because they did not appear to bear upon the question then before the Court. But there were questions raised which were not foreseen at the trial, and which were immediately in connection with the second case of the alibi; and especially as to the convict having gone by a particular name. Those documents also were placed before the Judges. I do not in all my life remember any instance in which a more careful investigation was given than that which was given by the Lord Chief Justice in this case. Satisfied as the Lord Chief Justice was with the verdict—satisfied as he was in the first instance that the verdict was correct, and satisfied, also, as Mr. Baron Bramwell was in the first instance of its correctness, he went into the investigation almost as if there had been no trial at all, in order to come to a conclusion upon it. Having completed that inquiry, and investigated the case with the greatest minuteness, both those learned Judges arrived at the conclusion that there was no ground for suspecting the accuracy of the verdict. They did not recommend that there should be any further trial such as the hon. Gentleman suggests—for that matter was also before them—but they came to the conclusion—and in that conclusion I have felt myself bound most entirely to concur—that the circumstances of the case are such as to leave no doubt in the minds of those who have investigated them, that the man is guilty of the charge.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

EX-GOVERNOR EYRE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL JERVIS said, he rose for the purpose of asking a Question of the Government, and, as he intended to make a few observations, he should, in order to put himself in Order, conclude with a Motion. He did not often trespass upon the attention of the House, and on the present occasion he should be as brief as he generally was. It was his duty in February last year to ask the Government a question with respect to certain prosecutions then conducted against General Nelson and Lieutenant Brand. He merely asked, without entering into the circumstances of the case, whether those officers, having really obeyed orders to the best of their ability, and being brought by a legal quibble before the Courts of Law in this country, the Government proposed affording them the fullest legal assistance? The answer he received from the right hon. Gentleman, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was that he had no doubt whatever that when an officer in her Majesty's service, obeying the commands of his superior officer, performed acts which were afterwards legally impugned, it would of course be the duty of the Government to defend him. The officers whom he had just named were accordingly defended by counsel appointed by the Treasury, or some Department of the War Office. These prosecutions had now taken a new phase, and a Governor, whom a large portion of the people of this country considered to have done his duty, and to have saved one of the most noble colonies which England possessed, and which this country had held for nearly two centuries, was now arraigned before a Court of Justice for doing that which he had deemed to be his duty. It was not his intention to enter into the merits of the case, which had now gone before another tribunal; but he would simply ask the Government whether, after having sent out a Royal Commission to inquire into the conduct of this Governor—a man who had raised himself entirely by his own ability to the situation he held, and who, whether rightly or wrongly, considered that he was only performing his duty in what he did—they meant now to leave him to subscriptions raised through the medium of advertisements in the newspapers, or whether they were prepared to undertake his defence? The Royal Commission reported that Governor Eyre was entitled to praise for the skill, promptitude, and vigour he displayed in the early stages of the insurrection; and whether or not he exceeded the limits of discretion at any period was a question to be tried. He, therefore, wished to know whether Governor Eyre would receive from the Government that assistance to which he was entitled for his defence, or was it to be understood that any man undertaking the government of a colony would in future have to fall back on public charity for his defence should he be placed in a felon's dock on trial? He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Colonel Jervis.)

MR. GILPIN said, he thought it much to be regretted that these persistent Questions should be put in the House at a time when the matter to which they referred was sub judice. If it were not for that circumstance, he should not have waited for Questions from hon. Gentlemen opposite before he called attention to the case of Governor Eyre, and the position in which he now stood. It must not be supposed that Members on the Opposition side of the House, as well, he believed, as some on the other side, who, for the sake of English justice, were desirous of proving that the poorest subject of England's Queen had a right to due protection, were in any way influenced by bitter feeling towards Governor Eyre. ["Oh, oh!"] He pitied hon. Gentlemen opposite if they could not suppose that that was so. He had read most carefully and attentively every word of the Report of the Commission, of which the gallant Colonel had only read a very small part, and the Commissioners did not say that there was not ground for further inquiry. It had been stated, and he believed truly, that after the rebellion had been put an end to, as declared in the Proclamation of the Governor himself, 350 persons, having as much right to the Queen's protection as the gallant Colonel himself, were put to death unnecessarily; and it had been further stated that the Governor of Jamaica took the opportunity of a local insurrection to seize a political opponent who was not then living within the jurisdiction of martial law.

COLONEL JERVIS rose to Order. The hon. Gentleman was answering that which he had never stated. He had carefully avoided all references to the Jamaica dispute.

MR. SPEAKER said, the gallant Colonel was out of Order. The gallant Colonel could not limit the observations of another hon. Member upon the subject he had introduced.

MR. GILPIN said, he had no previous intention of addressing the House on the subject; but he felt keenly in reference to it, and took an opposite view to that taken by the hon. and gallant Member. He would rejoice if a jury found Governor Eyre not guilty of these charges. All that he claimed on behalf of the humanity and justice of England was that Governor Eyre should have a fair trial, in order that the poorest of our colonists should know that the protection of the Queen was over him, whether he lived in her Eastern or her Western dependencies.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, in answer to the Inquiry of my hon. and gallant Friend, I would remind him that this question had been considered by the Government somewhat more than a year ago, when he made an inquiry of me in this House. Her Majesty's Government have seen no reason whatever to doubt the judiciousness of the course they then took, and which was officially, I believe, communicated to Governor Eyre. General Nelson and Lieutenant Brand were, without doubt, officers obeying the command of a superior officer; and it was the opinion of the Government that it would be their duty to defend any officer in that position if his conduct were attacked, and if he were subjected to a prosecution. But the case of Governor Eyre appeared to be quite of a different character; and without going, on a question like this, unnecessarily into detail, Her Majesty's Ministers were of opinion that it was not part of their duty to undertake the defence of Governor Eyre; but that it was their duty to watch the proceedings at the trial, to make themselves acquainted with the evidence brought against Governor Eyre, and otherwise produced; to form their opinion when in possession of that evidence; and if they thought, after the trial, that it was their duty to make a proposition to Parliament to support Governor Eyre in the defence he had made, they would not shrink from performing their duty in those circumstances. In the present case, they intend to take the same course, reserving to themselves the right, when the trial is concluded, of forming an opinion as to the course they will take.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, that on Friday evening he rose to put a Question to the hon. Member for Westminster which the rules of the House prevented him from doing, of which, no doubt, the hon. Member (Mr. Stuart Mill) was very glad. He now wished to ask the Government whether their attention had been called to a letter in The Times of to-day signed "Charles Buxton;" and whether in their opinion the statements in that letter were justifiable? The following passage occurred in it:—"It would be very painful to me to suppose that these proceedings would entail pecuniary ruin upon Mr. Eyre's family." No doubt it would. "Happily it is notorious that sums vastly beyond all possible costs are at his disposal. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: So far as I understand, the Question proposed by the hon. Member is a Question addressed to a Member of the Government, whether they have formed an opinion of a letter written by a Gentleman on a subject not connected with anything before this House?

COLONEL STUART KNOX: My object is that the people of this country shall know that a Gentleman called Charles Buxton,—["Order!"]—I believe a Member of this House, has written such letter—["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: There is a Motion before the House upon which it is competent for any Member to address the House; but I pointed out that to address a Question upon such a subject to the Government is not pertinent to the argument of any Question before the House, and I think it ought not to be introduced.

COLONEL STUART KNOX: My object is that the country should know that the Jamaica Committee wish to have it supposed that there are large sums at the disposal of Governor Eyre, and that no money is required for his defence. In that respect the letter was most unfair to Governor Eyre, and I trust it will be reported to the whole country that the statement is not correct.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Disraeli

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
(SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 29.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th May.]

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Occupation Franchise for Voters in Burghs).

Clause 3, page 2, lines 5—11 omitted.

Amendment proposed to insert in lieu thereof the words—

"Is and has been for a period of not less than twelve months next preceding the last day of July, an inhabitant occupier, as a lodger, of part of any dwelling-house, such part being of the annual value of ten pounds or upwards."—(Mr. Bouverie.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would suggest to the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) that the best course would be to postpone his Amendment until the Committee had considered the proposed additions to the clause. The way in which this matter of the lodger franchise had been introduced into the English Bill, was by making it the subject of a separate clause; and he was perfectly willing to bring up a clause, in exactly the same form as that of the English Bill, conferring the lodger franchise in Scotch burghs.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he was satisfied with that undertaking.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CRAUFURD moved, in page 2, line 4, after the word "and," to insert the words—

"Is and has been during that time entered on the valuation roll for such burgh as the inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house."

His object was that the valuation roll should continue, as now, to be the basis of the registration.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was sorry he could not agree to the Amendment proposed. Its effect would be to limit, and that in a most objectionable manner, the franchise conferred by the Bill. The Valuation Act provided that there should be put upon the valuation roll the names of all holders of tenements, including dwelling-houses, within the borough; but the 2nd clause of that Act concludes with the proviso—

“ Provided always that it shall be in the power of such Commissioners or Magistrates, if they deem fit, not to insert in any Valuation Roll under this Act the names or residences of the tenants of any lands or heritages on rentals not amounting to £4 per annum.”

So that this Amendment would give the magistrates power to limit the franchise at their option. He thought that was not a proposition which would receive the approval of the House.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he had no intention or desire to limit the franchise, and he believed that his Amendment would not have that effect; because the Valuation Act did not give the magistrates the option of removing persons from the roll, but only empowered them to remove the names of those who claimed exemption on the ground of inability to pay. The Amendment, taken in connection with other Amendments which he should propose in a subsequent clause, would not interfere with those of which the Lord Advocate had given notice.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member would not press his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, I rise for the purpose of proposing the Amendments in this 3rd clause that stand in my name. On Monday last the Committee struck out the 3rd and 4th sub-divisions of the clause. The 3rd sub-division is not of much consequence to the Scotch Bill, for there is no system of compounding in Scotland. In Scotland the inhabitants of all dwelling-houses are liable to be put on the parish rate book, and therefore it is not material to go back on that decision of the Committee; but I think that the change effected in the Bill by striking out the 4th sub-division is one of material importance to the principle on which this Bill is founded. The Bill is founded on the same principle as the English Bill. In Scotland there is a power of exempting persons from payment of the poor rate upon the ground of their poverty or inability to pay; and in order to bring the Scotch Bill into harmony with the provisions of the English Act, we propose a proviso which is to be found in the Notice Paper. This proviso contains three branches. The first runs in this way:—It is provided that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter,

“ Who shall have been exempted from assessment or payment of poor rates on the ground of inability to pay.”

The second runs thus—

“ Or who shall have failed to pay, on or before the first day of August in the present or the twentieth day of July in any subsequent year, all poor rates (if any) that have become payable by him, in respect of said dwelling-house, or as an inhabitant of said burgh, up to the preceding fifteenth day of May.”

The third is—

“ Or who shall have been in the receipt of parochial relief within the twelve calendar months next preceding the said last day of July.”

The first and third branches of this proviso received the assent of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were of opinion that such a provision would be right and proper; and therefore I apprehend that I need not address the Committee at any length in support of these propositions—namely, that a man excused from payment of rates in respect of his being a pauper is not a proper person to exercise the franchise, and, in like manner, that a person in receipt of parochial relief is not a proper person to exercise the franchise. But respecting the middle proposition—namely, that any person who shall fail to pay his rates shall not be entitled to vote—there occurred some doubt. Thinking that the person who fails to pay is as little to be trusted as the man unable to pay, I see no ground for making any distinction between the two. By the Scotch Poor Law Amendment Act, Section 24, passed in 1845, it is expressly provided, in respect to the election of Poor Law Guardians, that any person exempted from payment of rates or assessments for the relief of the poor, on account of inability to pay, or who shall not have paid his rates and assessments, shall not be entitled to vote. This is therefore not altogether a novel principle in our law; and when we are establishing a new franchise for Scotland, we should make no distinction between the two countries, and should endeavour, as much as possible, to make the legislation for the two countries conformable. It is not necessary for me to trouble the Committee further, for I have reason to think that this Amendment will receive the support of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I shall not therefore trespass further on the attention of the Committee,

Amendment proposed, in page 2, Clause 3, line 13, after "voter," insert—

"Who shall have been exempted from assessment or payment of poor rates on the ground of inability to pay; or who shall have failed to pay, on or before the first day of August in the present or the twentieth day of July in any subsequent year, all poor rates (if any) that have become payable by him, in respect of said dwelling-house or as an inhabitant of said burgh, up to the preceding fifteenth day of May; or who shall have been in the receipt of parochial relief within the twelve calendar months next preceding the said last day of July: Provided also, That no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter."—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. J. B. SMITH said, that in England every householder was assessed to the poor rates, and he understood that to be the case in Scotland. ["No, no!"] Then how could the law in England and Scotland be the same? He wished to know whether every householder in a burgh in Scotland was not entitled to be placed upon the rate book?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that such was his understanding of the law. Under the 40th section of the Poor Law Act tenants of all lands and tenements without limitation were directed to be placed upon the poor rate book, and he knew of nothing in the law of Scotland which prevented the operation of that section in that country.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he thought it only reasonable that he should explain what appeared to him to be the position of the Bill with regard to the Amendment now proposed, and of the Scotch Members with regard to it. The other night the House came to a very important vote, after a full discussion, and in a remarkably full House. That vote was taken upon the 3rd and 4th sub-divisions of the burgh enfranchising clause, which made payment of poor rates a condition of the possession of a vote. The House came to the conclusion that those two sub-divisions ought not to remain in the Bill. The Amendment under which this Resolution was come to had been placed on the Paper by his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and had stood there for a considerable time along with other Amendments. Now, it seemed to be suggested the other day that the Scotch Members had some design in this, and that their object was to put the Government in an embarrassment. He could only say that nothing could be further from their intentions. He did not mean to say that if they had supposed the Government would take this seriously to heart, that would actually have made any difference in our course. But he did say it had never entered into their minds for a moment that upon a subject of detail of this kind such a course should have been adopted by the Government—first, in consequence of the experience of last Session; and, in the second place, in consequence of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman when the Bill was introduced. They looked upon this as a matter of detail only. They thought they were at liberty to deal with details, and accordingly that Motion was put upon the Paper simply as part of the Amendments we thought necessary in order to make the Bill acceptable in Scotland. He was anxious that it should be clearly understood what were the matters that appeared in their opinion to be very objectionable in these two sub-divisions, and they were two separate elements of the franchise. One was, that the rating of an occupier should be essential to his possession of the franchise; and the other, that he should have paid his rates before the 20th of July. In regard to the first of those, the Scotch Members held a very strong opinion. Looking at the subject in connection with the provision of the Bill, their view was this, that, by making the fact of being rated the principle of the franchise, and by the subsequent clauses of the Bill, you introduced the rating principle into Scotland, and that an interference with the free action of the parish authorities was thereby occasioned which could not fail to create much inconvenience. That was altogether apart from the principle of the personal payment of rates. That was another, and an important matter; but what they were anxious for was that there should be no interference in this Bill with the action of the parish authorities in matters of rating. In England a very different state of things existed. In England there was, he believed, no other general valuation of the property of the country but that which was used for the imposition of the poor rate; and accordingly in 1832, under the Reform Bill, the overseers of the poor were made those who were to work the machinery of the Reform Act; not that there was the slightest connection between the working of the franchise and the poor rate, but because the machinery of the one happened to be convenient machinery for the other. But in Scotland the thing was entirely different. In 1854 the Valuation Act was passed, and in that measure it was declared that the assessment should be levied in accordance with the provisions of that Act. He had always regretted that on that occasion they did not take the opportunity of doing away with the provisions in the Poor Law Act of 1845 in regard to making deductions from gross revenue. In 1856, as a complement of the Valuation Act, the Burgh Registration Act was passed; and in 1861 his hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) carried the County Representation Act, also based upon valuation; so that the result was that up to the present time the Rating Act and the Franchise Acts in Scotland were totally different. The proposed plan of registration certainly afforded a great deal of convenience, as the assessor had only to take the valuation roll and select those who were entitled to the franchise. The best thing they found in the Bill was that the parishes were only bound to rate every person appearing on the valuation roll, and to exercise a certain power of exemption when they considered it necessary. It had been the practice in Scotland, up to the present time, to exempt in the different parishes, according to the views of the Parochial Board, all persons assessed under £4, sometimes under £3, and sometimes lower. There was, in his opinion, no necessity for dealing with that matter in this Bill. It could only produce confusion. The original provisions in the Bill, objectionable as they were with regard to burghs, were still more objectionable with regard to counties. There were a great many parishes where there was no poor rate at all; and not only that, but there was no general valuation of what was called rateable value, and so the right hon. and learned Lord (the Lord Advocate) was obliged to resort to the invention of a rating solely for the purposes of this Bill. However, he had no doubt that his right hon. and learned Friend, were it not for the symmetry he intended to produce, would agree with him in repudiating it. What was proposed to be done under these circumstances? The Scotch Members placed the Amendment on the Paper objecting to the principle upon which these sub-divisions were based. There was a second matter—he meant the payment or non-payment of rates imposed, which was totally different from making the rating the basis of the franchise. A “hard and fast line” might have been drawn at £5, £4, or £3, and they might still have objected to it; but if any man had not paid his rates, he should not be allowed to appear on the roll or vote, and in the same way in the Reform Act, as there was no general poor rate in Scotland, non-payment of assessed taxes was considered the first and proper disqualification from coming under the Bill. However, he believed that from the time the Bill passed till now that had not been effected. He had no respect for the opinion that, if a man did not pay the poor rates, he should not be placed on the roll. The payment of the poor rates, it was said, was the test of his fitness. Why, he might not have paid his police rates, his rent, his Christmas bills, and he might be in arrears to everybody around him; and yet he might have paid the poor rate. He thought that part was entirely nugatory. Since the vote of the other night, there had been a general feeling upon his side of the House, not only on the part of Scotch Members, but among their English friends, that they might as well avoid having a crisis on this matter. They certainly did not expect that the armour against which all the ordinary missiles of the Opposition had been directed in vain was to be penetrated by a dart from the Scotch Members. That being the feeling of the House, it was thought desirable to see whether they could not come to an arrangement, and obtain some concession at the hands of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. They accordingly communicated with his right hon. and learned Friend, and he was happy to say he received their propositions in a spirit of the greatest fairness, and the result of their negotiations was this—that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate on the one hand would give up the end of the 16th clause by which he compelled the parishes to rate every one upon the roll, and that he would also give up the 18th clause, which provided regulations as to the rating of persons omitted from the roll of assessments; and he proposed to bring up a clause providing for the rectification of errors in the case of persons improperly exempted. So much for the burgh franchise. Well, with regard to counties, his right hon. Friend undertook to abandon the rating, and to adopt the rental qualification—a very proper concession—for the provisions of the Bill as it stood were utterly impracticable. At the meeting of the Scotch Members to-day, they unanimously resolved to agree to those terms. He thought he had satisfied the Committee that the Scotch Members had solid grounds for the objections they had made, and, later, for the arrangement they had come to with the Government. They had been met by the Lord Advocate in the fairest spirit, and he hoped the Committee would ratify the understanding which had been arrived at.

MR. HODGKINSON said, he wished to call attention to the fact that there was a considerable variation in the Scotch and English Reform Bills in the time allowed for the payment of rates. He could see no reason why the 15th of May should be fixed as the time up to which rates must be paid in Scotland, while in England it was the 5th of January. He could not understand why the rein should be drawn tighter in the case of one country than it was in the case of the other, and he therefore trusted that the dates would be made in both cases the same.

MR. G. YOUNG said, that his learned Friend (The Lord Advocate) had stated that by the law as it at present existed every householder was to be put upon the register and would then be qualified to vote provided he paid his rates. He could only say that he did not so interpret the existing law, however it might be altered by the provisions of this Bill. It was true that by the Poor Law Act of 1845 the assessor for the poor rate was required to make up the roll of all ratepayers including the occupiers of all kinds of houses; but by the Valuation Act of 1854 it was provided that the names of all occupiers, being mere tenants of lands and tenements let at a rent not amounting to £4, should not be inserted in the valuation roll, and that in all cases where any lands or heritages should be let at a rent not amounting to £4 per annum, and the names of the occupiers thereof should not have been inserted in the valuation roll, the proprietors of such lands or heritages should be charged with and have to pay the whole of the assessment on such lands and heritages, but should have relief against the tenant for payment thereof. It was analogous to the law of the compound-householder, there being a provision in Clause 31 to the effect that where the rent was under £4 the landlord should pay the whole of the assessment, including the assessment for poor rate, not only his own half as landlord, but also the tenant's half. The landlord had a statutory right to recover from the tenant. He wished to know whether these tenants would be regarded as tenants paying their rates, or would a tenant so situated be denied the franchise? He also asked whether a change in the law of rating was intended. The requisition that the names of all the small tenants should be placed on the valuation roll seemed to imply that this was so, and that in future the rates would be assessed one-half on the landlord and one-half on the tenant. But if this were done the landlord would pay his part, and the tenant's half would be lost to the parish except where political strife induced agents to manufacture voters. He noticed that the proposed Amendment disfranchised those who had been "exempted from assessment or payment of poor rates. "Exemption from assessment" was scarcely grammatical. Besides, the exemption was not from the imposition. The assessment was made, and the person was afterwards exempted from payment. The clause seemed to require amendment in another respect. As it now stood it might be held to disfranchise for ever every householder who had at any time been exempted from paying poor rates. He presumed that that was not the meaning of his right hon. and learned Friend; but that the exclusion was intended to apply only to the year in which such exemption took place. His last question was as to whether those who were partially exempted from payment of rates would be disfranchised? The common mode of exemption was not total but partial exemption, and it would be unjust that such partial exemption should work disfranchisement, because a very large number of householders paid a reduced rate on their holdings, which, however, amounted in actual cash to a great deal more than the full rate of many another householder.

MR. HIBBERT said, he thought that the word "assessment" should be omitted. He assumed that a person who was relieved from paying a part of his rates would be disfranchised, and very properly.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would propose to leave out the words "assessment or." The Amendment would then read smoothly, and the grammatical criticisms would no longer apply. Now that they had taken the Land Valuations Act they had nothing to do with the Poor Law assessment, and anything which related to that should be left out altogether. Then, as to the suggestion which had been made that the 15th of May should be left out, and the 5th of January substituted, as in the English Act, he thought it was of no great importance; but still it would be an improvement if the words were as in the English Act, because in Scotland the practice in the boroughs was to lay on the poor rate for twelve months, from the 15th of May in one year to the 15th of May in the succeeding year; so that if the rate were to be laid on exactly on the 15th of May everybody would be disfranchised, because nobody could have paid that rate. He did not think the thing had ever occurred, or was ever likely to occur. But no possible inconvenience could arise if the 5th of January was substituted for the 15th of May. Practically, the rates were collected long before the 15th of May; but if the 5th of January was put in it would be no disadvantage, and there would be no danger of the rate being laid on in May, and thereby disfranchising a whole constituency. Then, in reference to the criticism that parties might be exempted partially from the poor rates. He had never met with anyone who was partially exempted from poor's rate. He believed such cases very rarely arose; but if a person were exempted from even a tenth of his rate he would properly be disfranchised. He hoped the learned Lord Advocate might leave out the words "assessment or," and put in the 5th of January instead of the 15th of May, and then all possible objections would be removed.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that the practice as to assessment was diverse, in some cases the assessment being from May, in others from November. In the one case the time was too short; in the other much too long. He thought it desirable that the Government should consider whether there should not be some fixed date—say the 5th of January; and, if not, whether it would not be better to dispense altogether with a clause which would operate with such inequality as that under discussion.

COLONEL SYKES said, the object of the Government was to assimilate this Bill to the English Bill so far as regarded the ratepaying clauses. The most direct way of accomplishing that object, as there were places in Scotland not assessed to the poor, would be not to specify poor rates, but to make the franchise depend upon the payment of any burgh rates whatever. In the city which he represented, besides 4,236 £10 householders, in 1867 there were 265 at £9, 332 at £8, 415 at £7, 324 at £6, 912 at £5, 1,428 at £4, the total assessed to taxes for municipal purposes at and under £10 being 9,323. Of these 1,121 were rated under £4. The payment of any other rate would be just as good as a poor rate for a test of the qualification to vote. All that ought to be required was that a tenant should be rated and pay his rates by a certain day. If he did not, let him by all means be disfranchised. He ought not, however, to be disfranchised permanently, but only for that year. A certain time—say five or six months—should be allowed, during which he might be at liberty to pay his rates and re-claim the franchise. He thought the 5th of January would be the most convenient date to adopt.

MR. ELLICE said, he must express his regret that the settlement existing under the 2nd and 31st clauses of the Valuation Act was to be disturbed. He did not think the Parochial Board was the best body to determine what exemptions should take place. He preferred leaving that duty to the Commissioners of Supply in counties, and to the magistrates in boroughs, who were popularly elected, and were not such exclusive bodies as the Parochial Board. The Valuation Act, which had been in existence for fourteen years, had worked most satisfactorily. In the Scotch burghs there were large numbers of tenements which could scarcely be dignified with the name of houses. He thought the clause would require some further revision, and he earnestly hoped the Lord Advocate would take the matter into his consideration, and accede to the Amendment of which he had given Notice, after the words "inability to pay," in line 3 of the Lord Advocate's Amendment, to insert the words "or whose names shall not have been inserted on the valuation roll."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he regretted that he could not accede to the Amendment of the hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Ellice), which was not consistent with the spirit either of this or of the English Bill. Its object was to go back upon the decision of the House, that it should not be in the power of magistrates to disqualify. It would, in fact, make that compulsory which was at present optional, and would draw a fixed line at £4. It would be still more objectionable if it were not a fixed line. However, that Amendment was not at present before the Committee, and he had only mentioned it because it had been just referred to by the hon. Gentleman. Some criticisms had been made by the hon. and learned Member for the Wigton burghs (Mr. G. Young).

Now, he was not aware whether the hon. Gentleman had been present at the meeting held that afternoon. [Mr. G. YOUNG: No!] He was glad to hear that, and he must confess that the hon. Member did not appear to be actuated by the spirit of the meeting. At the suggestion of a hon. Member opposite he had assented to the introduction of the words "assessment of;" but finding that objections had been raised against them, he should now offer no opposition to their omission. With reference to another suggestion made by the hon. Member for the Wigton burghs, he might remark that he had no objection to its adoption. He referred to the proposed insertion after the word "who," of the words "at any time during the said period of twelve calendar months." That would effect an improvement, and make the meaning of the clause more clear. According to the custom in Scotland, poor rates were laid on at Whitsuntide. They were collected after Martinmas, and if they were not paid before February diligence or execution issued; so that by Whitsuntide it was ascertained who were the defaulters from whom payment could not be obtained. There was no further assessment until October, when the valuation rolls were made up. Therefore, no persons would be affected by his Amendment except those who were in arrear, against whom execution had been issued, and who were returned as defaulters. He had been asked by the hon. Member for Wigton whether the £4 line did, or did not, apply to the poor rate. In Scotland, it was optional to exclude from the valuation roll tenants under £4; but there were very few burghs—probably not six-sevenths of the whole—which availed themselves of the option, and he held that where this was done, collectors for the parochial authorities were bound by the 40th section of the Poor Law Act to place on the rate books all the tenants without exception. It was quite true that the 1st section of the 31st clause of the Valuation Act had this effect—that where the option had been exercised of excluding from the valuation roll those under £4, then the proprietors should be required to pay the whole of the assessment on such lands or tenements. But the poor rate was really a personal tax. The value of the tenement was merely the measure of the liability of the person to pay. The 41st clause contained this provision—"That nothing should exempt any person or property not previously exempt, or liable to assessment." The 31st clause did not apply to poor rates, especially when taken in connection with the 41st. He therefore begged to submit that a correct view had been taken of this matter, and that the clause, with the Amendments he was ready to accept, would give effect to the views of the House.

Mr. MONCREIFF said, that questions of mere phraseology were necessarily left open, and his impression was that the clause would require some revision to make it work satisfactorily.

Mr. G. YOUNG asked, whether the Amendment was intended to include partial as well as total exemption?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Yes; it is intended to apply to partial as well as total exemption.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Ownership Franchise for Voters in Counties).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved, in line 21, to omit the word "and," and insert the words—

"2. Has had a residence within the County in his own occupation during the twelve months next preceding the last day of July."

The object of the Amendment was to prevent the creation of faggot votes which had been resorted to in some of the Scotch counties, and in one instance to such an extent that the resident voters could be easily swamped by those who were non-resident. It would be in the recollection of hon. Members that a similar Amendment was rejected on the English Bill of last year, chiefly because it would have a disfranchising effect. The question was one which was quite as important as affecting Scotland as England; because in the former country, as in the latter, power was held by persons wholly unconnected with the counties, but who, through manufacturing interests and general influence over the burghs, could affect an election; and this gave great umbrage to those who took part, naturally took part, in county elections. Now, he hoped to be able to induce the Committee to give a favourable consideration to his Amendment. In the first place, his proposal did not require, as that of last year did, that a qualifying residence should form a part of the occupation; and next, it applied to the property qualification, and not to the occupation. The Reform Act of 1832 was full of abuses like this, and they had accumulated with respect to pocket or rotten burghs in such a way that, by the influence of these burghs, county elections were often carried. He thought his Amendment would recommend itself to the Committee, and he therefore begged to move it.

MR. BAXTER said, there was considerable force in what had fallen from his hon. Friend, and he sympathized very much with the objection he had taken to the clause as it stood, because there could be no doubt that in former times in Scotland advantage was taken to create faggot votes to a great extent; but he had a strong feeling that with the enlarged constituencies, and the new franchise, those faggot votes would not be created nearly to the same extent. Besides, he could not help feeling it would be rather ungracious, without strong reasons, to adopt for Scotland a different principle to that laid down in the English Act. He wished also to keep to the old lines of the Constitution—that the votes for counties should be based on ownership. He hoped the hon. Baronet would not divide the Committee on the question.

MR. M'LAREN said, he was sorry he could not agree with the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). There was nothing so common as for men to begin by praising something, and ending by giving their votes against it. The hon. Member for Montrose said that the hon. Baronet had a capital case, and yet he was going to vote against him. If the Committee would take into account the smallness of the Scotch counties—[MR. BAXTER: Some of them.] If you will allow me, there were several of these small counties that could be overpowered by the extraneous voters of Edinburgh and Glasgow—that is, the electors of these counties might be overpowered by them. Why, there were many counties in Scotland which might be much more appropriately called parishes. No doubt, it was quite true that in the great English counties of four or ten times the magnitude of the small Scotch counties, there was a foreign element introduced; men living in London had votes in Lancashire, Leicestershire, and other counties. It did not follow that that element could be safely imported into the small Scotch counties. It certainly did deteriorate, and in certain cases overpower, the resident electors. He could mention a case where a considerable majority voted for a candidate, but the people of the county were overpowered by voters from the city he had the honour to represent. Now, he thought that was a bad state of things, and should not be allowed to exist.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he trusted that the Committee would not agree to a proposal for disfranchising a large portion of the proprietors of land in Scotland.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he would give his vote to any Amendment which would prevent the creation of faggot votes. Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman who sat on the Treasury Bench could draw up such a clause. But he could not admit that, because faggot votes had been created in Scotland in a few cases, an enormous number of bonâ fide voters should therefore be disfranchised. There were, as the hon. Member for Edinburgh had truly observed, counties in Scotland which might more properly be called parishes from their extreme smallness. Again, if the Amendment were adopted the anomalies between the county franchise in England and Scotland would be such as ought not to exist.

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE hoped that the Amendment would not be accepted by the Committee. There were no electors more independent than those of the small counties.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he had a very strong opinion upon the question raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke); but he was of opinion that the practice of creating faggot votes had not been carried to so great an extent as was thought. So much difference of opinion existed, even among hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House upon the question of residence, that he thought his hon. Friend would exercise a wise discretion in withdrawing the Amendment. It was desirable that they should be as unanimous as possible, in order to complete the work which was before them.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he did not concur in the objections urged against the Amendment, and therefore he would not withdraw it. He would prefer to have it negatived rather than take that course. This was a subject which would crop up again.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CRAUFURD moved, in line 25, to leave out the word "clear," so that it should remain "yearly value" simply.

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the proposition on the ground that the clause as it stood was in accordance with the provision of the English Act of last year. However, as he did not think it a matter of much consequence, he would agree to the proposition.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. M'LAREN moved to omit the words "five pounds" and to substitute "forty shillings." As they had to submit to pay poor rates as in England, they had a right to claim the 40s. franchise as in England.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Amendment would not have the effect of extending the English franchise to Scotland, for the 40s. English franchise referred only to freehold property. The difference proposed to be made would add some thirty voters only in the whole of Scotland.

Amendment negatived.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved to omit the following words at the end of the clause:—"As also of the interest of any heritable debt affecting the said lands and heritages." It very frequently happened that small houses were built with borrowed money, and the clause, as drawn would deprive the owners of such houses of the franchise.

MR. M'LAREN said, that a creation of faggot votes took place last year in Renfrewshire, which could not have taken place if the interest of the borrowed money had had to be deducted.

MR. BAZLEY thought the clause, as it stood, would be the only preventive of faggot vote-making. It was a fact that the mortgages of small properties were in the hands of the district banker, who had entire command of the votes.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought the clause as it stood would prevent the creation of faggot votes, properly so called.

MR. MONCREIFF asked if it would be desirable for the assessor under this clause to go rummaging through every person's property. In the case of persons who had borrowed money the factor or local agent might put a claimant for the franchise into the witness-box, and call upon him to state the amount of burdens upon his property, thus causing great expense and annoyance. He entreated his right hon. and learned Friend not to insist upon this provision.

Mr. Craufurd

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON contended that they would not establish a beneficial franchise if they gave facilities for making improper votes, and therefore he hoped the Amendment would be rejected.

MR. CRAUFURD declared that if the words proposed to be omitted were left in, they would disfranchise practically a large portion of £10 holders.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5 (Occupation Franchise for Voters in Counties).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved to leave out the word "rateable," in line 43, and insert "yearly." He hoped the Government was disposed to make some concession on this point.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Government were willing to assent, in substance, to the alteration proposed, which, it was alleged, would have the effect of removing some inconvenience that was apprehended. In at least 100 parishes of Scotland there were no poor rates, and no rateable assessment. The Bill proposed to secure a uniform assessment, and that the full value return should be given of all property, with a net assessment also, between £12 and £50. As, however, it seemed that that would be objected to, the Government had thought it right to give way; and he therefore proposed to substitute for the words "rateable value of £12" the words "annual value of £14 or upwards, as appearing on the valuation roll of such county," that amount being the equivalent for a £12 rating.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE withdrew his Amendment.

Amendment of The LORD ADVOCATE agreed to.

MR. BOUVERIE, who had given Notice of a Motion to leave out sub-divisions 3 and 4 of the Clause 7, said, that he should not press it, understanding that the Lord Advocate was about to bring forward an Amendment on the same subject.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved an Amendment to leave out from "3. Has" to "may" in line 7, and insert—

"Provided, That no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered who shall have been exempted from assessment or payment of poor rates on the ground of inability to pay; or who shall have failed to pay, on or before the first day of August in the present or the twentieth day of July in any subsequent year, all poor rates (if any) that have become payable by him in respect of said lands and heritages up to the preceding fifteenth day of May; or who shall have been in the receipt of parochial relief within twelve calendar months next preceding the said last day of July."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that with a view to prevent the creation of faggot votes, he begged to move to add at the end of the clause the following words:—

"Provided, that no man shall, under this section, be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint owner or joint occupier of any lands or heritages."

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, this matter stood on a somewhat different footing from those fictitious properties which had just been considered. There could be no more legitimate title to the franchise than the joint occupancy of a farm. A farmer very often wished that his son should be associated with him, and, in fact, family arrangements were frequently dependent upon it. The question was altogether apart from faggot votes, and he could not consent to the Amendment.

MR. DALGLISH said, that from his own personal experience he thought it desirable that the Amendment should not be pressed.

MR. MONCREIFF said, there would be an opportunity of discussing the question more at large upon the clauses to be brought up at a later stage, and recommended his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment for the present.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Restriction on Number of Votes in City of Glasgow).

MR. J. LOWTHER suggested that the clause should be so worded as to apply to any three-cornered constituency, since it was possible that Glasgow might not be the only one in that position.

Clause postponed.

Clause 7 (Electors employed for Reward within Six Months of an Election not to vote).

SIR ANDREW AGNEW suggested the omission of the word "agent." It was desirable that an agent should be a gentleman of social position. He usually was so, and he ought not to lose his vote through acting in the capacity of agent.

MR. BAXTER said, these disqualifications were decided upon in the case of the English Bill, after full discussion.

MR. POWELL said, he hoped the words would be omitted.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he trusted the words would be retained.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Universities to return Two Members).

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the clause raised the important question of distribution of seats, which had never been properly discussed by the House or the Committee. He thought they ought to have from the Government some explanation as to the places which they proposed to disfranchise before they entered upon the question of the allotment of the seats. They ought, in fact, to catch their hare before they cooked it. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had made a very objectionable proposal in regard to the distribution of seats. A counter proposal of a still more objectionable character had been made by his hon. Friend (Sir Rainald Knightley). Another proposal, which stood in the Bill as it was originally framed, was more objectionable than either of the others. In his opinion the proposal of the Government to increase the number of Members of that House was one of the most dangerous ever submitted to a Legislative Assembly. A fourth proposal, with which he largely concurred, and of which the hon. Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk) had given Notice, had not yet been brought before the Committee. He objected to any and every proposition which had either for its immediate or ultimate object to make any addition to the monotonous and one-sided character of the representation of Scotland. He appeared before the Committee in this respect as the Scotchman's friend. In the first place, he would submit that the claims of Scotland to representation at the expense of England could not be made out when the representation of certain parts of the kingdom was considered. The West Riding of Yorkshire had claims to a considerable addition to its representation. Its population amounted to about half the population of Scotland.

MR. CANDLISH rose to Order. The hon. Member was not confining himself to the clause now before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: The clause was called on, and the hon. Member proposed to make some observations on it. I assume that he is going to conclude with a Motion.

MR. J. LOWTHER contended that his remarks were germane to the question whether there should be two Members for the Scotch Universities. His objection was to any proposition the object of which was immediately to make an addition to the representation of Scotland at the expense either of England or Ireland. The West Riding of Yorkshire, with half the population of Scotland, had twenty-two Members, while Scotland had fifty-three; and four Members at least were due to the West Riding before it could be placed on an equality with Scotland. And yet it was proposed to take a seat from Northallerton, which was in the county of Yorkshire, and to give it to Scotland. Ever since the time of the Picts and the Scots there had been nothing more unjustifiable. The hon. Member for Montrose made a raid on the northern counties; but he (Mr. Lowther) could not assent to a Motion for taking a seat from so populous a district and giving it to Scotland. He might also cite the case of the County Palatine of Lancaster, the population of which was about five-sixths of that of Scotland, and the representation of which was miserably inadequate. According to the standard set up by the hon. Member for Montrose, a balance of eleven Members ought to be given to Lancashire to bring that county up to the representation of Scotland. Representation and voting power were two very distinct things. The numerical force of Scotland in the divisions of that House was a very different thing from the fair and adequate representation of all classes and sections of the community. For a very long time the Executive of Scotland had been actually unrepresented in that House, and very great inconvenience had been caused to the Government thereby; and had it not been for the volunteered good offices of the hon. Members for Ayrshire and Peeblesshire, the inconvenience would have been still more serious. After a very considerable interval the Scottish Executive was represented in that House; but the Lord Advocate found a seat for one of those very English boroughs (Thetford) which had fallen within the devouring grasp of the hon. Member for Montrose. He maintained that a fair and complete representation of Scotland was not to be expected from the scheme of the hon. Member.

The Chairman

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member that he had not yet applied his remarks to the clause.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he intended to propose that the clause be postponed, in order that the Committee might receive information from the Government as to the constituencies that were required. He protested against any attempt to diminish the English or Irish representation for the sake of Scotland.

Moved "That the Clause be postponed."
(Mr. J. Lowther.)

MR. BAXTER said, he hoped that the Government would not listen to the proposal of the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther). The Scotch Reform Bill had been brought in in the second week of the Session, and the Scotch Members had been kept week after week in expectation that progress would be made with their Bill. Yet now, in the fourth week of May, the hon. Member made a proposal which was equivalent to asking the Government to drop the Bill for the present Session. The hon. Member had, in fact, delivered that night the speech he ought to have made last Monday. The hon. Member was now too late. He trusted that if they did not finish the clauses that evening, they would get through the Committee on an early night.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he wished to treat Scotland with perfect fairness in this matter. The question decided the other night was merely this, that certain boroughs in England should be disfranchised. Scotland, from some source or other, was to receive seven additional Members, and he should be prepared to assist in giving Scotland that number. But he protested against the assumption that the decision come to the other night was that seats should be taken from England and given to Scotland.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that the observations of the hon. Member for Montrose were tantamount to a confession of the weakness of his cause, or else he would not have been in such a hurry to pledge the House beforehand to a general Resolution, before they had considered the details upon which it ought to have been based. The disfranchisement of the seven boroughs, which had been affirmed so hastily the other night, was the abandonment of one more of the principles of the Reform Bill, formally acquiesced in by the Government, although directly in face of the declarations from the Treasury Bench last year, that no centre of representation was to be taken away. If they wished to carry Reform to a successful issue, they would have, in cold blood, to re-consider the hasty and unwise decision to which they had arrived the other evening a little before eight o'clock, at the summons of empty stomachs, when, rather than let their dinners spoil, they had wiped out seven English seats. This was not so inconsequential a proceeding as it might at first sight appear, for it ought not to be forgotten that, excepting in the case of penal disfranchisement for corrupt practices, no precedent for the abolition of boroughs could be found, except in the one great settlement of 1832. Still, all that had been done on that night was to pass a Resolution, which the House might or might not embody in a clause; and accordingly it would be only decent to wait till it could be proved that there were other constituencies ready and fit to be put in the place of those which had been condemned, before settling the terms of that clause. It was disgraceful to Parliament to proceed in the haphazard way they were doing, and with reference to the Motion before them, he was of opinion that they ought to have the special seats to allot, before allotting them. As it was, they were acting the part of the spendthrift who made his engagements before he had calculated his assets. They ought to learn a little homely prudence, and be sure that they had a balance at their bankers' before proceeding, as they were doing, to draw cheques. There was one point on which he differed toto cœlo from the hon. Member for York. His hon. Friend characterized the proposal of the Government to increase the Members of the House, as one of the most dangerous in its nature which he had ever heard of. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) was unable to regard the proposal in that light, and he regretted the want of courage with which the First Lord of the Treasury had allowed his own bantling to be bolstered without saying a word for it. It had never been fairly brought forward; it had never been argued in the House; and the objection to a moderate increase stood, in the absence of any reason in its behalf, a mere relic of an outworn superstition. There was nothing hallowed in the present number of 658 which had come about by pure haphazard. At the beginning of this century the House was increased by 100, as it had been at the beginning of the 18th by forty-five; again, to go no further back than the 17th century, James I. had created the constituency which he had the honour of representing, together with that of the sister University; while it was not till after the Restoration that in the reign of Charles II. the County Palatine, and the city of Durham respectively, acquired the right to return Members. It was a mere figment of the imagination to suppose there was anything sacred or immutable in the actual number of Members; and the Government was much to blame for not having fairly challenged the consideration of the question.

MR. HAYTER concurred with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down in thinking it impossible that they could enter upon the question of the distribution of the seats before they had the seats to distribute. Their present position reminded him of the old adage, "Ex nihilo nihil fit." He hoped that the Government, whether they now went on with that question, or postponed it to a future day, would take into their consideration the fact that the vote of last Monday broke up the arrangement relating to the re-distribution of seats arrived at by the Reform Bill of last year, and converted into waste paper certain of its clauses and schedules.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther). It appeared to him that the time had come for reporting Progress. The concessions made by Gentlemen on the opposite side had enabled the franchise clauses of the Bill to be discussed, and they had now arrived at the re-distribution of clauses, which he considered by far the most important part of this measure. As it now stood, seven seats had been allocated, he must say, in a very unsatisfactory manner. But the time was come when the Lord Advocate ought to rise and tell them how he meant to allocate the ten seats apparently placed at his disposal by the vote of the other night. He suggested that the whole of the re-distribution clauses should be withdrawn, and others, embodying a new and improved scheme, should be substituted; otherwise, he believed the re-distribution would be taken out of the hands of the Ministers, and transferred to Gentlemen opposite. With a little more concession on both sides, it was his belief that a more satisfactory measure might be framed. If the Lord Advocate would give more attention to the great towns of Scotland—such as Glasgow and Dundee—a great improvement might be effected. He must re-model altogether the groups of burghs as they now stood, for the present groups were a disgrace to the Scottish representation. They contained numerous small villages and hamlets which had no right whatever to urban representation. These should be eliminated from the groups as they now stood, and new life infused by adding large towns which had grown up within the last thirty years. Unless some such arrangement were made, in his opinion, the Bill would never give satisfaction; but, by making these changes, it might be brought into a state which would be accepted as creditable in Scotland both by the agricultural and the manufacturing districts. He trusted that the Lord Advocate would withdraw these clauses and bring forward a new scheme giving to Scotland ten Members instead of seven.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that if ten Members were to be taken from small English boroughs, he saw no reason why they should not be given to large unrepresented towns in England instead of being transferred to Scotland. He thought the claim of Ireland to increased representation was greater than that of Scotland. Ireland, from her population and taxation, was entitled to twenty-seven additional Members. There were towns in Scotland which had not 1,000 voters each. The number of voters in the Scotch counties was particularly small; and he had himself given notice of a Motion that no county which had less than 1,000 electors should be entitled to send Members to this House. If boroughs with only a few voters were disfranchised, why not counties also? Peeblesshire and Selkirkshire had only 500 voters each, and there was the nomination county of Sutherland with only 180 electors. The number of county electors which would be added to the constituency of Sutherlandshire under the present Bill would not amount to 300, three-fourths of whom were on the property of the Duke of Sutherland, to oblige whom the Leaders on both sides had coalesced to support this scandalous blot in the Scottish representation. He therefore asked whether English towns would tolerate the transference of their representation to Scotland. He considered the Motion of the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) a very reasonable one, and he should therefore support it.

Mr. Smollett

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE said, he had witnessed with regret the success of the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). It might have been a good party move; but he thought at the time that it was likely to end in Scotland receiving no additional representation at all. He was present in the House when the present Prime Minister, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, stated that it was his determination to avoid any measure proposing a diminution of Members for England, and that declaration was received with universal acclamations of approval by English Members, which induced one to think that the determination would be maintained. It would be an act of the greatest possible injustice to disfranchise ten small constituencies unconvicted of any crime whatever. He was unwilling to get rid of small constituencies, because he considered that they sent most valuable representatives to that House; and he had not forgotten the eloquent defence of them made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) that the objection that had been made to the increase of the numbers of the House was a mere bugbear; and whether the increase should be seven or ten did not greatly signify. He should be extremely sorry if the Committee did not affirm the proposition to give two Members to the Universities of Scotland. England had four or five University Members; Ireland had two; and why should not Scotland, with her four Universities, have two Members also? He was sure the Scotch Universities would return most valuable Members in connection with education, literature, and science. But while he thought they should insist on having two Members for the Scotch Universities, he did not wish to get them at the expense of the small boroughs of England. They must eventually increase the numbers of the House; and he hoped English Members would not do Scotland the injustice of limiting her representatives to the present number. Everything pointed towards an increase in the numbers of the House. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire would disagree from that proposition. Looking to the increase of the population and the wealth of the country, as well as of the private business of the House, he thought that ten additional Members were scarcely adequate to the necessities of the case. The Scotch Members were often congratulated on their being able to form a snug little Parliament of their own ; but that certainly could not apply to the present case, as they had great reason to complain that they had not been consulted regarding the arrangement of seats proposed by the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: Until about an hour ago, when the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) rose, I was under the impression—the happy impression—that there was a general conviction in the Committee, as in the House, that we ought, if possible, to go on and make progress with this Bill. A Motion more disappointing than that of the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther), and supported by speeches more disappointing, I can hardly conceive ; because not only do they attempt to go back on propositions deliberately affirmed by the House, but they attempt that in the way most inconvenient—not by challenging a direct issue, but by voting the postponement of the clause ; and why ? Because, says the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge, the conclusion was arrived at before dinner. The hon. Member thinks it exceedingly improper to arrive at any conclusion before dinner. His speech was founded on this proposition—and those which followed were founded on the same doctrine—that the number of the Members of this House ought to be increased, and that that is the proper way of finding additional Members. Now, if that is the course to be adopted, let it be proposed distinctly—not under the form of a proposition that leaves everything completely in the dark. But if that question is to be raised again, it is going back on what was almost unanimously settled. For what happened last week ? The right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown has certainly done all in his power, and made every effort he could make to induce the House to find the additional Members for Scotland by increasing the number of Members in the House, but he very fairly acknowledged last week that he found that to be impracticable. He conceded in the most express terms the point in dispute. He expressed a rather feeble preference for the proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley) over that of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), but he acquiesced in the result. Under these circumstances, when the disposition to increase the numbers of the House, entertained and promoted by the Government so far as could be by the exercise of their fair influence, has been deliberately and finally abandoned, with a frank admission, on account of their discovery that it was opposed almost universally to the feeling on this side of the House, and likewise to the feeling and opinion of a considerable number on the other side, I must say, if we are really to satisfy the country, by making progress in this Bill, that ought to be regarded as a settled question. My hon. Friend the Member for Montrose, at all events, has done all he could to bring this matter to a straight and speedy issue ; and I think we may fairly ask that we should be allowed to go forward, either proceeding on the power taken by my hon. Friend in the Instruction granted last week, or in some direct manner having his proposition overthrown and the vote of the House last week reversed.

MR. R. J. HARVEY said, he believed that, although Scotland might be satisfied, England would never consent to the taking of ten Members from English boroughs and transferring them to Scotland. That would be a great breach of faith so far as the English county Members were concerned, who had been induced by the promises held out in regard to the re-distribution of seats to consent to the Bill of last year. In his county two Members had been taken away from Great Yarmouth and one from Thetford, and now it was proposed to take away the other Member from Thetford.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, the Government had proposed to give seven additional seats to Scotland, and what the Committee desired to know was what was to be done with the remaining three seats placed at their disposal by the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). A rumour was afloat that an arrangement had been come to between the Scotch Members and the Government, by which the whole ten seats were to be given to Scotland, instead of some of them being allotted among the large towns of this country. He wished to know from the Government whether that report was correct or not ? Perhaps on the whole it would be better that the question should be postponed in order to give the Government an opportunity of re-considering the matter.

MR. MONCREIFF said, this was a Motion to delay the consideration of this clause upon a matter which he understood had been agreed upon by both sides of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury would only get up and state what were the intentions of the Government upon the question there would be an end of the matter.

MR. SANDFORD said, that he thought the Motion of the hon. Member for York a fair and consistent Motion. The hon. Member had not been fairly treated by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). Although power had been given to the Committee to deal with the ten seats, yet the boroughs to which they belonged had not yet been disfranchised. It had been distinctly understood on that side of the House that only seven of those ten Members were to be given to Scotland, and it yet remained to be decided what was to be done with the remaining three seats. If any understanding had been come to between certain parties in that House that the whole of the ten Members were to be given to Scotland, that was no reason why such an agreement should be binding upon the whole House. Members on that side of the House had happily not yet arrived at that stage of subserviency. They were at perfect liberty to discuss the propriety of that arrangement.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the right hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Moncreiff) has blamed me for not addressing the Committee before upon this Question; but the fact is that I have risen two or three times for that purpose, and on one of those occasions I gave way to the eloquence of the right hon. Member himself; his remark, therefore, was somewhat superfluous. The hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) has made a Motion to which I cannot assent. I thought to-night was to be an eminently practical night, during which we were to make some considerable progress in passing the Scotch Reform Bill, and securing that early appeal to the country on another question which nobody in this House is more anxious to hasten than are those who have the honour of being Her Majesty's Ministers. The hon. Member for York said he did not clearly know what we were called upon to vote for with regard to the re-distribution of seats, and it was impossible for us to go on with the discussion of re-distribution. It was upon that ground that he moved that the consideration of the clause should be postponed—he said it was impossible to go on without a plan. But the hon. Member has a plan of re-distribution before him—he has the Bill upon which we are now in Committee, and which contains many propositions which may be modified—as most propositions are—in Committee, but which are certainly distinct propositions. The hon. Member says we are not justified in apportioning the new seats in Scotland until we have determined upon the means by which those new seats are to be secured. In laying down that proposition the hon. Member assumes that an increase in the number of the Members of this House is impossible. The Bill, however, was originally framed upon a contrary assumption. There is something very contradictory in the speeches and opinions of hon. Members on this side of the House, who seem to be not unfavourable to an increase being made in the representation of Scotland, while at the same time they tell us that we must not in any way infringe upon the amount of representation at present enjoyed in England, nor yet increase the number of the Members in this House. These views appear to me to involve a representative problem very difficult of solution. I am anxious to induce the Committee to arrive at such a frame of mind as will insure that if we do not to-night completely settle the question we may at least come to a point where we may fairly see before us a speedy settlement. In that hope I will endeavour to lay before the Committee the views which I, who have naturally considered this question not a little, entertain respecting it. In the first place, I must say that I know of no arrangement existing between Her Majesty's Government and the right hon. Gentleman or any party in this House; and therefore the indignation of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) upon that head was altogether unnecessary. The Committee will recollect that when I first introduced this question of the representation of Scotland, with the view to make it more considerable and more effective I proposed a scheme by which that representation would have been increased by seven Members, and these Members were to be divided between great civic communities, counties, and the learned bodies, and certainly, considering the limited means at our disposal, that plan promised to be an effective one. Under that plan, however, the seven additional Members so given to Scotland were not to be taken from Scotland or Ireland, but were to be provided by increasing the number of the Members of this House to that extent. I have never heard myself any argument against that plan for providing the additional Members; but I know there are many plans not successful in this world against which no arguments have ever been offered. I agree with the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) that there is no cabalistic charm in the number 658, as he told us a few years ago. I agreed with him then upon that point, and I agree with him now upon it; but unfortunately he does not now agree with me. What would have been the effect of giving seven additional Members to Scotland? Why, it would have increased the representation in the country of the great towns and of the considerable counties, and it would have given for the first time representation to those learned bodies of which Scotland is justly proud. By carrying into effect that scheme the balance of representation between England and Scotland would have been changed, and changed to the advantage of Scotland in no inconsiderable degree, but in a degree which we believed justice would have authorized us in proposing, and which we thought the feeling in England would have tolerated and perhaps have welcomed. But when you change the process, and propose that the seven additional Members that are to be given to Scotland are to be taken from England, you are in fact giving fourteen Members to Scotland as far as the balance of influence is concerned. I do not at this time wish to enter into the merits of such a proposition as that to which I have referred; but I do wish to point out to the Committee the very essential difference between the two propositions, which the Committee should calmly consider before arriving at a decision upon the question. I say this because I have observed in the discussion upon the subject that the difference between the two propositions has not been recognized, and that the question has been looked upon as one merely of providing the additional representation for Scotland, either by adding to the general representation of the House, or by deducting a certain number of seats from the aggregate representation of England. There being, although not an avowed, unquestionably a general feeling in this House that the number of its Members should not be increased—I may state that the number of Members of this House has been repeatedly increased, and that it has never been increased without our representation being rendered more efficient. We had to re-consider this Bill in this view: Was it just that the representation of Scotland should remain unaltered? After so large a settlement as that which has been made in the last two years in the electoral system of this country, it would, I think, have been a mistake not to have made some increase in the representation of Scotland; and, in spite of the difficulties we have had to encounter in carrying this into effect, I still adhere to that opinion. Now, upon this subject two proposals have been made—one by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), and the other by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley). I believed both those plans to be unwise, and preferred the original plan of the Government, which was well-matured and well-considered. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire says that, though disapproving both these plans, the Government expressed their willingness to adopt whichever the Committee might decide upon, I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman misapprehended what I said. What I stated was that the Government disapproved both those plans; but that if the Committee decided in favour of one of them we would consider its decision, and endeavour to make such a proposal founded upon it as, in our opinion, would probably be satisfactory. These, I believe, are the exact words I used, and I am prepared to act upon them. Well, what is the position of Scotland at the present moment with regard to an increase in its representation? I am sure that unless the Scotch Members act with discretion and caution—and it is, perhaps, superfluous to suggest to Scotch Members that they should act with discretion and caution—we shall have some difficulty in making that increase in the representation of Scotland to which I, for one, am sincerely favourable. Let us look at the materials before us. Is there any possibility by a re-arrangement of the present representation of Scotland of rendering that representation more effective? My own opinion is that that is not altogether a result of which we need despair. For example, I would take the two counties of Selkirkshire and Peeblesshire, and I am prepared to unite those two counties, which now send one Member each, and give the remaining Member to a group of Border burghs, as has been proposed this evening. That is one change which, though not adding to the representation of Scotland, is likely to make that representation more effective. But we now come to the number of Members we are prepared to add to the representation of Scotland. I will state to the Committee the views which Her Majesty's Government entertain on this subject, and I shall be very happy if those views are accepted by the Committee. I am prepared to support an increase of seven Members to the representation of Scotland; and I may remark that adding seven Members according to the original scheme of the Government, and according to the schemes now popular in the House, are two things essentially different, because in the one case the addition was simply an addition of seven Members, whereas in the other it is really an addition of fourteen. I do think that, after what has occurred on this question, as practical men, we ought to overcome any prejudice or difficulties that may interfere with our dealing with this subject, and not to hesitate to support an addition of seven Members to the representation of Scotland. After listening to the suggestions which have been made, I would myself propose that these seven Members should be apportioned in this wise—I would still increase the representation of the three great counties of Lanarkshire, Ayrshire, and Aberdeenshire, as before suggested, and I would add to the representation of Glasgow and Dundee. The claims of Dundee are, I admit, strong, and may be urged with a force which it is difficult to resist. That will take five Members. We have proposed to render the existing representation in one direction more efficient by adopting the suggested union of Selkirkshire and Peeblesshire, and bestowing the Member so obtained upon a group of Border burghs; and I am still of opinion that it would be wise on the whole to give two Members to the Universities of Scotland. That is a point upon which the Committee can clearly give its opinion. Though the Government think it better to give two Members to the Universities; of course they would listen and give attention to the opinion of the Committee on such a point. We would, of course, prefer to give the additional representation to Scotland by adding to the numbers of the House; but as I cannot flatter myself that that could be done, I would accept the principle laid down by the hon. Member for Montrose in his Instruction. That principle I would apply to the extent I have indicated, but not further; because if you chose to proceed further in its application, I say the claims of England are too great for me to disregard. But, bearing in mind how much we have to do, how short a space of time we have to do it in, and what great issues depend upon our completing this group of legislative measures upon the electoral system of the country, I recommend the Committee not to enter upon the question of dealing with the representation of England. You may to a certain extent be disturbing the settlement which we have arrived at with regard to England by dealing with those seven boroughs, but you can deal with them in legislation in the Scotch Bill. You do not disturb the English Bill; but if you apportion the three other boroughs which you are called upon to disfranchise, and which I see no reason for disfranchising, to meet the demands for representation in England, you must disturb the English Bill, and by so doing you will open a question which you will find it very difficult to close. If you desire to act in a practical spirit with a view to bring these great measures to a completion, I earnestly recommend you to accept the views which, on the part of the Government, I now express for the representation of Scotland. We will give you our earnest support in carrying them into effect, and if you accept them you will, I believe, attain your great objects—increased representation to your great counties, increased representation to your great towns of Glasgow and Dundee, and ample and adequate representation of your seats of learning. You will attain these great results, and you may attain them quickly. I trust, therefore, after this declaration of the intentions of the Government, that the Committee will proceed to-night to the consideration of the increase to the two Universities, and proceed to that consideration with spirit and with effect.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he regarded the proposals now submitted to the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government as a totally distinct and new set of proposals. He thought it necessary that they should have some time to consider them; or, if the Committee proceeded at once to their consideration, it ought to be on the understanding that the right hon. Gentleman submitted the scheme now laid before the Committee in a distinct shape as a substitute for that made in the Bill. The scheme was, no doubt, preferable to the one submitted by the Government last year; but still he trusted the Committee would accept the proposal made by the hon. Member for Montrose, which involved a very small addition to that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and which was a concession that the Members from the North thought they were entitled to ask at the hands of the House.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he was sorry that he could not be a party to any such compromise as that which had been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. He strongly opposed the principle of giving one single seat from the representation of England, after that representation had been settled in a measure which had received the consent of both Houses of Parliament, which had received the consent of the Queen, and which was now the law of the land, and he should feel it his duty to divide the House upon the proposal. He was ready to support the agreement come to last year to add to Scotland's Members, but only by voting for an increase of the House, a proposition against which no valid objection could be urged.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could quite understand the remark of the right hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Bouverie) that the Government had made a proposal involving points new to them, and which might require further time for consideration; but he was in no difficulty in that respect himself. He had had the plan of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) before him for some time, and being quite satisfied with it was prepared to vote for it. Though the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was an improvement on the original scheme in the Bill, he saw one fundamental objection to it. He would not enter into controversy respecting any eulogy he had delivered on old nomination boroughs, which served a purpose very different from the use to which the present small boroughs are put. But he was quite convinced that the general judgment of the country having approved the vote of the House by which the extinction of ten utterly insignificant places of only formal representation was decreed, it would be highly unsatisfactory to the country were they to recede from any portion of that vote. If they came to the conclusion that ten seats should not be given to Scotland, it would be hard to restore to life the ten burghs that had been smitten. But he thought the claim of Scotland to ten more Members had been fairly made out, and he was afraid a grievance would remain behind if the ten seats were cut down to the measure of the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to the arithmetical calculation of the right hon.

Gentleman, he could not admit that taking seven seats from England and giving them to Scotland would be tantamount to giving Scotland fourteen Members; for if the seven Members were added to the House, Scotland would have 60-665ths of the House, while if the seven Members were taken from England's, Scotland would have 60-658ths. That was the whole difference.

MR. J. HARDY said, that Devonshire would be robbed of six Members if the Scotch seats were to be supplied from England in addition to the disfranchisement of Totnes, and the disappointment of having the promised representation of Torquay unfulfilled. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) seemed inclined to explain away his expression of opinion on the value of small boroughs; but he asked the Committee to listen to his words. "Through the medium of small boroughs," said the right hon. Gentleman—

"You introduce those calm, sagacious, retired observers who are averse from the rough contact necessary in canvassing large bodies. . . . If that one ingress is to be the suffrages of a large mass of voters, the consequence is a dead level of mediocrities, which destroys not only the ornament but the force of this House, and which, as I think, the history of other countries will show is ultimately fatal to the liberties of the people."

That explicit declaration needed no comment.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had heard with amazement the proposal of the First Minister of the Crown to withdraw the second Member promised to Aberdeen, with its 90,000 inhabitants, and, as he had shown, nearly 9,000 prospective electors. The assertion of the right hon. Gentleman, that giving seven of England's Members to Scotland would be equal to parting with fourteen, could be supported only on the presumption that Scotland was hostile to England, and that in all divisions its Members would be found in the Opposition Lobby.

COLONEL FRENCH asked, with reference to the Prime Minister's proposal to join two counties, what he intended to do with Sutherlandshire and its 180 voters?

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he hoped the new Scotch Members would not be taken from England; but if it must be so, he thought it very hard that the proposal of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) should be preferred to that of the hon. Baronet (Sir Rainald Knightley).

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was not competent to the hon. Member to discuss the merits of any plan as opposed to the Instruction given to the Committee.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he hoped that, whatever was done to satisfy Scotland's claims, the representation of the Eastern Division of Somersetshire, which was the wealthiest and most populous portion of that county, would not be diminished.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I am not quite sure whether the hon. Member for York persists in his Motion for the postponement of the clause. I heard that he was about to withdraw it.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I wish to consult the convenience of the Committee, I rather mistook the course I intended to take.

MR. BRIGHT: That is not a very definite answer. I was rather surprised at the language of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and at the language of some Members opposite, on this question. They seemed to me to forget that Scotland is part of the United Kingdom; that, in point of fact, Scotland is only a name which we give to the Northern portion of this island; and that if you transfer Members to places north of the Tweed it is only the same as if those places were north of the Thames, or north of the Humber. Nothing could be more unconstitutional and nothing more unfortunate than to deal with this question as if we were giving some portion of our power as English Members to another and scarcely a friendly power which dwells in the Northern part of the island. Now, in the Bill of last year, hon. Gentlemen opposite, following the advice of the right hon. Gentleman, agreed to give three Members to three new boroughs in the county of Durham—to Darlington, Stockton, and, I think, the Hartlepoons. Well, but suppose that these three boroughs had been north of the Tweed, what would have been the difference? In point of fact, you are discussing a matter which does not exist, and you are frightening yourselves with a phantom in which there is nothing whatever substantial; and I protest, in the name of every man who wishes for the unity of the kingdom, against the contention in which the right hon. Gentleman has indulged—and I am sure he knows a great deal better—that in taking seven or ten Members from England and putting them to the north of the Tweed, you are aggrandizing Scotland at the expense of England.

Mr. Neville-Grenville

The hon. Gentleman who represents Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollett)—I think there is a dispute about the county he represents—laments, I know, very much that the boroughs of Scotland have passed into the hands of the Liberal party, and he knows also that gradually the counties in Scotland are also passing into the hands of the same party. That is literally what you fear, but it is really a very foolish fear; for, after all, the Scotch Gentlemen on this side of the House are merely going a little in advance of you, and you, under the Leadership of the right hon. Gentleman, make progress which to us is highly satisfactory. Therefore there is nothing in this terrible spectre which you are raising up. The hon. Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) has got some notion very likely that some harm is being done to Ireland. But even if the taking of a few Members from England and giving them to Scotland were a harm to England, that could not at all injure Ireland. I do not know anyone more disposed to do justice to Ireland than the Scotch Members in this House. I hope the Committee will take my advice in the matter, and give up all idea that they are about to engage in a transference of power when they take Members from boroughs which, wherever situated, are no true representation, and give them to any real constituencies in any part of the United Kingdom. Now, as to these ten boroughs which are in question, and the disturbance of which appals the hon. Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk), I will give you an illustration. The borough which I am permitted to represent contains, I believe, somewhere about 57,000 householders. If you will take all the householders that exist in these boroughs, you will find that, adding them all together, they amount to no more than 7,000. And what I have said of Birmingham, of course, applies to Manchester, Liverpool, and Glasgow. In point of fact, each of those great towns has a number of householders equal to 50,000 more than the whole of these small boroughs which it is proposed to disfranchise. Now, on that fact I wish to make one appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite. One of the great arguents of the right hon. Gentleman in asking you to agree to an extensive measure of household suffrage last year, and the argument which prevailed with you was, that it was better to settle the question, in the hope that there would be no further disturbance. Now, I ask you, when you are about to pass a Scotch Bill, is it not wise that you should make a re-distribution of seats that to the people of Scotland would appear in some fair degree satisfactory, so that you may not, the moment the new Parliament meets, have the whole question re-opened? If I were a Member of that side of the House—of course it is difficult for me to imagine that—but if I were a Member of that side of the House, and were afraid of progress, of that terrible thing which is called democracy—which means, I believe, generally equal representation—what I should do would be this: I should support the right hon. Gentleman in making the most comprehensive settlement of this question which is possible during the present Session; because there cannot be the smallest doubt that the people of England—unless they have degenerated from their forefathers, unless they have no regard for fairness or freedom—will never consent that there should be the enormous discrepancies which now exist between the representation of these great constituencies and these very small ones, which really are no representation at all. And really I argue that, if you knew your own business and worked your own principles, and maintained your own views, you would agree to a measure which the people of Scotland generally, and their representatives in this House, are willing to accept, rather than pass so small a measure that it will satisfy nobody, and will involve a re-opening of the whole question in the very next Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman is in a difficulty which we can all see. I presume that, if all the Gentlemen who sit behind him would fairly trust in his sagacity on this question, he would agree to the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose. He knows that it is a very reasonable proposition, and that it is more likely to close this question than any smaller plan will be. Therefore, if you will not make a disturbance about it, I have not the smallest doubt that he would agree to that proposition. Now, after having last year done so much, after the House has shown so great a disposition to support the right hon. Gentleman, why should you, on a matter like this, make a settlement which will be no settlement, and by agreeing to the Motion of the hon. Member for York, prevent the further progress of this Bill at the present time. I think the proposition of my hon. Friend is moderate and reasonable, and I hope the Committee will agree to it.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I quite agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) that it is not desirable that the Chairman should report Progress. We ought to endeavour to arrive, if possible, at a fair and reasonable settlement of the question of the representation of Scotland. But with the other observations of the hon. Gentleman I cannot at all agree. One of the arguments which he has brought forward is the disproportion of large boroughs like Birmingham and the small boroughs which it is sought to disfranchise, and the hon. Member says, "Surely, it is unreasonable that you should refuse to make a settlement of the question by getting rid of these small boroughs." Now, if this argument is good for anything, we ought to reconsider the whole platform of our representation. One of the principles of the Bill of last year was that no borough was to be disfranchised. The more material argument, however, which the hon. Member addressed to us is the great importance of settling this question in a manner which shall be fair and just towards Scotland. Now, I entirely concur in the remark which has been made by many hon. Gentlemen in the course of this debate, that Scotland has a fair claim to additional representation. I should be very glad to see that claim fully satisfied; but when the hon. Member for Birmingham reasons that we are to come now to a settlement of the question, allow me to remind him that this question must now be considered as part of and a continuation of the argument which we had last year with regard to the scheme for a complete reform of the representation in every part of the kingdom. I agree with him that Scotland is as much a part of the kingdom as any county in England, and that therefore we ought to entertain no jealousy about transferring, if it be reasonable, the representation from one portion of the kingdom to the other, even though it goes beyond the Tweed. But the question before us is really this—When you had your Reform Bills before you last year, including the Scotch Bill, which contemplated an addition of seven Members to this House, you did not pause for one moment in settling the question of re-distribution for England; but you went on the supposition that that re-distribution was a settlement of the question as far as this portion of the kingdom is concerned. I think we are quite as much bound to maintain that settlement as to extend additional representation to that part of the kingdom which is north of the Tweed. How, then, are we to reconcile these differences? Unfortunately in consequence of the Motion brought forward on Monday evening, a change was made with regard to the re-distribution of seats, without any determination being come to as to what the re-distribution should be. The consequence is that you have had in the earlier part of the evening to reverse the vote which was come to on Monday, because it was contrary to the principle on which you proceeded last year with reference to rating, and you are now going to adhere to a vote which reversed the principle you agreed upon last year that there should be no disfranchisement. However anxious I may be to give additional representation to Scotland, I think I am quite as much bound to adhere to the settlement we deliberately came to last year, and I therefore cannot vote for reversing it.

MR. WALROND hoped this would be treated as an Imperial question. He was ready to admit that they ought to legislate upon the same principles for all portions of the United Kingdom; and therefore he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk).

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) a most judicious one, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would place the substance of it in a distinct form before the Committee. He thought the proposal to give ten seats to Scotland would never become law.

MR. J. LOWTHIER said, he had no wish to postpone the clauses, although the more he looked at them the less he liked them. His only object having been to elicit the opinion of the Government, he would withdraw his Motion and support the Motion of the hon. Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BAXTER said, he would now move an Amendment to insert in line 10, after the word "shall," the words having reference to the Scotch University constituencies—

"Return one Member to serve in Parliament; from and after the end of the present Parliament the City of Glasgow shall be divided into two divisions in the manner specified in Schedule () hereto annexed, and each division shall return two Members; the City of Edinburgh shall return three Members; and the Town of Dundee, the City of Aberdeen, and the Counties of Lanark, Ayr, Aberdeen, and Perth shall each return two Members to serve in Parliament."

Mr. Walpole

He said the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had placed the Scotch Members somewhat at a disadvantage by making an entirely new proposal for the re-distribution of the seats for Scotland. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had given up one part of his former plan—namely, that of eliminating small places from the counties with a view of making the counties purely agricultural. He (Mr. Baxter) was entirely opposed to a "hard and fast line" between the constituencies. He entirely differed from the right hon. Gentleman's statement—that to take seven Members from England in order to add them to Scotland gave an additional representation of fourteen Members to Scotland. Even if that were so, Scotland with only sixty Members would still be greatly under-represented. There was a vast disproportion between the representation of England and Scotland; and the Scotch Members would be wanting in their duty if they did not appeal to the sense of justice of the House of Commons upon the matter. The Government proposed to give two Members to the Scotch Universities. He believed the majority of Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House, were opposed in principle to University representation altogether; because they believed it to be indefensible, and because they had not seen much to admire in its practical operation, either in England or Ireland. The Members of the Scottish Universities objected very much to the proposal to divide the Universities into two constituencies. He had heard from an eminent gentleman connected with the Universities that, rather than have two Members on the plan proposed by the Government, they would prefer to be represented by only one Member. He (Mr. Baxter) proposed a single Member as a compromise. With regard to the Amendment he now moved, he had endeavoured to discard party considerations altogether, and his proposal was based on population, wealth, and the number of electors. There were four large cities and four large counties in Scotland; and what he proposed was to give them an adequate representation. He would divide Glasgow, which contained one-seventh of the population of Scotland, into two districts, with two Members for each, and to give an additional Member to each of the following places:—The towns of Edinburgh, Dundee, and Aberdeen, and the counties of Lanark, Ayr, Aberdeen, and the agriral county of Perth. This plan would rid of the Boundary Commissioners, expedite the passing of the Bill. He thought the Government had met them fairly, and he had nothing to complain of in their conduct. The only difference between them was that, while the Government proposed to give Scotland 10 additional Members, he proposed to give her ten. The more the right hon. Gentleman looked into the question, the more he would agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) that Scotland was entitled to larger representation.

Amendment moved, in Clause 8, line 19, "shall," insert—to return one Member to serve in Parliament; and after the end of the present Parliament the County of Glasgow shall be divided into two divisions in the manner specified in Schedule () annexed, and each division shall return two Members; the City of Edinburgh shall return two Members; and the town of Dundee, the County of Aberdeen, and the Counties of Lanark, Aberdeen, and Perth shall each return two Members to serve in Parliament."—(Mr. Baxter.)

MR. ELCHIO said, he thought his hon. friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) was wrong in saying that the Universities would prefer one Member to

MR. BAXTER explained that the Gentleman he had referred to said the Universities would, of course, prefer two Members; but, rather than have them in the number proposed by the Government, they would prefer only one.

MR. ELCHIO said, there could be no doubt that those interested in the Scottish Universities were strongly in favour of two Members, on the ground that when they were adding so much to the democratic element in that House, it was desirable, as a corrective to the preponderance of mere lawyers, that they should give weight to the sort of men who would be likely to be produced from those seats of learning. He was disposed to agree with what had fallen from the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), that, considering what was done last year, it was a strong measure to re-open the question of re-distribution. Between the opinion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Randal Holt) and that of the hon. Member (Mr. Baxter), the House had had a choice of two opinions, and he had voted against the Motion. In his opinion, they had gone too far to retract; and therefore, although in principle his right hon. Friend was right in standing by the English Bill, still, the House being now in a false position, he thought a fair compromise was offered by the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. VANCE said, that a too ready assent had been given to the principle of giving additional Members to Scotland. He did not think that country was entitled to any additional representation at all. By the Reform Act of 1832 Scotland obtained more than its fair proportion of representatives. According to the Census of 1861 Scotland had a population of 3,066,000, and Ireland 5,800,000, or nearly double. Scotland had 53 Members, and Ireland 105, so that upon the ground of population Scotland was abundantly represented already. Again, if taxation were taken as a basis of representation, the metropolitan districts, whose wealth was greater than that of all Scotland, must be entitled to more Members than Scotland possessed. He thought the Amendment involved a breach of faith with those Members who had voted for the English Reform Bill of last year. But if the House decided on giving seven additional Members to Scotland, he protested against their being taken from England. The vote for disfranchising the ten English boroughs was a purely accidental one, and the claim of Scotland for ten additional Members was perfectly ridiculous. The Whig Government, in their Reform Bill of 1866, proposed seven additional Members for Scotland, and that proposal was adopted by the present Government without due foundation.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the question before the Committee was, whether the Scotch Universities should have two Members or only one. There was a general concurrence of opinion that Scotland was entitled to some additional representation. The proposal of the Government was that the Universities should be divided—Edinburgh and St. Andrews returning one Member, and Glasgow and Aberdeen the other. He should much wish to know the name of the person who made that singular communication to the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). He concluded that he must be an English student attending one of their Universities. That proposed division was approved by the Senatus Academicus and the Councils; and the only question was, whether the Universities should have two representatives or one. Now, the constituency of Cambridge University was 5,000; that of Oxford, 3,786; Dublin, 1,702. Each of these Universities returned two Members; and London, with a constituency of 1,000, was to return one. Now, the constituency of Edinburgh and St. Andrews would be 5,000, and that of Glasgow and Aberdeen 4,000, each with one Member. Having regard, therefore, to the number of voters, the proposal that the Scotch Universities should between them have two Members was a very moderate one. As to the proposed division, it was thought that some jealousy might probably exist between Edinburgh and Glasgow; and it was therefore much better that the interest of each of these Universities should be attended to by a separate Member.

MR. LAING said, he was entirely in favour of the general principles of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) giving ten more Members to Scotland. He thought that the large towns had an incontestable right to increased representation, while, on the other hand, he had a strong feeling in favour of giving two Members to the Scotch Universities. Now, he thought that there was a mode of reconciling the claims of both these interests. When the Committee remembered that the county of Sutherland contained only 181 voters, might they not with perfect propriety group it with the adjoining county of Ross, which was not a large county? He thought the representatives of Scotland would not be doing their duty if they allowed the representation of the Scotch Universities to be cut down from two to one, leaving a separate representation to such a county as Sutherland?

MR. GRANT DUFF suggested that the hon. Member (Mr. Baxter) should accept the proposal of the Government to give two Members to the Universities, and should omit that part of his Motion which claimed an additional Member for the county of Perth.

MR. DALGLISH said, as far as he was able to understand, the people of Scotland objected to the Scotch Universities having one-thirtieth of the representation of Scotland. As the English Universities had only one-hundredth of the English representation, and the Irish Universities only one fifty-fifth of the Irish representation, he thought that the Government proposed too large a representation relatively for the Scotch Universities.

MR. BAXTER said, he had not intended to raise the issue as to whether the Universities should have two Members or only one Member. He should therefore omit the words of his Amendment which related to the Universities, and also adopt the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), and leave out Perth from his Amendment.

The Lord Advocate

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BAXTER then moved an Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 20, after the word "Parliament," to insert the words—

"The City of Glasgow shall be divided into two divisions in the manner specified in Schedule () hereto annexed, and each division shall return two Members; the City of Edinburgh shall return three Members; and the Town of Dundee, the City of Aberdeen, and the Counties of Lanark, Ayr, and Aberdeen shall each return two Members to serve in Parliament."—(Mr. Baxter.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the proposed Amendment divided itself into several distinct propositions, which he submitted ought to be put separately.

THE CHAIRMAN said, there was no necessity for putting each of the propositions separately, inasmuch as they had all been moved as one Amendment, and it was open to any hon. Member to move to amend the proposed Amendment.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought it would be advisable to have the question relating to the representation of the Scotch Universities—the question raised by the clause itself—disposed of in the first instance.

MR. MONCREIFF said, that the Amendment just put by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) was essentially a re-distribution scheme; and therefore he thought it would be better to have it put as a whole.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY suggested that the hon. Member for Montrose should allow the latter part of the clause to be carried before he added his Amendment.

MR. BAXTER said, he did not wish to prejudge the question of the representation to be given to the Universities. His object was to have a decision on the question whether Scotland was to have seven or ten additional Members.

MR. POWELL asked the Chairman whether, if the proposition regarding the r of Members for the counties and named in the Amendment were not, there would be any difficulty in subsequently that the towns and should have additional Members?

JAMES FERGUSSON said, he thought it would be convenient to the case of all those counties and en bloc. He was of opinion that the one relating to the Universities should be proposed of in the first instance.

CHAIRMAN, in reply to Mr. L., said, that if a given proposition negatived that same proposition could be raised again.

GATHORNE HARDY asked whether, if the Committee decided against the proposition of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire as a whole, a proposition to give one Member each to Lanarkshire, Aberdeenshire, and the town of Aberdeen, could be again raised?

CHAIRMAN said, that would depend on whether the subsequent proposition was another scheme of re-distribution. In the Committee on the Engineering Bill, a Motion was made to give one Member to each of six large towns.

The Committee negatived that; but afterwards, by a subsequent Motion, the Committee decided on giving one Member each to four of those towns. This was held to be a different proposition from the previous one.

GATHORNE HARDY proposed, as an Amendment to the Amendment of the Bill for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), to put the words "be divided into two divisions in the manner specified in Schedule () hereto annexed," in order to insert the words "return three Members to serve in Parliament."

He wished to explain his Amendment, which was, that instead of giving four Members to Glasgow, which has not been done in the case of any of the towns of England, they should give one Member, in the same way as London, Manchester, and Birmingham.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by leaving out the words divided into two divisions in the manner specified in Schedule () hereto annexed," in order to insert the words "return three Members to serve in Parliament." — (Mr. Secretary General.)

CARDWELL: It is quite true that that towns in England did not get four Members; but if you will take Liverpool, associated with the town of Birkenhead; if you will take Manchester together with Salford, which forms part of it; you will find that Manchester and Liverpool have five Members.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 222; Noes 261: Majority 39.

Mr. DISRAELI said: I would express a hope that after this decision the Committee may be induced to adopt the plan of the Government. I trust, upon reflection, they will find it the best way to expedite business, and that which, upon the whole, will best meet the opinions and feelings of the majority of the Members.

On Question, "That those words be there inserted,"

Mr. MONCREIFF: I would suggest that the best course is to report Progress. I think it is a very fair subject for consideration what course we ought to take, and I do not think it is reasonable in the right hon. Gentleman to ask us to go on to-night.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: The right hon. Member opposite, I understand, wishes us to report Progress. But I trust, at all events, that nothing will be done till the words are inserted upon which the Committee has just divided.

Mr. GLADSTONE: That is a most proper proposal. But I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will remember that the plan of the Government has never been put upon the Paper. It was stated verbally to-night; but we have had no opportunity of considering it. I think it is quite plain that the Committee, by the vote at which they have just arrived, have made it useless for the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) to propose the next portion of his Amendment, relating to Edinburgh. But we ought to have the plan of the Government before us in an intelligible shape.

Mr. DISRAELI: The proposal of the Government is no new plan, and it is perfectly intelligible. I must say I think this is a favourable opportunity for making progress with the Bill, and that we ought not to report Progress at such an early hour. Unexpected business came on at the commencement of the evening, and prevented our entering at once upon the discussion of this measure; it is now only twelve o'clock, and I really do not think the opportunity ought to be wasted. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that the plan of the Government, which involves only a few and simple alterations of an original proposal, requires to be better understood, there can be no objection to that. But allow me to say that there is a great deal to be done before those provisions are reached. Let us, having begun with it, at least dispose of the scheme of the hon. Member for Montrose; so that when we do meet again, if it be thought necessary to devote another evening to the subject, the opinion of the Committee may be finally taken upon those points only which it is thought necessary to reserve. I cannot consent to report Progress at twelve o'clock.

Colonel SYKES said, he should in any case divide the House upon the proposition relating to Aberdeen.

Mr. BOUVERIE: Sir, I thought the right hon. Gentleman's proposal a reasonable one in itself, that after this division we should consider whether we could not adopt his scheme. The right hon. Gentleman no doubt wishes to be very fair in his dealings with the Scotch Members; but it is a little hard on us that we should be requested at once to adopt a scheme which we never heard of till this evening, and which is not upon the Notice Paper. A great part of this scheme was to found a new group of Border boroughs, and to unite two of the smaller counties in the South of Scotland; but the names of the boroughs have not yet been stated. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) may be unwilling to press his Motion further, if time be allowed him for consideration; and on the part of the right hon. Gentleman it would be but fair to give us time to consider his proposals. If these be put upon the Paper, when we meet on Thursday I hope there will be a good chance of despatching the business in the course of the evening.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, it is true that the proposals of the Government as stated this evening are not formally upon the Paper; but everything which my right hon. Friend has stated is in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Montrose. If therefore you leave out everything relating to Edinburgh and Aberdeen, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Montrose will carry everything that has been proposed by my right hon. Friend. I do trust, therefore, the Committee will resolve to finish that portion of the business.

MR. ELLICE, with a view of carrying matters to a satisfactory conclusion, hoped the hon. Member for Montrose would accede to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and allow those points to be inserted as to which there was no dispute.

MR. PEASE said, that according to the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for Montrose, the Committee had power to deal with ten seats. Only seven of these were provided for by the plan of the Government. Were the remaining three seats to be left in abeyance, or what was to become of them? An answer to that question would probably affect the votes of some hon. Members sitting near him.

MR. BAXTER regretted very much the decision at which the Committee had just arrived; but felt it his duty to defer to such a plain expression of opinion. It would not be, he thought, consulting the interests of Scotland and of the Liberal party, or taking a proper course, if he were to put the House to the trouble of dividing again with regard to Edinburgh and Aberdeen. He still hoped the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider his determination to give only seven representatives to Scotland.

Amendments made; words inserted.

Mr. Bouverie

MR. GATHORNE HARDY moved to omit from the Amendment the words "the City of Edinburgh shall return three Members."

MR. M'LAREN said, he hoped the Government would re-consider this point. Three Members had been given to Leeds, which had a population not much larger than Edinburgh, while its wealth and taxation were very much smaller. Edinburgh also contributed more to the taxation of the country than Birmingham and than Dublin, which were to have three Members, and as the capital of Scotland its claims ought to be considered.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am quite ready to consider the case of Edinburgh without any prejudice, and without being in the least influenced by the late division. Everybody admires Edinburgh, and everybody respects the representatives of Edinburgh, even though they may not sit on our side of the House. I do not think these questions ought to be decided entirely by population; but I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman that the population of Edinburgh is equal to that of Leeds, since, according to the last Returns, Edinburgh has 168,000, while Leeds has 207,000. [Mr. M'LAREN: I said it was not much larger.] Then, I do not exactly understand why the name of Leeds was introduced. We are virtually giving an additional Member to Edinburgh by giving a representative to its University, and Edinburgh is also indirectly represented by the port of Leith. Therefore the population of Edinburgh will be represented under our new system by no less than four Members. Under these circumstances, I cannot accede to the hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

MR. BEECROFT said, he wished it to be understood that Leeds had a much larger population than Edinburgh.

Amendment agreed to.

Moved to omit the words "the City of Aberdeen."

COLONEL SYKES: Sir, at this time of night, or rather morning, and with Members long wearied, I cannot expect any arguments of mine to be listened to; if they were gospel-truths they would be unheeded; but a grievous injustice is about to be inflicted. Here is Aberdeen, with its 90,000 inhabitants, its progress in wealth, its great intelligence, the seat of a celebrated University, and the seat of active shipbuilding and manufacturing industry; and yet it is proposed to strike it out of the Amendment that would give it an additional Member. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire proposed his measure of Reform, Aberdeen was put down for an extra Member in an official Return delivered in the morning; but before the day was out Aberdeen disappeared from a second official Return, and Edinburgh was substituted. Under these circumstances I hope and trust that the right hon. Gentleman, if he will not permit the question of Aberdeen to be postponed, will consider its claims to one of the three spare seats which will be available. One word more—the ten boroughs that have been disfranchised contain 2,300 electors, while Aberdeen has 4,236; to call this a just system of representation is absolutely a mockery.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed after the word "Parliament," to insert the words—

"The City of Glasgow shall return three Members to serve in Parliament; the Town of Dundee and the Counties of Lanark, Ayr, and Aberdeen shall each return two Members to serve in Parliament."

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed the insertion of words providing that a Member should be returned jointly by the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews, and the other jointly by the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen.

Motion agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to add to the 8th clause the following words from the end of the 9th clause:—

"And the City of Glasgow, until otherwise directed by Parliament, shall comprise the places mentioned in Schedule (A.) hereto annexed."

MR. ELLICE moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. DISRAELI thought it would be desirable to finish the clause.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that the question before the House was without a precedent in the English Bill, and demanded the serious consideration of the House.

MR. BAXTER said, that if the Amendment of the Lord Advocate was persisted in they would have to consider the vote to which they had recently come. He objected to taking the small towns out of the county of Lanark.

MR. DISRAELI said, that he should have been content to leave the matter to the Boundary Commissioners, only it was impossible for them to deal with it. The better plan would be to deal with the matter by a separate clause.

MR. DAELGLISH said, that if any alterations were made in the boundary of the suburbs of Glasgow he should move that they have a Member totally independent of the city of Glasgow, as part of the lower ward of Lanarkshire.

Motion, to report Progress, withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK, in rising to move the proviso of which he had given Notice, said, that by reason of the vote arrived at the other night, as he thought upon unfair grounds, ten English boroughs had been disfranchised. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had since proposed to give seven of these ten seats to Scotch burghs. When once a bargain had been arrived at in that House it ought to be maintained with honour on both sides, and last year an honourable bargain was thus made that the additional seats for Scotland should be obtained by a small addition to the number of Members of that House, and should not be taken either from English or Irish boroughs. To support this assertion he would read an extract from the speech of the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing), who said he assumed that the demand of Scotland for additional seats would be met by making a small addition to the number of Members of that House. On the faith of that understanding he and others had voted for the Government; but if he had been told that the additional Members for Scotland would have been taken from England, he, for one, would have strongly opposed the Reform Bill of last year. He did not wish to have the vote of the other night rescinded; but so long as many important districts of England were not fairly represented, he could not consent to give those seats to Scotland. He could not suppose there was any difficulty in increasing the number of Members of that House. The House was already too small, and a plan had been proposed for largely increasing its accommodation, so that he could not suppose an addition of seven votes furnished a reason why a pledge given on both sides of the House should not be kept. The Reform Bill of last year was treated on both sides as a final measure, and, as such, was agreed to by both Houses, and received the assent of the Crown. If, however, before its provisions come into operation an attempt was made to upset it by a vote on another Bill, what hope could there be that the settlement could possibly stand? Conceding, as he did, that seven additional seats should be given to Scotland, he hoped the House would agree to accept the alternative proposed by the Government last year, that these seats should be found by an addition to the seats of that House. In that case the ten boroughs disfranchised by the recent vote of the House might be given either to English counties or to some of the largest English towns.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause as amended, to add the words "Provided the representation of England and Ireland be not thereby diminished."—(Sir Lawrence Palk.)

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am not at all surprised that my hon. Friend should call attention to the peculiar condition in which the Committee are placed with respect to the settlement made last year. But I must remind my hon. Friend the Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk) that if he accepts, as he seems disposed to do, the vote of the House the other night, by this proposal to apportion these representatives to other parts of England, he really re-opens the whole question, and disturbs the settlement of last year. Now, although I regret that the basis on which our present Bill for Scotland was founded was not agreed to, yet by taking a certain number of seats from England and giving them to Scotland you do not re-open the English Bill; whereas, if you follow the scheme of my hon. Friend you do re-open the whole question of the English Reform Bill, chaos will come again, and instead of arriving at the settlement which has been promised we should embark on "a sea of troubles," and our course might end in disaster. I agree with my hon. Friend in his general views and feelings on this subject. I should be glad if I could have obtained that advantage of increasing the representation of Scotland by adding to the Members of this House; but I found that this was not possible. We have been engaged on this work for two years. It has been a very severe and difficult labour, and I think that, on the whole, we have arrived at a conclusion which will be satisfactory to the country. Both sides of this House acting with considerable unanimity, we felt that, with regard to this question of the increase of Members for Scotland, it was impossible strictly to adhere to the proposal of last Session. But we must look at the whole question as practical men, and see whether, by mutual concession and compromise, we can bring about a satisfactory result. Well, I do not think my hon. Friend need feel dissatisfied on the whole with what has occurred. There has been shown on both sides a very fair anxiety to bring matters to a conclusion. The conclusion is a temperate and a moderate one. It really satisfies all the just claims of Scotland, and satisfies them in a way which peculiarly recommends itself to me—although, of course, I should have preferred my own suggestion—upon this ground, that it does not re-open the English Bill. I hope this will be well weighed by my hon. Friend the Member for Devonshire; and I trust, if he gives his consideration to it, with that mature judgment which I have seen him display in many instances, that, having asserted his principle, in which I entirely sympathize, he will not, after what has occurred this evening, place the Committee under the necessity of dividing, but will feel that we have brought this matter to a settlement which the country will recognize as adequate to the occasion.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he trusted that the hon. Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk) would divide. The Amendment, in fact, raised an important question of principle—that of the number of the House of Commons—which they had not yet had an opportunity of discussing.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he regarded the proviso as only rendering still more bitter the pill which the Members for the small English boroughs, of whom he was one, had to swallow.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 262: Majority 167.

ABYSSINIA—THANKS TO THE ARMY.

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHYARDS ACT
(1867) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 16.)
(The Bishop of Oxford.)
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

Clause 1 (Giver of Land may reserve exclusive Right to the extent of One-Tenth).

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved an Amendment, of which he had given Notice, to assimilate the law to that existing in Ireland, where the burials of Roman Catholics and others objecting to the rites of the Church of England might be performed in Church of England burial-grounds (on notice being given to the minister) according to the form of the religion to which such person had belonged.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he could not acquiesce in the Amendment of his noble Friend, which would introduce a change into the general law of England. He could not agree with the noble Lord that allowing ministers of different denominations to come into churchyards, and to perform therein different and various services, would tend to peace—he believed it would have a very different result, and would, moreover, be subversive of the very principle of an Established Church. The noble Lord, moreover, was mistaken as to the state of the law in Ireland. It was necessary to obtain the permission in writing of the clergymen in Ireland before any service other than that of the Church of England could be performed in the churchyard; but the Amendment of his noble Friend proposed that the right to come in should be absolute, subject only to a time to be fixed by the clergyman.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the Amendment proposed by his noble Friend was exceedingly desirable. If adopted, it would have the effect of putting an end to some very scandalous exhibitions which now occurred when clergymen happened to possess more zeal than discretion.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in reply, was understood to express a hope that the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford), upon reflection, would be able to look favourably upon the principle embodied in the Amendment which had been admitted in Ireland and not refuse a similar concession in England. He would not trouble their Lordships to divide.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

LORD REDESDALE moved the omission of "one-tenth," with a view to substitute "200 square yards" as the amount of land which a donor might reserve for himself and family.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he had no objection to allow "one-sixth" to be substituted for "one-tenth;" but decidedly objected to limit a donor's reserved ground to 200 square yards. His object was to induce persons to make as large grants of land as possible.

Word "One-tenth" struck out; "One-sixth" inserted instead thereof.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Another Amendment moved, and negatived.

Bill to be read 3^d on Thursday next, and to be printed as amended. [No. 124.]

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS BILL—(No. 93).

(The Lord Chelmsford.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that although he had consented to take charge of the Bill in their Lordships' House, he feared he should be unable to do justice to the subject. The intention of the Bill was to improve the comfort of the labouring classes of the community in respect of their dwellings; and the magnitude of the evil with which it proposed to grapple was forcing itself daily more and more upon public attention, and, in the language of a petition recently presented in favour of the Bill, legislation on the subject was not only desirable but had become absolutely indispensable. The measure he now submitted to their Lordships had been thrice read a second time in the House of Commons without a division; and on the first occasion, in 1866, it was referred to a Select Committee, which reported upon it favourably. In that year, however, the pressure of Public Business prevented its passing that House sufficiently early to give hopes of its becoming law; and last year, having been read the second time, and gone into Committee, it was withdrawn for a similar reason. This year, however, it was introduced in the other House very early in the Session, and came up to their Lordships unanimously recommended by the House of Commons; its main provisions had been agreed to by both sides of the House; it was under discussion in Committee on three days, and various Amendments were introduced, but no division took place, except one on an insignificant proposition with regard to the Metropolitan Board of Works and the City of London. Hitherto, however, all attempts to remedy the evil by legislation had proved abortive. The measure which he now submitted to their Lordships had been under the consideration of the other House during the last three Sessions. The Bill thus came to their Lordships' House recommended by the unanimous sanction of the other House of Parliament. It was not, however, to be expected that a Bill of this description, which must necessarily be of a compulsory character, as it would interfere with the rights of private property, would be unopposed; it would, of course, meet with opposition from owners of the poorer descriptions of property, which he had heard was daily increasing in value, owing to the wholesale destruction of poor dwellings by the construction of railways and other improvements in the metropolis. The unhappy tendency of the present wholesale destruction of small dwellings in the metropolis, and the consequent overcrowding of poor families, could not be more forcibly illustrated than by an instance which lately occurred. A working man and his family, seven in number, were last autumn flung out of the lodging where they had previously lived, the house being doomed to make way for one of the new metropolitan improvements—the erection of the new Courts of Justice. The work by which the man gained his living required that he should not go far in search of another dwelling; but the neighbourhood being already greatly over-peopled, he was glad to get a single room in a house in an adjacent street, the windows of which overlook one of our great Inns of Court. He had, of course, to pay what to him was a high price for huddling-room in so good a situation; but he had no choice, and thought himself lucky to get in there. What happened? There were then in that house fifty-seven human beings, eating, drinking, and sleeping, cooking and washing, sickly and well, all stowed together during the sweltering days of autumn. Typhus scented its prey too quickly, and marked the wretched man for its own. While he lay ill his wife and six children had to inhale his pestiferous breath, and communicated involuntarily the contagion to the other inmates of the house. The victim had not a chance for life; and when he sunk in death his widow and six children were removed to the workhouse, while his corpse was interred at the expense of the parish. This was not a solitary, but rather a representative instance of a very large class of sufferers. Many parallel instances could easily be produced. Those of their Lordships who had not attended to the subject could have no conception of the large extent to which filth, disease, and pestilence prevailed, and the commonest decencies of life disregarded. But he would not shock their Lordships by many details; he would refer to as few as he could consistently with the necessity of proving that such a measure as the present was urgently required. He would therefore merely give some illustrations drawn from the three principal towns of Liverpool, Manchester, and London. The Report of the Medical Officer of Liverpool for 1867 stated—

“It has been mentioned that at the nightly visits the inspectors are required to take notice of the arrangements as well as of the number of the persons in a family occupying a single room. The law does not give us any power to interfere in this matter, except in the case of the rooms of the registered common lodging-houses; but the following facts will show the magnitude of the moral evil belonging to the present single room occupation; and the facts will also disclose, however repulsively, the canker which threatens to blight the most sacred bonds of the family and social system. In 62 instances adult sons and daughters slept in the same room with their parents, and in three instances in the same bed. In 152 instances adult daughters slept in the same room, and in 56 instances in the same bed with their parents. In 99 instances adult sons slept in the same room, and in 37 instances in the same bed with their parents. In 214 instances adult sons slept in the same room, and in 158 instances in the same bed with their mothers. In 37 instances adult daughters slept in the same room, and in 27 instances in the same bed with their fathers. In 59 instances the mother with her adult sons and daughters slept in the same room, and in 21 instances in the same bed together. In 12 instances the father with his adult sons and daughters slept in the same room, and in six instances in the same bed together. In 7 instances a mother, adult son, and a female lodger slept in the same room, and in two instances in the same bed together. In 64 instances a man, his wife, and a female lodger slept in the same room, and in three instances in the same bed. In 12 instances a man, wife, and male lodger slept in the same room. In 39 instances adult brothers and sisters slept in the same room, and in 20 instances in the same bed. The overcrowding which we find in sub-let houses is generally connected with, or caused by, these bad arrangements of a family. Thus, for example, in one room of the cubical dimensions of 900 feet, a mother and her two sons, aged 18 and 20, were in one bed, and a man, his wife, and his daughter, aged 18, in another bed.”

The space allotted to each person was 150 cubic feet, or less than two-fifths of the measurement allotted to the inmates of our prisons—

“In another room, of the cubical dimensions of 800 feet, there were found sleeping a father, two sons, aged 18 and 20, a daughter, aged 22, and a female lodger, aged 30. In another room, of the cubical dimensions of 800 feet, there were found sleeping in one bed on the floor two brothers, aged 24 and 26, and four sisters, aged 28, 20, 18, and 16.”

The Medical Report for Manchester furnishes similar instances—

“Paradise Court, 40 yards by 30, contains 48 families, and consists of back-to-back houses, and on one side back-to-back cellars; contains seven privies, situated in the centre of a court, in a very filthy condition, with large ashpit between.”

In one place in Manchester, with an area of about 3,000 yards, there were 106 houses and cellars containing 154 families, and 546 persons. One district alone had furnished 200 cases of typhus during a period of nine months. Turning from Manchester to the metropolis, a similar state of things would be found to exist. The Rev. Mr. Andrews, incumbent of St. Luke's, King's Cross, said—

“At the last Census my incumbency contained a population numbering 8,050. The Midland Railway Company have demolished 275 houses, and in consequence the population, which was 8,050 at the taking of the Census, has been reduced to 3,800, a reduction of more than 4,000.”

In Old St. Pancras and the adjoining parishes not less than 750 houses have been pulled down, whereby an estimated population of 18,000 have been ejected. Mr. West, the district missionary, stated that, in consequence of the curtailment of supply, the rent of rooms in the neighbourhood had risen 20 per cent; overcrowding, as a natural result, was intensified, and nine-tenths of the families whose circumstances required residence in the neighbourhood, and who had therefore taken refuge in the surrounding districts, were said to live in one room. Mr. Eldridge, the missionary of the Clare Market district, said that 206 houses, inhabited by the labouring classes, had been demolished for the site of the new Law Courts. These houses contained 1,120 families. Out of 1,000 families in his district, four-fifths live in one room, generally very small. The effect of this was very shortly and strongly described by the incumbent of Trinity, St. Giles's, who said—

“You have no conception of the state in which people are living in part of my district. They are crowded together, and live like vermin.”

And, almost in the same words, the curate of St. Peter's, Regent Square, says, “Part of our district is greatly overcrowded, and the people live like animals.” The Registrar of the Evicted Tenants' Aid Association, in his Report referring to the block of buildings between Cow Cross and Peter's Lane, in the East Central district, said—

“The whole of these rookeries, inhabited principally by the lowest characters, are in every respect totally unfit for human occupation, and for this reason I believe they have been already condemned; if so, the eviction should be proceeded with at once; for, besides the dilapidated state of the whole, the pest-breeding stench arising from the accumulated filth and the overcrowded state of every house are such that it is no wonder that cholera and fever reign supreme. In Broad Yard, which consists of 17 houses, inhabited by 45 families, eight persons sleeping within a yard of the only closet in the court were attacked by cholera; of these eight but one recovered. In Rose Alley, where 32 families dwell in 14 small houses, having again but one closet for the common use, Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 are full of fever—5 cases were taken this week to Bartholomew's Hospital, other cases at home. Fryingpan Alley, containing 13 houses, with but one closet for the whole, is inhabited by 28 families. Pit Alley, having 12 houses, and, as usual, but one closet for the whole shelters 26 families. The water in all these tenements is supplied through a hole in the wall for one half-hour daily. There is one house where the water has been entirely cut off for the past two years. On the authority of the missionary consulted by me, and who most kindly gave me every facility for obtaining information, I have to state that the whole of this property belongs to only two persons—one a most influential vestryman of the parish, and the other a lunatic. The missionary solemnly assured me that these places were never entered by either a clergyman or a policeman; the only visitors to these wretched domiciles being the doctor and himself."

He could multiply indefinitely those cases, and he trusted their Lordships would consider those he had given as merely specimens of what was too general; because, even if they considered them all that could be adduced they would have but an imperfect idea of the wretchedness and demoralization which existed in all those places where this terrible overcrowding existed. It would be a reproach to the Legislature and to the country if no attempt were made to remedy, or at least to mitigate, such an evil by legislative interference. Their Lordships would naturally ask whether there was in existence no legislation calculated to carry out in any degree the object of this Bill? In 1851 the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Shaftesbury) introduced a Bill empowering the local authorities to exercise certain powers with regard to lodging-houses for the poor. It was unnecessary that he should state the details of that Bill, as it was merely a permissive measure, and had failed in carrying out the object in view. By the provisions of the Public Health Act of 1866, the Secretary of State might empower the nuisance authority of any city or town of not less than 5,000 inhabitants to make regulations—

"1, for fixing the number of persons who may occupy a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family; 4, for enforcing therein the provision of privy accommodation and other appliances and means of cleanliness in proportion to the number of lodgings and occupiers, and the cleansing and ventilation of the common passages and staircases; Penalties not exceeding 40s. for any one offence, with an additional Penalty not exceeding 20s. for every day during which a default in obeying such regulations may continue."

Where two convictions for overcrowding a house, or the occupation of a cellar as a separate dwelling-place occurred, two justices might direct the closing of the premises for such time as they might deem fit, and in the case of cellars permanently close the same. He believed that Act had not answered the purpose for which it was passed, chiefly because the Local Boards of Health shrunk from putting its provisions in force; and it was in consequence of the necessity being strongly felt for the passing of an effective measure upon this subject that he had been induced to lay this Bill before their Lordships. The Local Boards had shrunk from applying the regulations of the Act with stringency, because the effect of doing so would have been to render homeless multitudes of families who were compelled to find shelter in these unhealthy dwellings. The general provisions of the present Bill were these—Its operation was limited to the City of London, the Metropolis, boroughs not within jurisdiction of Local Boards, towns under Commissioners constituted by local Acts, and places with Local Boards under Public Health Act and Local Government Act. The Bill provided for the appointment of an Officer of Health in any place where none already exists. If the Officer of Health (whether on representation or otherwise) found any street or premises unfit for human habitation, or in a condition to be injurious or dangerous to health, he was to report to the Local Authority. That body, designated in the schedule as being the Local Authority, was to send a copy of the Report to the owner of the premises, together with plans and specifications of the works necessary. The owner, within fourteen days after notice, might state objections to the plan, &c., which the Local Authority might alter. An appeal would lie to the Quarter Sessions. Within three calendar months after the order was made, within one month after determination of the Quarter Sessions, the owner was to state, in writing, whether he would execute works or not. If he elected to execute the necessary works and did not do so, the Local Authority might order the premises to be closed, or execute the works themselves. If he did not elect to do so, the Local Authority might shut up the premises or purchase them; and if the purchase money were not agreed upon, a valuation was to be made of the market value of the property as being unfit for human habitation; where the Local Authority was entitled to acquire premises they might empower a building company to act on their behalf, on terms and conditions as to the payment of the compensation, and as to executing the works under the superintendence of the surveyor to Local Authority. The owner, instead of effecting the improvements, might take down the buildings, but might not re-build on the site any house injurious or dangerous to health. If the lessee refused to execute the works the landlord might do it, but the lease would be forfeited, and the value of interest must be paid. The Local Authority was to hold all property acquired under the Act upon trust to provide, by the construction of new or repairing of existing buildings, the labouring classes with suitable dwellings; and for opening out enclosed, or partially enclosed, alleys or courts inhabited by the labouring classes, or otherwise leaving such open spaces as may be necessary to make them healthful. The Local Authority was every year to present, in the form required by the Secretary of State, an account of what had been done and of monies received and paid. The expenses incurred by the Local Authority were to be defrayed out of the local rate. The Public Works Loan Commissioners might make loans for the purposes of the Act, to be secured by mortgage of the buildings erected or to be erected, and by mortgage of the local rate. The Local Authority was not empowered to increase the local rate for the purposes of the Act beyond 2*d.* in the pound. The Bill applied equally to Scotland and Ireland. Having laid before their Lordships the principal provisions of the Bill, he would proceed to state some of the objections which had been raised against the Bill—their Lordships were no doubt already aware of some of these through the printed papers that had been circulated. In the first place, it was said that this was the first time an attempt had been made to take from private owners compulsorily their property when not required for any public purpose. He did not know in what restricted sense this objection was to be taken; but for himself he could hardly conceive a more important public purpose than that which this Bill was intended to effect. Let them by all means respect private property; but to what species of property did this measure relate? To houses unfit for human habitation, and which were therefore likely to engender disease. Such houses were unfit for human habitation, either by reason of originally improper construction, or from want of proper repair; and in either case, the fault being in the proprietors or lessees, who had promoted an evil which was beyond the power of the law, it would be monstrous that there should be no power to abate the nuisance. Objection had been made by the Vestry of Marylebone to the substitution of the Metropolitan Board of Works for the vestries of the different parishes. Now, he must say the whole of a town was interested in weeding out those nurseries of disease and pestilence which might spread themselves over the community, and that was of infinitely greater importance to the town itself than even the providing parks for the health and recreation of the people. It was not at all improbable that vestrymen of parishes might themselves be the owners of property of this description—and he had read to their Lordships a remarkable instance where this was actually the case—and therefore he felt very strongly indeed that it was infinitely better that the Metropolitan Board of Works, against whom no such imputation of interest could be alleged, should be placed in a position to control this important matter rather than the vestries of the different parishes. Another objection had been made by the parish of Marylebone with regard to the local rate not to exceed 2*d.* in the pound for carrying out the provisions of the Act; but as to this great misunderstanding prevailed. It was not a building rate, as seemed to be supposed—it would not be called for unless where the Local Authority undertook the works and required a loan from the Public Works Loan Commissioners—the property would afterwards be sold to reimburse the expenditure, and the rate would only be required to make up any deficiency between the amount borrowed and the sum realized by the sale. This measure was one of essential importance to the comfort, health, and, he might add, decency of thousands upon thousands in the metropolis. It was only the other day that he read a paragraph in a newspaper, which was by no means complimentary to their Lordships, with reference to this Bill. The Observer of the 24th of May, said—

“The Bill of Mr. Torrens to provide suitable dwellings for the working classes has gone up to the Lords, and it is already beset with perils. The great property owners of London, more especially those who have seats in the Upper House, are opposed to the measure. A vast area of London belongs to eminent Members of the peerage, and if such noblemen obstruct the passage of the Bill in their own supposed interest, or that of the leaseholders, it will probably be lost and the evils which so much require remedy will not only continue but increase, until once more pestilence will assail us and all classes, under the alarm that will be excited, will begin again to talk of doing something to mitigate overcrowding and the habitation of unhealthy houses."

LORD PORTMAN: Why do not you read the conclusion of the paragraph? It was in these words, "Do this at your peril."

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he did not know whether any of their Lordships were unhappily owners of property of this description, but if they were, he was quite confident it would not influence them in the slightest degree; their only desire would be to enter into the consideration of this measure as they would to any other measure. This he was quite sure of—that if they were to "do it at their peril," they would never be deterred from discharging their duty by such a threat as that; but that they would discharge their duty with respect to it as they did on every other occasion which was for the benefit of the country. He now asked them to give the Bill a second reading. The other evening his noble Friend at the table (Lord Portman), rather irregularly, had made some observations with regard to the Bill, and pressed on him the necessity of sending it to a Select Committee. He thought it undesirable that the Bill should be sent to a Select Committee, because he might be unable to attend the Committee, being engaged in hearing appeals; but he knew very well when suggestions of this kind were thrown out, and with an apparent assent from some of their Lordships, it would not be very hopeful for him to struggle against the proposal. If therefore the noble Lord made a Motion to that effect, he should consent to it and would attend the Committee, and he was happy to add he had secured the services of his noble and learned Friend opposite with the same view. He moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(Lord Chelmsford.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he could endorse, with great sincerity and truth, all that had been said by his noble and learned Friend as to the evil condition of things both in London and many large towns in the country. The Bill proposed was open to many objections, no doubt; but they were not of such a character that they could not be easily amended, or altogether removed in Committee. He thought it most desirable that the House should give a second reading to the Bill, because it really was an honest and a wise endeavour to remedy one of the most terrible evils that ever afflicted any large community. The evil was growing rapidly in all parts of London, and in all the large towns throughout the kingdom. In London, particularly, where the work of demolition was going on at a very great rate for railways and improvements, there was an influx of from 60,000 or 70,000 persons every year, all coming into competition for houses with the displaced families, and the consequence was a great increase in house rents, a necessity for overcrowding, and an increase of rent into the bargain. It was quite true that the Bill directed attention to only one part of the evil—houses unfit for human habitation—but those who were acquainted with the nature of these dwellings, as he had been for thirty years, would readily understand that such a description involved every evil arising from disrepair, from filth, from want of air, want of light, want of water, and from every other noxious influence. The noble and learned Lord had referred, in reference to Liverpool, to the admirable Report of Dr. Trench, who showed how great were the physical and moral evils of overcrowding. He was, however, afraid that overcrowding would be in some measure the consequence of the present Bill. Demolitions would occur without sufficient preparation being made for the displaced population, as Boards of Guardians would probably be disinclined to incur an expenditure which was to be defrayed by a rate. Nevertheless, the state of things in London had become so serious that he was exceedingly anxious that their Lordships should give a second reading to the Bill, as such a proceeding would prove their Lordships' sympathy for the object in view. He was, however, sorry to confess his apprehension that the powers given by the Bill were so extensive and the means of action so limited, that he feared it would remain a dead letter on the statute book. He was anxious, however, that it should be considered by a Select Committee, who might be able to make such alterations as would render it a better working measure, so as to some extent at least to confer a benefit on that class of the population whose condition demanded immediate consideration.

Lord Chelmsford

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he thoroughly concurred in the principle embodied in the Bill, and had long thought some such measure necessary; and he was therefore sorry to hear the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) say that, after all, the Bill would remain a dead letter. He, on the contrary, hoped that, when it came out of the Select Committee, it would be found to be an effective measure. It should be borne in mind that two of the great requisites for constructing new and improved dwellings for the poor were cheap materials, and the exercise of strict economy in the employment of those by whom the work was to be performed. Now, during the last twenty years Parliament had done everything in its power to reduce the cost of constructing houses for the labouring classes, having taken off the duties on bricks, timber, and glass. But what had the labouring classes themselves done? The noble and learned Lord had described the state of the dwellings for the poor in Manchester as being most objectionable; but what builder would attempt to build houses there, when it appeared from the Report of the Trades' Unions Commissioners, that the moment a man tried to make bricks cheap, workmen in the trade destroyed 100,000 of his bricks in a night, and shot and murdered him. When the noble and learned Lord spoke of the grievous sufferings of the poor from want of proper habitations, it should be remembered that the evil arose, in no slight degree, from the oppressive conduct of others of their own class. Persons in Manchester were not allowed to obtain bricks made in another district. A brick-making company, which proposed to make better and cheaper bricks than had previously been manufactured, were obliged to give up their business altogether. He mentioned these things because, when considering the state of the labouring classes, it was right to bear in mind how far their condition was due to their own conduct. They did all they could to raise the price of materials, and objected to cheap work and to the multiplying of workmen. It was impossible that the benefits, which it was desired to confer on the poor by this measure, could be enjoyed by them unless they themselves had the good sense to assist in rendering the construction of dwellings cheap.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, from the view he took of its bearing on the moral and spiritual welfare of the crowded population of the metropolis, his earnest desire was that this Bill might pass. There was always some danger besetting a Bill which was referred to a Select Committee; but he hoped that if this Bill were sent to a Select Committee its details would be considered with a full determination that it should be made an effective measure. The details which had been mentioned by the noble and learned Lord who moved the second reading of the Bill were very similar to those which had been furnished from various parishes in his diocese, and they showed a state of things which was a disgrace to a civilized country. If such a state of things continued to exist he thought that all efforts to improve the spiritual condition of the population and to extend education among the masses must to a great extent be rendered powerless. He had been told that in one of the metropolitan parishes a person who was questioning the owner of some dilapidated cottage property as to his gross and net returns from the property, found it difficult to make the landlord understand the difference between net and gross, the owner stating that during the six years he had been possessed of the property he had never laid out a penny in the repair of his wretched tenements. There was no doubt, as had been pointed out by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset), that the state in which the labouring classes were too frequently found was partly due to their not endeavouring to rise to a better condition; but it should, at the same time, be remembered that the very fact of their living in the wretched dwellings provided for them in London and other large towns was one of the causes that tended to demoralize them. In many parts of the metropolis the existence of these miserable dwellings was to be accounted for by the difficulty of making out good titles for the sites on which they stood. In the parish of St. James, in the very centre of the metropolis, there was a person recently living on a piece of ground, where he had erected a miserable one-story house, and there was no one to eject him on account of the difficulty of making out a good title. If some power could be devised by the Select Committee for securing the titles of persons who should erect good dwellings for th labouring classes a great service would be done. He hoped the Bill would be so dealt with by the Select Committee that it would prove an effective measure, in which case he was sure it would be of incalculable advantage in the metropolis and elsewhere.

LORD PORTMAN said, that as his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford) had consented to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee, he did not feel it necessary to trouble their Lordships with many observations on the subject of the measure; but after the remarks which his noble and learned Friend had read from a newspaper to their Lordships, he felt it would be cowardly of him not to at once state that, as a large owner of house property, he was prepared "at his peril" to oppose in its present form a great deal of the Bill, which, in the paper quoted for the House, was described as "a most salutary and necessary piece of legislation." He would, however, do his best to make a good Bill of what was at present the most crude and dangerous piece of legislation that had for a long period come from the other House of Parliament. He might observe that it would be impossible by any reduction they might make in the cost of materials, and by checking the power of raising wages exercised by trades unions, so to reduce the cost of buildings as to repay in seven years the expenditure which the Bill stated was to be repaid in that time. Then there was this defect in the Bill, that on the ground acquired nominally to build houses for artizans, and on which a vacant site had been made by pulling down dilapidated houses, there was no necessity, according to the terms of the Bill, to erect dwellings suitable for artizans. The requirement was the erection of "human habitations;" but a "human habitation" might be a house suitable for the residence of one of their Lordships. Again, the Bill as it stood would oblige owners who had taken proper care of their houses to pay for the laches of persons who had allowed their houses to get into a state of dilapidation, and become centres of disease. Moreover, the attempt to charge Greenwich, for example, to a rate in aid of St. Giles' could not be defended in such a Bill. He had also to observe that there was no provision enabling tenants for life to charge the estate with the cost of improvements. Now, he submitted that it would be very important to have a clause giving such a power brought before the Select Committee for careful consideration. Then, what was the proper definition of the word "owner" as used in the Bill? If claims to ownership were to be made by perhaps some half dozen parties having different interests, was it to be left to the magistrate to decide which of them was the owner for the purposes of the Act, if this Bill should become law? It is very novel to give the Local Authority power to take the freehold to build houses at a loss, for no such house can pay an adequate interest for the expenditure; but what is even worse power is taken to create building companies. He threw out these few suggestions to show how much the Bill needed careful examination; but he believed that if it were sent to a Select Committee, a good measure to meet the evils which the Bill was intended to check would be the result of the Committee's deliberations. The speech of the noble and learned Lord was much applied to the overcrowding of houses; but in the Bill there is not one word that applies to that part of the subject; it is already provided for by law. He (Lord Portman) believed that the Bill had not been framed with due care, and he asked the House to refer it to a Committee of Peers who really understood the subject, and above all to disregard the threats of the writer in the Daily Telegraph.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH trusted their Lordships would read the Bill a second time. Whatever were the faults of the measure in detail it had received the strongest commendations from parties who took interest in the question and who hoped the measure would become law. He had heard numerous statements corroborative of those which had been made by the right rev. Prelate and the noble and learned Lord who moved the second reading of the Bill, as to the condition of the dwellings of the poorer population in London and other large towns. One of the chief merits of the Bill was that it took up the matter where the Sanitary Act of 1866 left it. Under this Sanitary Act there was no power to remove those nuisances which frequently arose from dilapidated buildings in the centres of large populations. The present measure would therefore, he thought, be a great advance upon existing legislation. There were, on the other hand, some objections of considerable weight which had been urged to the details of the Bill, which ought to be taken into consideration, but which could be best dealt with in a Select Committee. When a similar Bill was introduced two years ago the parishes were constituted the "Local Authority" for the purposes of the Bill. Under the present Bill it was proposed to extend the area of taxation to the whole of the Metropolis (exclusive of the City of London, the Local Authority of which was the Commissioners of Sewers), and to intrust the whole control to the Metropolitan Board of Works. He must say that that arrangement appeared to him to be the first step to the equalization of the rates generally over a large and extensive area. That was a point which would require careful consideration. Another reason for referring the Bill to a Select Committee was the necessity of making its details harmonize with the working of private Acts, Acts which had been passed in order to enable particular localities to effect some of those results which it was sought by this Bill to do for the country generally; and it would be but fair to hear the representatives of those places if they had any objections to urge against the measure. He believed that the Bill was capable of being rendered a most effective and valuable one; and he trusted that when it came back to them from the Select Committee it would be in a shape that would render it much more practical in its operation than the noble Earl opposite seemed to anticipate. He (the Duke of Marlborough) thanked his noble and learned Friend for the extreme attention he had given to the measure, and he hoped it would become, if not a perfect piece of legislation, at all events such a measure as was really needed, in order that those dilapidated and unhealthy dwellings in the centres of large populations might be removed.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he did not think there was any difference of opinion in their Lordships' House as regarded the principle of the Bill. He cordially supported the second reading; but he thought his noble and learned Friend exercised a wise discretion in consenting to have it referred to a Select Committee, because all his (the Earl of Derby's) experience in that House convinced him that when there was a general desire on the part of their Lordships to effect a particular object, that object was much more likely to be attained by the consideration of the details of any measure for the purpose by a Select Committee, composed of persons really interested in the subject, than by any attempt to deal with it in a Committee of the Whole House. It struck him that one great defect in the Bill was its not dealing with the case of overcrowding in dwellings. The Bill proposed to deal with dwellings that were unfit for human habitation. There were, however, a great many habitations perfectly fit for the occupation of three or four persons, but utterly unfit for the occupation of twenty or thirty. And that was a great and serious evil not touched by the Bill. Whatever, therefore, the merits of the Bill—and he did not deny that it possessed great merits—is failed to deal with one most serious point, depending not so much on the owner as on the occupier of property. Every one at all interested in cottage or small house property of any description knew the great difficulty of preventing the introduction of lodgers. For example, in a cottage built with three bedrooms and a kitchen—and no cottage ought ever to be built with less—they constantly found the occupier, though having a large family of his own, taking in one, two, or three lodgers, and so overcrowding his own family to the disregard of all decency, and in spite, it might be, of the utmost efforts of the landlord. Another point to which he hoped the Select Committee would give their serious attention was the ownership of house property of this particular class. In the Bill the word "owner," in addition to the definition given in the Lands Clauses Act, which was incorporated with this Act, was to mean "all the owners, if more than one, of any premises, or estate, or interest in any premises required to be dealt with under this Act." The definition was important, because the owner, under the Bill, was to be called upon to do certain repairs, and if he failed to comply his property might be taken. Take the commonest case in the world, of the owner in fee granting a building lease. His noble Friend (Lord Portman) had considerable experience of this nature in London, as he himself had in other great towns. Suppose that a long lease were granted—as in some places for seventy-five years, or as in others for ninety-nine years—and that shortly before the expiration of the term it appeared that the property was going to rack and ruin, and that the houses were becoming unfit for human habitation. Under the terms of the Bill the Local Authority would call upon the owner to rebuild. But the owner might not be the owner in fee; and even if he were, he would have no right to enter upon the property till the expiration of the lease. On the other hand, it would never be worth the while of the lessee, with only ten or fifteen years unexpired interest, to re-build. Under these circumstances, the Local Authority might take possession, because the owner did not do what he had no power to do, and what had been rendered necessary by the default of the lessee. Then the Local Authority themselves, supposing they took possession of the property, could be in no better position than the lessee — they could not re-build for the short term unexpired. He did not at all mean to say that if houses fell into utter want of repair, and became unfit for human habitation, there ought not to exist a power of compelling them to be put into decent tenantable condition, or, failing that, of enabling the Local Authority to pull them down and re-build them. All he suggested was, that the Select Committee, in dealing with this measure, should look carefully at the position of the owner, and see that the definition given in the Bill corresponded with what in practice would be found judicious, and also with an equitable distribution of the burden of responsibility. He did not propose to trouble their Lordships by moving any Instructions to the Committee; he contented himself with calling attention to the two points which seemed to him most to require careful consideration. And he felt certain that the measure would receive, at the hands of the Committee, that patient investigation which its importance so eminently deserved.

EARL FORTESCUE desired to say that having taken a deep interest for twenty-five years in subjects of this class, he was unspeakably gratified at the spirit with which a reform so invaluable had been approached by all the speakers. The speech of the noble Earl who had just sat down afforded probably the best measure of the important labours which the Select Committee would be called upon to undertake. If they could not deal effectually with overcrowding, they might still turn their attention to measures which produced this evil. Railways had an immense influence in this matter; and he was of opinion that if the companies were more liberal in reference to workmen's trains, a great deal of the difficulty of overcrowding might be got rid of. Unless the labouring poor were better lodged school instruction would be insufficient to promote the well-being of the people.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly.

LORD PORTMAN moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

SEA FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Duke of Richmond.)

(No. 96.) COMMITTEE (ON RE-COMMITMENT).

Order of the Day for the House to be again put into Committee on the Bill (on Re-commitment) read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE presented a Petition of Frank T. Buckland and others praying for Amendment of the Bill, and that it may be referred to a Select Committee, and expressed his opinion that it would act most prejudicially in reference to the prosperity of the Irish oyster fisheries, especially as the present system of dredging was very destructive. At all events, he did not see why the Convention should not be suspended for a year, to give time to make arrangements.

House in Committee accordingly.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND stated the course he proposed to adopt with a view to meet the case of the Irish fishermen. He understood the grievance to consist in a fear that fishermen would flock from the English Channel during the close time to the coast of Ireland, where the close time was shorter. He therefore proposed to insert a clause after Clause 68 enabling the Queen in Council to give powers to the Irish Fishery Commissioners to make bye-laws over that portion of their waters beyond the three-mile limit, and providing that the close time in the English Channel should correspond with the close time beyond the three-mile limit on the Irish coast. He also proposed to extend the powers of the Commissioners, enabling them to make bye-laws operating over twenty miles between two points on the coast of Ireland. He believed this would satisfy the requirements of the Irish fishermen.

After a few words from Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY,

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND expressed his belief that the very worst thing that could happen to the oyster fishermen in Ireland would be that this Bill should not pass, because if it did not the close time would be the same as that under the old Convention. It was a mistake to imagine that the French Government were anxious for the change; because that Government believed that in entering into this Convention they were giving up everything and gaining nothing. They had, however, consented to shorten the close time by six weeks.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that if Her Majesty's Government would endeavour to negotiate with the French Government a supplementary Convention to enable bye-laws to be made applicable to French subjects fishing in the seas between Ireland and England, then the Irish oyster banks would be placed in precisely the same position as the oyster banks dealt with by the Convention for the Channel.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the clause conceded to the Irish fishermen all that they required. The Irish fishermen were anxious that there should be some jurisdiction to protect the oyster beds on the high seas along the coast of Ireland. A jurisdiction had been supposed to rest in the Irish Fishery Commissioners which, in fact, they did not now possess. The Bill proposed that the Irish Fishery Commissioners might submit to the Queen in Council the form of bye-laws which they would recommend. Her Majesty in Council might approve those bye-laws, and, as they might affect both English and French subjects if future Conventions should be made, the bye-laws ought to be subject to the approval of the Queen in Council. There would also be a proviso that the close time for those oyster beds should not be shorter than that enacted by the Irish Fishery Commissioners for the oyster beds within the three-mile limit.

After a few words from The Marquess of CLANRICARDE, the proposed clause was agreed to with verbal amendments.

Amendments made.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday next; and Bill to be printed as amended (No. 125).

COTTON STATISTICS BILL—(No. 102). (The Marquess of Salisbury).

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

EARL GRANVILLE said, that considerable opposition existed to the Bill, and asked what course the Government intended to take upon it?

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that many objections had been taken to the Bill, which, he believed, was opposed by noble Lords opposite, and Her Majesty's Government was not prepared to sanction its further progress. The regulations proposed would entail considerable expense, nor could he see why statistics should be applied to cotton alone.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY complained that in this as in other matters the Government did not seem to know its own mind. The second reading of the measure had been assented to in that House; it had passed the other House without opposition, and he was certainly astonished that the noble Duke should now object to its further progress. Of course, if noble Lords opposite co-operated with the Government in opposing the measure, it would be useless for him to divide the House. But he desired to remind their Lordships that the Bill was one of great importance, and was entirely approved of by those whom it concerned. At present there was a large amount of dangerous and prejudicial speculation in consequence of the uncertainty as to the amount of cotton in the country; and manufacturing labour was disarranged by the same cause. He understood that within the last few weeks the computation of the quantity of cotton in this country had varied to the extent of a million bales.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that on the second reading some Members of the Government voted for the Bill, some against it, and some did not vote at all; but he would recommend that there should be no further opposition to the Bill at this stage of it.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY supported the measure, as being necessary to prevent false returns and frauds at Liverpool and other ports.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was not satisfied that such a Bill ought to be sanctioned by the House. It would be dangerous to enter upon any attempt to check speculation.

LORD EGERTON OF TATTON supported the Bill, and trusted the noble Marquess would persevere with it.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY observed that he should be very sorry if his noble Friend had any reason to complain of having been taken by surprise. He therefore recommended that opposition should be withdrawn at the present stage, and if necessary it might be renewed on the Report or third reading.

Amendments made; The Report thereof to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed as amended (No. 126).

POOR RATE (SCOTLAND).

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE rose, in pursuance of Notice, to call Attention to a Return made to an Order of the House, dated March 27, showing the Deductions allowed to Occupiers before assessing for the Poor Rate in various Scotch Parishes, and the Amount of gross Rental required to give a rateable Value of £12 in those Parishes respectively, and to move for Copy of any Letter or Instructions addressed by the Crown Agent to the Inspectors of Poor in reference to that Return. It would not be necessary for him to enter upon any lengthened statement with regard to the Motion. The necessity for any lengthened statement had been obviated by what had taken place in the other House with regard to the question of the county franchise; but he was anxious, in calling attention to the Return, to show how inexpedient it would be to have the franchise in Scotland placed upon rating. There was reason to believe the Return was inaccurate and calculated to mislead, and it was alleged that the inaccuracy of the Return was owing to the nature of the Instructions given by the Crown Agent to the persons whose duty it was to supply the required information; and the Government had admitted that this Return did not show the real state of the case, and did not show the amount of deductions allowed to occupiers in various Scotch parishes before assessing for the poor rate. In several parishes no deductions were allowed, while it appeared that the parochial bodies and the inspectors of the poor had made deductions to the extent in some instances of 75 per cent. The Returns with respect to parishes showing the amount of gross rental required to give a rateable value of £12 disclosed similar anomalies—the gross rental in some cases being set down at £12, whilst the return of the value showed it to be £48. There ought to be a classification in these cases, not as regards the rental, but in respect to the rate; because, suppose a rate of 1s. in the pound was levied, instead of levying the whole rate at 1s. in the pound, it ought in certain cases of classification to be reduced to a rate of 6d. in the pound. What the parochial officers did instead of reducing the rate was to enter the rental at a reduced valuation—which seemed very much the case of a distinction without a difference. The fact was, the whole question of rating in Scotland was one of those things which nobody could understand; and it was well worthy the consideration of any Government that might be in power, whether they could not remodel the system of rating in Scotland, and place it in a way of working justly and equitably.

Moved, That there be laid before this House, Copy of any Letter or Instructions addressed by the Crown Agent to the Inspectors of Poor in reference to a Return made to an Order of this House, dated 27th March, showing the Deductions allowed to Occupiers before assessing for Poor Rate in various Scotch Parishes, and the Amount of gross Rental required to give a rateable Value of £12 in those Parishes respectively.—(The Earl of Airlie.)

THE EARL OF DEVON said, there was no objection to grant the Return.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, May 26, 1868.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Dublin City, v. Sir Benjamin Lee Guinness, baronet, deceased.

PUBLIC BILL—Report of Select Committee—Sale of Liquors on Sunday (Ireland). [No. 280.]

*Report—Sale of Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) [31-138].

FRAUDS UPON BURIAL SOCIETIES.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the following passage in a charge to the Grand Jury at Liverpool in March last by Mr. Justice Mellor:—

"In conclusion the learned judge referred to frauds recently practised upon burial societies, and said that, in many cases he feared that the registration of death was a mere farce. In one of these cases, he said, the doctor had given a certificate of death without being aware that the person was dead; and if such was the usual practice, and he was told it was, the sooner it was changed the better."

Whether he has not observed similar complaints—namely, of certificates of death being given without any inquiry or knowledge, to have been made by the Coroners for London and, Manchester; and if he will state what steps have been taken to remedy so dangerous a practice?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, my attention had not been called to the passage in Mr. Justice Mellor's charge until the hon. Member put his Notice upon the Paper. I have made inquiry, and I understand the Judge's reference to the subject arose from two certificates having been given of the deaths of persons who were not actually dead. Men affected to have been present at the houses or at the deathbeds of those represented to have been dead, and they brought with them certificates from medical practitioners stating the cause of death in each case. They had gone to the medical practitioners, stating that the persons were dead, and the medical men, remembering that they had attended them for certain complaints, without further inquiry gave certificates stating that the deaths had resulted from those complaints, while in fact neither person was dead. Under the Registration Act the Registrar is to receive, either from a person present at the deathbed, or some one in the house, a statement of the death and of the cause of it, and the usual practice is to obtain from a medical man, if one has been in attendance, the statement of the cause of death. The Registrar is not bound to go and see that the person is dead, but under the statute he is to receive the statement from those who were present or who are cognizant of the facts; and if these persons make a misrepresentation, under a recent statute they are liable to penal servitude. With respect to the second part of the Question, I have had no complaint from the Coroner of London; indeed, he has written to me since the Notice was given to say that he has no complaint to make. There were some complaints from Manchester, and there has been some correspondence between the Coroner of Manchester and the Home Office, and, in consequence, between the Home Office and the Registrar General; and the Registrar General stated in effect that the Registrar on the spot was acting in conformity with the statute in receiving the statement and the medical certificate; and that he had no option but to enter in his book that which was stated to him by persons who appeared to have authority for making the statement. We have not contemplated any alteration of the Act of Parliament, for it would be impossible that the Registrar should inquire into every case; and as every person who makes a misrepresentation renders himself liable to a severe punishment, I think with due vigilance that this dangerous practice may be put a stop to.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, To fix some day after the Whitsuntide Recess for the Committee on the Irish Reform Bill, when it could be taken as the first Order of the Day?

THE EARL OF MAYO, in reply, said, he had ascertained that it would suit the convenience of the Irish Representatives if the Committee on the Irish Reform Bill were taken on Thursday fortnight (June 25); he would, therefore, fix it for that day and arrange that it should be the first Order of the Day.

OUTRAGES IN JAPAN. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What truth there is in the statement in the China Newspapers that our Ambassador in Japan, on a first visit of ceremony to the Mikado, or Emperor of Japan at Kioto, accompanied by a European escort, was attacked by Japanese and twelve of the escort wounded; and whether twelve of the crew of a boat belonging to the French ship of war Dupleix were assassinated on landing on the estate of Prince Iosa, near Osaka, and what effect have these outrages had on the relations between the British and French Governments with that of the Emperor of Japan; and, whether the Mikado, or real Emperor of Japan, has ratified the Treaty we made with the Tycoon, or supposed Emperor?

LOKD STANLEY: It is true that Sir Harry Parkes, on his way to pay a visit of ceremony to the Mikado, accompanied by a mounted escort, was attacked by a party of Japanese fanatics, supposed to be only three or four in number. They took the escort by surprise, and wounded eight or nine persons, but it is hoped none of them mortally. I am bound to say that the Japanese authorities did everything that could possibly be expected of them, both in the way of exerting themselves to detect the offenders and making the apology due to our Ambassador; and they have gone so far as to promise compensation to the men injured in the event of any of them becoming permanently disabled. Therefore, however unfortunate the accident may have been, I think there is nothing in it which will in the slightest degree affect our present good relations with the Japanese Government. I understand also that the difference between them and the French Government, arising out of the murder of a boat's crew, has been amicably arranged. Within a few days of the time when the last despatches were sent off, Sir Harry Parkes received an envoy from the Mikado, who was authorized to express the Mikado's desire to cultivate friendly relations with Foreign Powers, and to take upon himself all the obligations of the Treaty we had made with the Tycoon.

POST OFFICE—THE CAPE MAIL.

QUESTION.

MR. CANDLISH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If any Contract has been effected with the Union Steam Shipping Company for the conveyance of an intermediate Monthly Mail between England and the Cape of Good Hope; if he will have any objection to lay all Correspondence and Contracts with the said Company upon the Table of the House; and if, previously to concluding any such Contract or Contracts, tenders were invited from, or offers made by, any other Company for the performance of this Mail Service, or any part thereof?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, a contract had been made with the Union Steam Shipping Company, for the conveyance of an intermediate Monthly Mail between England and the Cape of Good Hope. The proposals for it were made so long ago as the early part of last year; they were accepted by the Treasury in June of last year; but circumstances had occurred which had delayed the execution of the contract until the present time. He believed, however, it would be laid on the Table in the course of a few days. He should have no objection also to lay on the table, if the hon. Member desired it, the Correspondence between the Treasury and the Post Office, having reference to this extension of contract, which would show all the particulars and the reasons which had led to its acceptance. Previously to the conclusion of this contract no offer was made by, nor were tenders asked for, from any other company for the performance of this particular Mail Service, but subsequently to the acceptance of the offer by the Treasury, a tender was made by another company to carry the Mails upon terms which were less advantageous than those which had been virtually accepted. It was a voluntary proposal on the part of the Union Steam Shipping Company, to double the amount of their Service for a lower amount of subsidy than they were authorized to receive under their existing contract.

EGYPT—CLAIMS ON THE VICEROY.

QUESTION.

MR. FREVILLE-SURTEES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Correspondence has taken place between the Foreign Office and Her Majesty's Consul General in Egypt relative to the claims on the Viceroy of the shareholders of the Société Agricole et Industrielle d'Egypte; and, if so, whether he would have any objection to present the Correspondence?

LORD STANLEY replied, that a Correspondence had taken place on the subject referred to in his hon. Friend's Question. It had not yet been concluded, and though, as far as the Foreign Office was concerned, there was no objection to its production, he did not think it would be in the interest of the parties concerned to publish it in its present state.

PARLIAMENT—THE GENERAL ELECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. SANDFORD said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to bring forward any Measure, and, if any, what Measure, for the purpose of shortening the period which, under the existing Law, must intervene before a General Election can take place under the provisions of the Reform Act passed in the late Session of Parliament?

MR. DISRAELI: The subject, Sir, to which the hon. Gentleman refers is now, and has been for some time, under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. I am bound to say that the difficulties connected with it are greater than were at first contemplated; but I trust these difficulties may be overcome.

DESPATCHES FROM VICTORIA.

QUESTION.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Despatches from the Governor of Victoria brought by the last Mail?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that the Despatches which had been received would be presented to the House in the course of a week.

THE DERBY DAY.—ADJOURNMENT.

MR. DISRAELI: In rising, Sir, to move that the House at its rising do adjourn till Thursday, I wish to recall to the recollection of the House that I gave Notice a few days ago of the intention of the Government to propose on Friday a Vote of Thanks to Sir Robert Napier and the Army in Abyssinia. At that time we had received no despatches from Sir Robert Napier, and owing to various circumstances the Government were under the impression that the despatches had been lost. The Notice had already been delayed on this account, but within the last forty-eight hours information has arrived which leads us to believe that these despatches in a few days may reach the Government. It must be obvious to the House that it would be far more convenient and satisfactory that the thanks of the House should be founded on the Despatches of the Commander-in-Chief, and therefore I propose to postpone this Vote until after the holidays. I now move that the House at its rising do adjourn till Thursday.

MR. GLADSTONE: There can be no doubt, Sir, of the judicious nature of the course which the right hon. Gentleman proposes with regard to the Vote of Thanks. But I wish to say one word upon a subject to which a Question put just now referred. I am not surprised that the Government should take time to consider what measures they may have to propose for shortening the period which must intervene before the General Election is held; but I shall be glad to know whether the right hon. Gentleman can tell us when he thinks he will be able to make known the views of the Government on the subject. I wish also to say that an idea has suggested itself to several hon. Gentlemen that it might be well to appoint a Select Committee of the House to inquire into the question. I do not wish to press this suggestion further than to intimate that, if the Government should think it likely to conduce to the satisfactory settlement of the matter, there would be a disposition on the part of hon. Members on this side of the House to welcome such a proposal. The question has already been inquired into by several Members of the House, and a conversation was held on a former night, in which the Solicitor General and the hon. and learned Member (Sir Robert Collier) took part, and which contributed a good deal to elucidate the question. The question is one of a strictly practical character; on both sides of the House the object must be a common one; and the plan I have mentioned might be the best way of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. Time is, of course, of value in the matter, and I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman when he will be in a condition to communicate the views of the Government on the subject?

METROPOLITAN POLICE.—QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will be good enough to take care that the Accounts and Estimates connected with the Metropolitan Police are laid on the Table before he proceeds with the Second Reading of the Bill with reference to the Metropolitan Police Act, which has only been in the hands of Members a very few days?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the accounts have been laid before the House, and will be printed shortly. The inquiry to which the hon. Gentleman refers has no relation to anything contained in them, and, therefore, the Papers relating to it will not facilitate the discussion of the measure. I shall put the Bill down for second reading for a day after Whitsuntide.

WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.—QUESTION.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to state, What he proposes to do about the Whitsuntide Recess, and until what day he proposes that the House should adjourn?

MR. DISRAELI: We propose on Friday evening to adjourn to the following Thursday.

RIOTS AT ASHTON, STALEY BRIDGE, BIRMINGHAM, &c.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to correct a misapprehension arising out of what he was supposed to have said last evening. He did not say, referring to a friend of his, a late Member of this House, Sir John Tyrrell, that a Romish Priest attempted "to convert a female member of his family by placing in her hands a book referred to in the work known as The Confessional Unmasked." What he had said was that the book was based upon the authorities whose doctrines the work called The Confessional Unmasked was intended to expose.

Motion agreed to: House at rising to adjourn till Thursday next.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he rose to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, all sums required to defray the expenses of the Diplomatic Service ought to be annually voted by Parliament, and that Estimates of all such sums ought to be submitted in a form that will admit of their effectual supervision and control by this House."

This Resolution was precisely similar in its terms to one which had been proposed in 1853 by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson), who then went to a division, but failed to obtain a majority in favour of his Resolution. As he understood that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary intended to oppose the present Resolution, he should briefly reply to the reasons which he presumed would be advanced against it. The late Lord Palmerston seemed to have been under the impression that the less the House of Commons had to do with foreign affairs the better—particularly in regard to all matters of detail. It was said that the statement of the sums spent in the Diplomatic Service was, to a certain extent, brought before the House in the financial accounts. The object he had in view was to bring all the expenses of the Department before the House in the Estimates, to enable any hon. Member to ask for explanations. There appeared to him to be no reason why hon. Gentlemen should not be afforded the same facilities with respect to the Foreign Office which they enjoyed with respect to the other Departments. An objection urged to the Motion by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) was, that if it were carried it would produce a greater expenditure than now existed; but it was a strange doctrine that the control exercised by this House would produce an increased expenditure. If the hon. Member was right, then they ought to introduce a system of contracts, and say to the head of each Department that they would give him so much for the payment of salaries. The sum allowed was £180,000; and, if the Foreign Secretary contracted to pay all the diplomatic expenses with that sum, it might produce economy; but there was no such contract, for when any further sum was wanted the Foreign Secretary asked for and obtained it. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire said in 1853 "that all his prejudices and prepossessions were in favour of such a Motion;" but he did not vote for it, because he considered that the salaries of these gentlemen should, like those of the Judges, be placed beyond all uncertainty. Now, he contended that the present system produced the greatest uncertainty, and therefore he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would support his Resolution. The salaries of the Judges were charged on the Consolidated Fund; but there the analogy ceased, because the Home Secretary was not given a sum of money and told to pay such and such a Judge as he liked; but the Foreign Secretary was given a sum en bloc, and told to spend it on the Ministers abroad. So far from the salaries being certain, the noble Lord would bear him out when he said that applications were being constantly made to the Foreign Office for an increase. The Foreign Minister was entirely dependent upon an irresponsible body at the Foreign Office, and surely that House was a more independent and responsible body than the permanent officials at the Foreign Office, who practically settled the whole matter. Another objection urged by Lord Palmerston was, that that House might be actuated by some sudden impulse, and might withdraw a mission from a Foreign Court. But any Government which might be in power had, as a rule, a majority upon the Estimates, and the case must be a very strong one indeed when a private Member was enabled to defeat them upon such a question. He believed that, if the Motion were carried, it would promote a greater economy. He had taken extracts from a list of Ministers who received pensions, which had been published by the Foreign Office, and he found in many instances they were not old men, but gentlemen who had not the slightest objection to being employed. The Foreign Office, however, had got into the way of putting Ministers upon the retired list when they wished to put some one else forward or entertained any personal dislike. There were, for example, Sir James Hudson, with £1,300 a year; Sir Henry Bulwer, with £1,700; Mr. Christie, with £900, and several others in the position of retired Ministers who were very anxious to be employed. Out of the £180,000 taken out of the Consolidated Fund, £40,000 was charged to pensions. There were a great many Legations which, with great advantage, might be suppressed—for instance, that of Würtemberg, which had cost the country for several years £3,050; the Netherlands, which cost £4,700; and Switzerland, £3,800. He had been at a great many of those Missions; he knew what was done in them; and he could assure the House that it was absolutely nothing. It was supposed that a Minister did a great deal of good by asking important personages to dinner; but at those wretched German Courts where we kept Missions it was not important personages, but some chamberlains, that were asked to dinner. Let the noble Lord only look into the archives of the Foreign Office and say when he had received an important despatch from Würtemberg. He had asked a friend of his who was Minister at one of those Legations, one time, what he was doing? And the reply was, "Doing? what do you think is to be done in such a place as this?" Another reason why the present system should be done away with was because, as some portions of the expense were charged in the Estimates, and some taken out of the £180,000 granted to the Foreign Secretary, the House was never able to know what was really spent upon any particular Mission, and, not having the facts before them, no proposals for reduction could be effectually made. Among the items of expenditure last year were, for Embassy houses, £64,920 in China and Japan, £8,000 in Teheran, and £2,135 in Paris. Then there was an item of £26,500 for messengers and couriers, which might be very much reduced. Half of the foreign messengers were sent abroad simply because they had been sent in past years. There was another item of £6,000 for Telegrams, and an item of £56,000 for Extraordinary Expenses, and £15,000 for Special Missions, which might be put a stop to. Now, when it was thought well to give a foreign Sovereign the Garter he did not see why some nobleman politically unknown, but socially very important, should be sent out at considerable expence when the thing might be done as well by our Minister on the spot. He had made inquiries, and found that when the Toison d'Or or other foreign order was conferred it was not usual to send Special Missions for that purpose. There had recently been some newspaper attacks upon the Foreign Office, which were rather unfair and greatly exaggerated. That Office was well conducted in the main, and it contained honourable, hard-working, painstaking men. The noble Lord at the head of the Department should answer such attacks by giving the greatest publicity to everything done in the Office, because at present there was an impression that the Foreign Office was not subjected to the same control as the other Offices. One cause of those attacks was the abominable system of agencies. The gentlemen employed in the Diplomatic Service were paid by the head clerk of the Foreign Office, and all of them were virtually obliged to appoint a clerk in that office as their agent, and to give him a percentage of 1 or 2 per cent. Some of the clerks received as much as £2,000 a year from this source. He did not accuse those gentlemen—who were wise to profit by the system; but a certain number of permanent officials who were allowed to levy this species of blackmail ought not to be permitted to set up a claim to control the Estimates—and the mode in which the money was spent and the salaries received by our Ministers abroad. The head clerk had to decide whether any extra expenses were legitimate or not, yet he was allowed to receive a percentage in order to urge the claims of any gentleman against the Office. He could see no reason why the Foreign Office should be exempted from the control exercised over other Departments; and he hoped the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), who had done his best to keep down the expenses, would exercise his own judgment in this matter, and would not be influenced by the permanent officials. He hoped also that his Resolution would be supported by the Secretary to the Treasury, who, on a previous occasion, spoke in favour of the proposal. The House, as the guardian of the public purse, ought to have the control of this expenditure, and ought not to hand it over to gentlemen who, though highly honourable, were prejudiced in favour of every sort of abuse, and being a kind of administrative Brahmins believed that everything which existed was right.

MR. BAYLEY POTTER seconded the Resolution.

MR. W. LOWTHER said, he thought the hon. Gentleman the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere) had rather exaggerated the abuses of the Diplomatic Service. Having been long connected with the Foreign Office himself, he might state his conviction that no Department was better or more efficiently administered. The evidence given in 1861, before the Diplomatic Committee, by Mr. Cunningham, the then chief clerk, and Mr. Hammond, permanent Under Secretary, showed that this sum of £180,000, fixed in 1832, was admirably administered, there having frequently been a surplus, while the amount had never been exceeded. Were the control transferred to the House, he believed the expenditure would be considerably greater, for the House was excessively amiable in money matters. Would any gentleman's private garden of the same extent cost £7,138, as was the case with the garden at Hampton Court? If the Foreign Office had any fault it was in being too stingy. Ministers, for instance, were sometimes removed to a different post after two years, and were thereby put to great expense, in some cases losing a great deal of money which they had expended on their houses, in the expectation that they would be permanently located there. Their successors felt themselves under no obligation to compensate them, and if they applied to the Foreign Office, the noble Lord and the Under Secretary not having time to attend to such details, the matter was probably decided by some crusty, gouty gentlemen, who objected to paying anything which they could avoid. It was true Ambassadors had an allowance for outfit; but this did not meet the expenses of removal, since they could not travel about with a carpet-bag or portmanteau. He thought the longer a system which worked so economically was continued the better.

Mr. Labouchere

LORD STANLEY said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) in his by no means unfair, but somewhat desultory observations, had travelled over a wide range of subjects, fully to discuss which would require considerable time. The first point he had touched upon was the subject of Diplomatic pensions; and he had said that those pensions amounted to £40,000. If the hon. Member would look at the list, however, he would find that instead of £40,000 they were only a little over £24,000.

MR. LABOUCHERE explained that what he meant to say was, not that £40,000 was paid for pensions, but that that sum was set apart for the purpose, and it encouraged the giving of such pensions. Even £24,000 was too much to give to gentlemen who were capable of active service.

LORD STANLEY said, a large number of those upon the retired list were of a very advanced age. One of them was Lord Stratford de Redcliffe—another, a gentleman who retired thirty years ago. Similar allowances were given under various names in all branches of the public service; and he did not think the rate exorbitant. Only the last three names upon the pension list, however, had been placed there by him; and those, supersessions rendered necessary by the recent alterations and amalgamations in foreign countries. With regard to the question of agencies, that was a large and important subject; and he had not concealed his opinion that the system was not, in principle, a satisfactory one, nor one which ought to be continued in any public Department, though he did not believe it had led to much abuse. It was, however, not correct that any gentleman could make £2,000 a year by the percentages he received. The gentlemen concerned had accepted the agencies which they held with the full sanction and knowledge of their superiors in office, and in his opinion it would not be fair to take those fees away without granting compensation. Referring to another subject, the House would recollect that nearly all the German Missions—about which so much was said a few years ago—had been abolished, and that we had at present only the Embassy at Vienna, that at Berlin, and minor Missions at two other South German Courts. Those Courts were now in a state of transition, and the present would not be a favourable moment for withdrawing the Missions. There might be cases where Missions became vacant, in which they might be reduced in rank or in pay, or possibly in which they might be suppressed altogether; but the time, he thought, for considering cases of that kind was when vacancies actually occurred. Nor did he believe that any considerable saving could be effected by those means. He was much struck by the fact that every one of those points in which the hon. Member complained of the expenditure of the Foreign Office came under the direct control of that House; while it was precisely in that portion of the Foreign Office expenditure which did not come under the direct and minute supervision of that House that the greatest degree of economy had been practised. He hoped, however, no one supposed that question ought to be regarded as a matter of controversy between the House on the one side and the Foreign Office on the other—the one desiring to obtain greater control over the expenditure, and the other desiring to evade it. That was not, in the slightest degree, the state of the case. He admitted—and he believed that every one who held his Office would be prepared to admit—the full and indisputable right of the House to check, control, and supervise the expenditure of the Foreign Office. There was no doubt upon that point. The House found the money, and the House had a right to know what was done with it. It was only a question of means; and it was for the House to decide, for its own convenience, in what form and to what extent that supervision should be exercised. There was no need to go back to the origin of the present system. The House was aware that the Diplomatic expenditure was formerly defrayed out of the Civil List; and it was in the year 1831 the present arrangement first came into operation. That arrangement was not made on the sole responsibility of the Government; it was made on the recommendation of a Committee of the House of Commons sitting at a time when zeal for economy and reform was stronger, perhaps, than at any subsequent period. That Committee recommended—he presumed upon grounds of economy—that there should be a lump sum of £180,000 provided for the Diplomatic Service, rather than a number of separate items placed in the Votes. That question had been again and again discussed in subsequent years, and the arrangement had invariably been supported by the highest authorities among the Liberal as well as the Conservative party; and he was not aware that an unfavourable opinion had ever been expressed upon it by any considerable section of the House. They all knew that the cost of the various branches of the public Administration had greatly increased within the last thirty or forty years. That increase was owing partly to an augmentation of business, and partly to the fact that the value of money had diminished during that period. The pound sterling did not go as far, in the way of purchasing power, as formerly; and he believed they would not find a single branch of the public service, except the Diplomatic Service, in which the expenditure had not of late years increased. He had gone over the items of that expenditure more than once, and he would venture to say that they would not find it easy, as a matter of general policy, to effect in it any reduction. He sometimes heard it said—although the hon. Member had the candour not to avail himself of such an argument—that under the arrangement of the year 1831, the mode of disposing of that money was wholly removed beyond the knowledge or control of that House. That was, he believed, a common impression out of doors; but it was one which was wholly unfounded. Any one who referred to the financial accounts which were published yearly, might see in the minuted detail how that money was expended; and it was competent for any hon. Member, who thought that the Diplomatic expenditure was too great, to point out the particular items to which he objected. The hon. Gentleman had drawn a distinction between that Diplomatic expenditure and that precisely parallel case of the expenditure on account of judicial functions. He (Lord Stanley) was bound to say that he did not think the distinction drawn by the hon. Member, however ingenious it might be, could be practically sustained. The basis on which the hon. Gentleman rested his argument was that all public expenditure should come into the Estimates, so that it might be criticized item by item in that House. But if they laid down that principle, he did not see upon what possible ground they could refuse a similar investigation into judicial salaries. He did not attempt to decide whether such an arrangement would be right or wrong. He had not himself that horror of investigation which seemed to exist in some minds. He did not believe that it would be attended in that case with the advantage which some persons anticipated from it; but, at all events, he saw no reason why a distinction should be drawn in reference to that subject between the salaries of Judges and the salaries of members of the Diplomatic Service. It was not true, as some persons appeared to suppose, that the salaries of individual diplomatists were, or according to usage could be, arbitrarily cut down by the Secretary of State. There was no such thing in the service as cutting down salaries without notice, and without assigning a reason. He was not aware of any such case. There was, undoubtedly, no legal security for the permanence of Diplomatic salaries any more than of the salaries of officers of the Civil Service; but who ever expressed fear lest these latter should be arbitrarily reduced? They were regarded and treated as permanent, though not made so by law. He objected to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, because he did not believe that if it were adopted it would lead to greater economy. Every one knew that there was nothing more popular in that House than advocating economy in general term, while there was nothing more unpopular than carrying out the principle of economy in detail. He did not remember an instance in which any material reduction had been effected in the Estimates by discussions upon the separate items; and he believed that these discussions had often rather contributed to an increase of expenditure. He believed it was becoming pretty well known, as a matter of Parliamentary experience, that if any one thought the expenditure in a particular branch of Administration was too high, the only chance of getting it diminished was by insisting on some general reduction, and then leaving it to the Minister of the Department to decide in what manner that object was to be attained. He had stated briefly his reasons for opposing the Motion; but he did not pretend to speak of it as one in which the interests of the Foreign Office were deeply interested. He believed that the House of Commons, if called upon, would be ready to vote the money that might be wanted. The question was really one for the House itself to settle with a view to its own convenience. During the last forty years they had supported the present system under which a lump sum was placed in the hands of the Foreign Minister, and he was told that he must do the best he could with it, but that he must not exceed it. The practical working of the system, in his opinion, had been to keep down the expenditure. The House, in taking that course, had imposed upon the head of the Foreign Office a certain responsibility of which he had no right to divest himself, except upon a deliberate intimation of the judgment of Parliament. He should have no great fear of the result if that Motion were carried; but he saw nothing to induce him to believe that the House was dissatisfied with the present arrangement; and it was therefore his duty to support it. Before he sat down he would once more remind the House that nearly every one of those items of expenditure to which the hon. Gentleman had referred as subjects of criticism were items not included in the £180,000 a year which were placed at the disposal of the Foreign Office, but were items which passed the scrutiny of the House, and with respect to which, therefore, if any extravagance had been committed, the House must be considered not to have exercised the power placed in its hands.

MR. CHILDERS said, he was rather disappointed at finding that the noble Lord did not feel himself in a position to accede to the Motion, and the more so as he had understood from the statement of the noble Lord last year that he was in favour of that change. The Foreign Office expended annually about £640,000, and out of that amount £180,000 was the sum for Diplomatic salaries and pensions, which formed the subject of his hon. Friend's Motion. What he wished the House to consider, and what the noble Lord had not justified, was this—why that £180,000 should be handed over as a lump to the Foreign Minister to be used in that particular way, whereas all the rest of the £640,000 was included in the regular Estimates laid every year on the table of the House. If the whole of the Foreign Office expenditure were placed in the hands of the Minister, and he were tied down as to its amount, there might be some sense in laying that charge on the Consolidated Fund. But that was not what happened. What practically occurred was this, that a certain part of the Foreign Office expenditure was taken out of the usual review of Parliament; whereas if the expenses connected with foreign affairs fluctuated up and down that fluctuation appeared in the Estimates. The services for China and Japan appeared on the Estimates; but our Ministers for those countries were in much the same position as our Ministers elsewhere; and he could not see why the salaries of our Ministers for China and Japan should be put on the Votes of that House, while those of our Ministers in South America were not. So with regard to many of the appointments which were half Diplomatic, half Consular. It had always been matter of controversy whether a particular class of public servants abroad were to be called Diplomatic agents performing Consular functions, or Consular agents performing Diplomatic functions; the salaries of those that belonged to the one class coming upon the Votes of the House, and the salaries of the other class being charged upon the Diplomatic fund and not coming upon the Votes. Then there was the special case of the third Secretary, whose case nobody would contend was on a different footing from that of any other of the attachés. There was not a sufficient balance to charge the salary of the third Secretary on the Diplomatic fund, and therefore a Vote for it was annually taken in the House. Again, while a Minister's salary was charged on the Diplomatic fund, the expenses of his outfit and his establishment were placed upon the annual Votes. The truth was that £180,000 was put at the disposal of the Foreign Office within certain limits to use as they liked; if they wanted more they came down to the House for it; if they saved anything, which they rarely did, the House did not hear much of it. Therefore, the noble Lord's argument broke down. Then the noble Lord had said that the Judges were in one respect placed in a parallel position to that of our Diplomats; but he (Mr. Childers) did not think there were any grounds for that statement.

LORD STANLEY said, that what he had stated was not that the individual Judges were in a parallel position, but that the sum appropriated to the payment of the Judges was in a parallel position.

MR. CHILDERS said, he did not think that the cases were at all parallel. The Judges of the Superior Courts held their offices during good behaviour, and it was perfectly right that their salaries should not be cut down by the vote of the House, but should stand in the same position as persons whose salaries were charged on the Civil List. But Her Majesty's Ministers abroad did not hold their offices during good behaviour, and there was no reason why they should not be dealt with in the same manner as the Secretary of State or a permanent Under Secretary in the Foreign Office. It was very unfortunate that when they were year by year getting rid of the idea that any of our public servants required to have their salaries kept out of the view of the House, the Government were not in a condition to accede to the adoption of the same rule as regarded the Diplomatic Service. Precisely the same objections as those urged by the noble Lord had been urged for many years past against every successive step that had been taken for transferring from the permanent fund to the Votes of the House the salaries of public officers. The expenses connected with the Courts of Justice, excepting the Judges' salaries, were now charged on the annual Estimates, and the other evening a question arose as to a particular appointment. A Vote was brought before the House, and after an explanation from the Attorney General as to that appointment, the House naturally criticized the rate of the salaries of that particular class of officers. But they could not have done that a few years ago, because those salaries did not appear in the Estimates. He entirely dissented from the opinion that no good was done by discussing the Estimates. Every discussion in Supply on a particular item of expenditure, though it might have no immediate effect, afterwards stirred up the Department that was concerned, and also the Treasury; and in the following year the result of the Motion made the year before was seen. On these grounds, he did not think sufficient reasons had been given for refusing that Motion; and he hoped that next year the whole of the Diplomatic expenditure would be borne on the Estimates, and not a part of it merely.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he was glad to hear the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) express himself in terms which did not imply an intention of offering any serious resistance to the views of the House on this subject. The existing system was a direct infringement of the constitutional maxim that the public purse was in the hands of the House of Commons. The noble Lord, he might remark, was not responsible for the system, which on former occasions had been most strenuously supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and also by the late Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, with his usual warmth of temperament. Under the circumstances, he trusted the noble Lord would agree to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he could bear witness to the great care with which the noble Lord watched over the expenditure connected with his Department. A great principle was involved in this question, and nothing whatever had been said to prove that this particular item ought to be withdrawn from the immediate control of Parliament. He believed that the noble Lord had defended the system in such a manner as he would have done if he had entertained very strong convictions on the subject; and he hoped, therefore, he would accede to the Motion before the House.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that as the salaries of Ministers of the Crown came before the House in the Estimates, he did not see why those of the Diplomatic Service should not also be stated clearly in the Estimates.

MR. LABOUCHERE, in reply, observed that both the present and former Secretary to the Treasury—who might be supposed to know what was the best for economy in conducting the finances—were in favour of his proposition. He hoped the noble Lord would not put the House to the trouble of a division.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That, in the opinion of this House, all sums required to defray the expenses of the Diplomatic Service ought to be annually voted by Parliament, and that Estimates of all such sums ought to be submitted in a form that will admit of their effectual supervision and control by this House." —(Mr. Labouchere.)

COLLIERY ACCIDENTS.

MOTION FOR A COMMISSION.

MR. GREENE, in rising to move "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into Colliery Accidents," said, he might be asked why he, who had no connection with mines, should bring such a subject before the House. His answer was, that he, in common with others, deeply felt the calamity of accidents in coal mines, and considered it a subject well worthy of the Legislature. Even should the debate be unproductive of any practical good, the country would at least feel that Parliament was not neglectful of the lives of the people. He considered that the very fact of 2,468 lives having been destroyed during the year 1865-6 was a sufficient reason for endeavouring to arouse public attention upon the subject. He had carefully read the Report upon Accidents in Coal Mines, and had come to the conclusion that, although the Committee had paid the most careful attention to what they had investigated, there still remained a great deal to be done, and the progressive discoveries of science must always be suggesting improvements in the management of coal mines. He need not draw a harrowing picture of what occurred when 200 or 300 lives were lost in a colliery; but the man must be lacking in Christian feeling who could look into a blazing fire, remember that so many tons of coal cost a life, and refuse to do anything in his power to prevent accidents in future. During a long connection with working men he had experienced many accidents, but he never had a second accident from the same cause, and similar vigilance would prevent many colliery accidents. There were colliery inspectors appointed by the Government, but they went to collieries after accidents, when all was made ready for inspection, and it was therefore difficult for them to ascertain what might have been the particular causes of them. In the Report of the Committee there was a petition of miners, which set forth that the fearful sacrifice of life in mines abundantly proved that the legislative measures hitherto taken were totally inadequate to secure the personal safety of miners; that the Staffordshire practice of working thick coal in more than one place was highly dangerous; and that the loss of life in ironstone and coal mines proved the necessity for more extended legislative supervision. It had been said that if sub-inspectors were appointed the owners of pits would be too much relieved of responsibility. Legislative interference, however, was no new matter. In his opinion sub-inspectors ought to be appointed, and he was told that their appointment would be acceptable to the owners of collieries if it were made by the inspectors, under whom the sub-inspectors should act, and to whom they should report. It was said that men were fatalists; but why should they be exposed to such risks that at last they became hardened and were careless whether they lived or died? There were pitmen who had left mines which they believed had become dangerous, and he desired so to improve the working of coal mines that the men generally should cease to be fatalists. In the petition of the colliery workers the appointment of sub-inspectors was asked for; and on this point he was at issue with the Committee, who said that they did not think it right to recommend such appointments. What he complained of with regard to the Report of the Committee was that nothing practical had come of it. With regard to the proposed examination of overlookers, the Committee suggested that no examination would afford so good a test as the personal knowledge of their qualifications which the owner of a mine might be expected to have; but he believed that the Chairman of the Committee thought the overlookers should pass a proper examination for the office. Then the Committee said that it would not be well to diminish the responsibility of owners and managers of mines by any action on the part of inspectors; but it could not be said that this result would follow if the visits of the inspectors were more frequent than they now were. At present the inspectors rarely went down a mine at all, and they visited the mines at wide intervals, often allowing two years to intervene. [Mr. JACKSON: No.] He referred to the evidence of Mr. Dickenson, and the Report of the Committee, in support of his statement with regard to inspection. He knew it was held that mine-owners ought to continue free from liability for accidents to work-people which were the result of the negligence of fellow-workmen; but, in his opinion, a heavy deodand should be levied on every pit where an accident had occurred through negligence. Under the present system, inspectors did not think it their duty to visit mines unless they were summoned to an accident, or were informed of impending danger. During 1867 there were 500 more accidents than there were in the previous year; and that being so, Parliament could not say that all had been done which ought to be done. He hoped that colliery owners would not think him antagonistic to them; he had no interest either for or against them; but it certainly was for their interest that the mines should be safely worked. The great point was to secure adequate ventilation. He believed that there had been some important inventions for the discovery of gas, and he hoped that the Government would assent to the appointment of a Royal Commission, composed of scientific men, who should carefully, and without prejudice, examine into the merits of these tell-tale inventions. The Oaks Colliery had not been inspected for some years before the accident. He held, therefore, that the present inspection of mines was not sufficient. The number of Government Inspectors was only twelve; there were 3,000 pits; and who would allege that twelve inspectors, without any sub-inspectors to aid them, were sufficient for the purposes of inspection? Mr. Thomas Wynne, a Government Inspector, had testified to the number of accidents which occurred owing to bad management, and added that in every case where a good manager was got he found that the accidents immediately decreased. Well, then, if the owners of coal mines failed to get good managers, he held that it was high time that means should be taken to secure them. Mr. Wynne, in his description of a good manager, said that he was a man who thoroughly understood the working of mines, and who had served a proper time under a proper mining engineer. Mr. Wynne also said that he thought it would have a very good effect if, in certain cases, the inspector should say to the owner, "I think you must take the responsibility on yourself unless you get a better manager." He hoped the circumstance of his calling attention to this subject would produce a good result on the owners of coal pits, for unless they managed their business better, and accidents became much fewer, it would be the duty of every right-thinking man to press for further legislation. Parliament had legislated with regard to sanitary and other matters, and yet they were told that they must leave things alone in a case where accidents were so numerous and terrible. But though the accidents from explosions formed far the largest proportion of those which occurred, there were many also which took place from the falling of roofs. He thought he had shown, from the evidence of Government Inspectors, that many precautions which could be taken were neglected, and that a Royal Commission ought to be allowed to decide whether anything further was to be done. In the Oaks Colliery case the jury came to the conclusion that the deceased had met their deaths by an explosion of gas; they believed that the explosion had occurred in consequence of the great accumulation of gas, which they attributed to the negligence of the manager and his subordinate officers, and they recommended that mines should be inspected once in three months by competent persons, and that they should be provided with scientific instruments for registering the quality and quantity of the air that passed through them. The jury were, no doubt, men thoroughly acquainted with the working of the pit. It was to be feared that colliers were too regardless of their lives, and often continued working in pits long after they were known to be dangerous. Some outbursts of gas might arise from unavoidable circumstances; but he believed such cases were not so frequent as those where the accumulation of gas might have been prevented by better management. As to the safety lamp, many practical men held that it had been a curse rather than a blessing, it being apt to put men off their guard, while any little accident which opened it led to an explosion. Mines, moreover, were now worked which but for the safety lamp would have been abandoned. Now, he maintained that workings should not be continued where the use of naked lights was inadmissible. Not only the prevention of accidents, but the health of the colliers ought to be considered, for who could tell how many lives were shortened by inhaling foul gas? If a naked light could not be used, a pit could not be in a proper sanitary condition, the right use of the safety lamp being to detect the presence of foul gas. Whether the single shift or the double shift system was the best he would not discuss, since the question would be better considered by a Commission, as also would the question of a third shaft. Only a few years had elapsed since two shafts were rendered compulsory, and this regulation had already effected much good. A third shaft, according to a calculation with which he had been furnished, might involve a cost of an extra halfpenny a ton on coal; but the country, having willingly paid 2*d.* in the pound income tax for the liberation of thirty of our fellow-subjects in Abyssinia, would not think this a consideration when the saving of 2,000 lives a year was at stake. He had himself no interest in mines; but he hoped pit-owners and other interested persons would co-operate with him in obtaining the appointment of a Commission. The Commissioners, it had been suggested to him, might, like the Boundary Commissioners, appoint barristers and civil engineers as their assistants, so that the mining districts might be visited, and all possible information elicited.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into Colliery Accidents."—(Mr. Greene.)

MR. W. JACKSON said, he did not rise to oppose the Motion, for there was not a single well-considered suggestion for the safety of their mines that the coalowners of the district with which he was connected were not most willing to comply with. He agreed that the present inspection was not sufficient. Many new collieries had been opened in his district, but no new inspectors had been appointed. The present inspectors were overworked. He did not think the remedy was in increasing the number of sub-inspectors, but in dividing the present districts, which were too large, and appointing an additional number of inspectors. He regretted that the hon. Member who had brought forward this subject was not better acquainted with it; but on behalf of the colliery owners he would say that there were no measures of safety and precaution which the Government could devise which they were not most anxious to adopt. The pecuniary loss of an explosion was so great that if the coalowners had to pay for the inspectors themselves it would be a cheaper thing than the liability to accidents without inspection. He had not been a member of the Select Committee; but he had read the Report and the evidence, and he trusted that the Government would carry their Resolutions into effect.

MR. POWELL said, that as a Member of the Committee of Inquiry into the nature of a colliery district, he wished to offer a few observations on the Motion. At present there was a unanimous feeling throughout all acquainted with the subject that the number of inspectors must be increased. Every one who had read the evidence would admit that many accidents might have been prevented if the inspection had been adequate. It was stated before the Committee that complaints were often made by workmen to the inspectors which brought them to the mines, and one of the inspectors stated that when the mines were visited the reports of the workpeople were usually more than borne out by the facts. The Committee came to a strong and unanimous recommendation that the number of inspectors should be increased, and he was much disappointed on taking up the Estimates for the present year to find that no provision had been made for an increase in the number of inspectors. Although, however, the condition of things might be improved by better inspection, that improvement would be limited in degree unless they secured a better class of managers. Colliery owners were agreed that one great cause of accidents was the want of skill in the managers, and it frequently happened that persons who invested their capital in collieries with no sufficient knowledge of the business occasioned disaster to themselves and others by an injudicious selection of unskilled and careless managers. But even this would not be sufficient without a like improvement in the whole class of subordinate officers and underground viewers. A great change of opinion had taken place lately amongst the owners of collieries on the subject of inspection, and it was felt that this was of the highest possible importance, and that the chances of accident and loss would be materially lessened if there were a number of efficient sub-inspectors under the control and direction of the inspectors who would be engaged in the function of viewing and making suggestions as to the better management and more complete provision for the safety of the workmen.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS BILL.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

LORD PORTMAN, having presented a Petition for Amendment of the Artizans' Dwellings Bill, of the Board of Works of the Holborn District, said: I take the liberty of asking your Lordships' attention to a matter somewhat personal, but still one as to which it is desirable that I should offer an explanation to your Lordships. In the observations made by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) in the discussion on the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Bill the other night, I supplemented his statement by a paragraph which, as I thought, he had omitted. Now, the noble and learned Lord omitted to state to the House that he quoted from The Observer; and, as I was not aware that there were two paragraphs of a somewhat similar nature in two different papers, I naturally imagined that he was quoting from The Daily Telegraph. It would seem that The Observer had an article of much the same kind, but without the words which to me were so offensive. The passage in The Daily Telegraph of Monday, the 25th, was, as I stated—

"Any fair and reasonable objection will be gladly entertained, and any proper safeguard admitted, by those who have charge of the measure; but the Peers, who own so much property in the metropolis, and who therefore owe a proportionate duty to its inhabitants, will oppose this most salutary and necessary piece of legislation at their peril."

These were the words I used; and for having used them I am accused this morning of practising "a ruse." But those who have known anything of my conduct for the last forty years will not, I feel sure, suppose me capable of practising anything like a ruse upon your Lordships, or of making any statement which I was not prepared to support or did not believe to be true. I am not in the habit of playing that sort of game. I am too old to do so now. But it is due to The Observer that the acknowledgment should be made that its correspondent did not betray it into the use of the same language which found admittance into The Daily Telegraph.

POOR RELIEF BILL—(No. 111.)

(The Earl of Devon.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on this Bill read.

LORD REDESDALE said, there were two provisions of the Bill which seemed to him open to serious objection. In the first place, he did not think it right to deprive the small parishes of the right of appointing each its own representative to the Board of Guardians of the union—thus depriving them of any control over the expenditure of funds to which they had contributed a part; and, in the next place, he objected to give to every inmate of a workhouse a statutable right to go outside to attend religious worship. He thought this point would require consideration, because it was to be feared that persons would avail themselves of such a right for the purpose of getting off from workhouses and leaving their children behind them.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Poor Law Board may unite small Parishes for the Election of Guardians).

THE EARL OF DEVON moved to insert after "Parish" the words "in a Union."

LORD KESTEVEN said, this clause would violate the principle that representation should go with taxation, because the smaller parishes of a union would be taxed without having representatives of their own on the Board, and thus the control over the expenditure would rest entirely with the larger parishes. He proposed that the clause be struck out.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY hoped their Lordships would not expunge the clause. Where each parish was taxed by itself it was fair that each parish should have a representative on the Board; but since union rating for various purposes had been introduced, it would be absurd to give a small parish, that might perhaps consist of only 300 persons, a representative of its own. If this were done the representation of the smaller parishes would be out of all proportion to their population and rated value. The change proposed would leave them as much power at the Board of Guardians as they were fairly entitled to.

On Question, Whether to insert? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 56; Not-Contents 28: Majority 28.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Several clauses agreed to; some postponed.

Clause 22 (How the Religion of Children to be entered in the Creed Register).

Lord Redesdale

EARL GREY said, he did not think the parents who deserted their children should be allowed to exert any control over their religious education. To do so would be to give a premium to child-desertion. He would therefore move the insertion of words dispensing with the requirement that deserted children should be educated in the faith of their parents.

After ("Child") moved to insert ("not being a deserted Child").—(Earl Grey.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY hoped that their Lordships would not assent to the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl. The provision objected to was already in force with respect to orphan children.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY supported the Amendment. Respect was very properly paid to the religious feelings and opinions of the deceased parents of orphans; but when parents deserted their children they forfeited all their rights over them to the State, which had a right to educate them in the manner it believed to be best for their temporal and eternal welfare.

THE EARL OF DEVON said, that the words objected to were requisite in order to do justice to the various religious bodies, and to prevent a large number of deserted children whose parents belonged to the Roman Catholic Church from being sent to Church of England schools.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought it wrong to tax the poor rate-payers of this country in order to support and educate the children of Irish parents who emigrated to America, leaving their children to be a burden upon the taxpayers of this country.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that one of the most important functions of the Poor Law Board was to undertake the education of destitute children in this country. If the religion of the parents of destitute children could not be ascertained, they should be regarded as belonging to the Established Church of the country.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not pretend to question the earnestness of the noble Earl's advocacy of the Established Church; but it should be remembered that the Established Church was, so to speak, in the crucible at present, and if the legislation now sought to be applied to Ireland prevailed, and if a deserted child had no other religion than that of the Established Church, it occurred to him to ask what its religion would be where there was no Established Church at all?

LORD OVERSTONE said, that deserted children necessarily became the children of the State, who stood towards them in loco parentis; and it was the clear duty of the State to educate them in what was the religion of the State.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 42; Not-Contents 60: Majority 18.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed; and to be again in Committee on Monday the 15th of June next; Bill to be printed as amended (No. 132.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

ARMY—SUBORDINATE OFFICERS IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, By whom the present House keepers and Office keepers at the War Office, Office of the Commander in Chief, and Quartermaster General, were respectively appointed; the salaries they respectively receive, and the positions they respectively held in the Public Service, or otherwise, previous to their appointment; and the number of Boys, Labourers, Servants, Doorkeepers, Messengers, Temporary Clerks, Clerks or other salaried persons in the Offices of the Secretary of State for War, the Commander in Chief, the Adjutant General, the Quartermaster General, the Topographical Department, Her Majesty's Stores, Pimlico, Her Majesty's Stores, Tower, and the number of persons in these Offices respectively who have served at any time in Her Majesty's Army?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the Question embraced such a great variety of names that he should have been disposed to ask his noble Friend to move for a Return if it had not been that as regards the second portion of the Question, by far the larger number of persons there referred to would be found in the Army Estimates; and if his noble Friend would look to page 84 of those Estimates he would find them there. He would therefore mention those who were not to be found in the Army Estimates. The housekeeper in the War Office had been appointed by Lord de Grey at a salary of £100 a year, being only one half of the salary of her predecessor, and she was the wife of one of the War Office messengers. The office-keeper had been appointed by the late Duke of Newcastle, at a salary of £250 a year. He was formerly a Queen's Messenger for Home Service attached to the Colonial Office. The office-keeper in the Commander-in-Chief's Office was appointed by His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, at a salary of £130. He was formerly a messenger in the same Office, and had previously to that been quartermaster-sergeant in the Grenadier Guards. The housekeeper had also been appointed by His Royal Highness at a salary of £84. The office-keeper in the Quartermaster General's Office had been appointed by the Quartermaster General at a salary of £100 a year. He had been fourteen years a messenger in that office, and had previously been a non-commissioned officer in the Scots Fusilier Guards. The house-keeper had also been appointed by the Quartermaster General, at a salary of £50 a year. With regard to the latter part of the Question of the noble Lord, which related to the clerks, within the last five years military clerks had been substituted for civilians, and there were at present forty-five military clerks employed in the office. It was only fair to say that this measure was commenced by Lord de Grey, when he was Secretary of State for War.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman would have any objection to lay on the table a Return explanatory of the latter part of the Question?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied that he had no objection to do so?

ARMY—RIFLED ORDNANCE—STUDDED SHOT.—QUESTION.

MR. ESMONDE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the studded shot system hitherto adopted with heavy rifled ordnance has been, or is about to be, abandoned; and, if so, whether he is prepared to state the causes which have rendered such course necessary, and to produce the Report or Reports of the Ordnance Select Committee on the subject, or of the experiments which have led to it; whether any trials have been made of a proposed new system submitted to the Government of rifling heavy ordnance with perfect semi-circular projections raised in the gun, and corresponding semi-circular grooves in the shot, thus strengthening the gun itself and making it and the shot both rifled; and whether he is prepared to produce any Report made on such proposed system, or of the trials thereof, if any such have been made; and, if no trial has been made of such proposed new system for rotating heavy projectiles intended for the penetration of armour-plating, whether he is prepared to state the reasons why such trial has not been made?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, it was not true that the studded shot system hitherto adopted with heavy rifled ordnance had been, or was about to be, abandoned. With regard to a proposal made by a gentleman named Murphy for a new plan of rifling heavy ordnance, no trial of it had yet been made by the Ordnance Select Committee. That Committee, however, had made a Report which he was willing to produce if the hon. Gentleman would move for it, and there would be found an answer to his Question as to the reasons why the trial had not been made.

LATYMER'S CHARITY, EDMONTON. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether any reply has been returned by the Charity Commissioners to the Memorials addressed to them by the inhabitants of Edmonton in the matter of "Latymer's Charity" at that place; and, whether he can state the course which the Commissioners intend taking with respect to the said charity?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in reply, said, the Commissioners had thought it expedient to withhold their reply to the memorials addressed to them in the matter of "Latymer's Charity, at Edmonton," until the re-settlement most proper to be made of its endowments should, after full consideration of all its circumstances, be definitively determined upon. That determination had been made, and the scheme having been formally perfected, would be promulgated in the parish within the next few days.

EDUCATION—THE REVISED CODE. QUESTIONS.

MR. BRUCE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, the Government having withdrawn their Education Bill, it is their intention to propose the repeal or alteration of Article Eight of the Revised Code, so as to admit Secular Schools to the benefit of the Parliamentary Grant?

MR. BAINES said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord, Whether he is aware that the Congregational Board of Education have decided to alter its Trust Deed in reliance on the assurances received from the Committee of Council; and that that Board, with its Training College and affiliated Schools, would be subject to great inconvenience if those assurances should not be fulfilled?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied that the Government had determined to give effect to the wishes of the congregational bodies or of other religious bodies by means of a general Bill on the subject of education, which had been introduced into the other House by the Lord President of the Council, and it was thought that the scheme contained in that Bill would have been satisfactory to all parties. The circumstances of the present Session had, however, obliged the Government to drop that Bill for this year; and they thought it would not be advisable, by means of a Minute, to deal with one part of that general scheme to the exclusion of the others. In answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Leeds, he had to state that he had been informed by him that the Congregational Board had altered its trust deeds, and he feared that in consequence they would be put to some inconvenience.

JUDICIAL BUSINESS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—QUESTION.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House a Return of the number of Causes standing for hearing before the House of Lords at the commencement of the present Session of Parliament, and of the number already heard during the present Session; with the number of days on which the Lords have sat for hearing Appeals, and the number of hours occupied on each day of sitting, and the names of the Lords who sat on each day?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if the hon. Member would move for a Return on that subject it would not be opposed.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, before moving the Second Reading of the "Metropolitan Police Funds Bill," whereby the local Taxation of the Metropolis for Police purposes is sought to be augmented, he will lay before the House Copy of the Evidence taken by, and the Report of the Home Office Committee on, the Metropolitan Police; and, whether he will also, before the Second Reading of the Bill, produce an Estimate of the increased expenditure to be incurred thereunder?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he will state the mode in which the Police is to be distributed throughout the different parishes?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that the increase in the metropolitan police was determined on long before the inquiry instituted at the Home Office took place, and therefore had no relation to it. With regard to the expenditure to be incurred under the Bill, an Estimate had been laid on the table, and would, he hoped, be satisfactory. If the hon. Member for Middlesex would give Notice of his Question, he would make inquiry whether there would be any difficulty on the subject mentioned by him.

MAIN DRAINAGE OF METROPOLIS — PETITION OF INHABITANTS OF BARKING.—QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What steps he proposes to take with regard to the Memorial addressed to him by the Vicar, Churchwardens, Medical Practitioners, and other Inhabitants of Barking, complaining of the state of the River Thames as dangerous to navigation and to the health of the inhabitants of Barking, and of all the towns below London, and praying him to instruct the Attorney General to apply to the Court of Chancery for an injunction against the Metropolitan Board of Works to restrain them from discharging the sewage of London into the River Thames?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that the Act of Parliament under which the sewage was discharged into the River Thames had received great consideration. The memorial to which his noble Friend had referred had only reached the Home Office within the last two or three days, and he had referred it immediately to the proper quarter. Up to the present he had got no answer, and therefore he was not prepared to say what steps would be taken.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL—DISFRANCHISED ENGLISH BOROUGHES.—QUESTION.

MR. YORKE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What course the Government propose to take about the three boroughs proposed to be disfranchised by a late Vote of the House, and not assigned to Scotland in the Government scheme of Re-distribution; and, whether the seven boroughs to be disfranchised are those which are lowest in the scale of population?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the Instruction which was carried by the House only empowered the Committee to disfranchise ten boroughs. Now, I do not propose to avail myself of that Instruction, except to the extent of seven seats, to increase the representation of Scotland. We intend to adhere strictly to the programme which I introduced the other night to the attention of the Committee with regard to the representation of Scotland, and therefore I do not propose to deal at all with the other three boroughs. The boroughs which we propose to disfranchise will be taken according to population, that being the rule hitherto observed in those arrangements.

MR. GLADSTONE: Am I correct in understanding the answer just given, that with the exception of the union of the two counties, Peebles and Selkirk, and the formation of what he calls the border boroughs, the right hon. Gentleman does not intend to go further into the question of re-distribution of counties or towns in Scotland? Is that so?

MR. DISRAELI: Clearly, that is the intention of the Government.

RUSSIA AND BOKHARA.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has any information of a proposed renewal of Russian hostilities against Bokhara; and, if so, whether he can state the aim and object of such hostilities?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, in the Journal de St. Pétersbourg of the 22nd of April there is a statement that a small Russian force had been sent across the Bokharian frontier to put down some tribes who had given trouble and annoyance to the population within the Russian territory. It is said that the force has been effectual for its object, and I am not aware that there have been any subsequent military operations.

IRELAND—PROPOSED CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.—QUESTION.

MR. MURPHY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any further steps with regard to the proposed Catholic University for Ireland?

Mr. Yorke

THE EARL OF MAYO: Sir, the correspondence which has been laid upon the table of this House has shown that the conditions which Her Majesty's Government thought necessary to append to the granting of a Charter to a Roman Catholic University have been declined by the right rev. Prelates who were deputed to act in the matter on the part of the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland. Under these circumstances, therefore, we have come to the conclusion that the matter must be considered entirely at an end.

TURNPIKE CONTINUANCE BILL. QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What has prevented the promised early introduction of the Turnpike Continuance Bill, and when that Bill will be laid upon the table of the House?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he was not prepared to admit that anything had prevented the early introduction of the Bill, because his hon. Friend had given Notice of his intention to bring it in to-morrow night, and that would be very early indeed. With respect to the course of proceeding, it would be this:—A very large number of cases would be included in the Schedule of the Bill for 1869, and he proposed to give Notice that a Select Committee be appointed early next Session, so that the parties concerned might have an opportunity of laying before it any representations they had to make.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM— REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 29.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson).

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 25th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 9 (Glasgow to return three Members).

MR. GRAHAM said, that there had been great disappointment felt in Scotland at the result of their proceedings last Monday. The claims of the northern part of this island to a larger amount of increased representation than had been accorded to it were so irresistible, so much approved by the House and acknowledged by all parties, that, conscious as the people of Scotland were of the difficulties the Government had to encounter in giving all they were entitled to, and entirely appreciating their good faith and kindly feeling, they had been led to believe, upon the success of the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), that a larger increase than was now proposed might have been given them. Glasgow, especially, felt aggrieved, containing, as it did, one-seventh of the population of Scotland, and, though not in historical associations, yet in importance really being the capital of the country. That city concentrated within itself the manufacturing industries like those of Lancashire and a shipping trade like Liverpool, and, in addition, was possessed of an University, which in past times had been an institution of great usefulness, and by the erection of magnificent buildings was preparing for a still greater career. It certainly seemed to the people of Glasgow that the deprivation of a fourth Member was a very hard measure, and that the House did not deal with them with the consideration and the justice to which they were entitled; but when to that was added that Glasgow was the only constituency in Scotland which was to be made a three-cornered one, he must say that the feeling of the community was one of great regret and great indignation. There had been public meetings held in opposition to the arrangements proposed by the Government, and he was in possession of the strongest remonstrances on the subject. One great objection to the proposal of the Government was the unwieldiness and expensiveness of the constituency that would thus be created. It must be within the knowledge of most Members of that House that it must be a most difficult thing to canvass a constituency like Glasgow, with its 16,000 electors; and when, as would be the case by the extension of the franchise, it came to 40,000 or 50,000, he appealed to hon. Members to say, from their own experience, whether a personal canvass by candidates of such a constituency was not wholly impossible. It might be said that personal acquaintance was not required, and that the candidate might rely on his public addresses and their effect on the public mind; but even if some candidates were content to trust to this, any energetic opponent with abundant funds might force another to the labour, anxiety, and expensiveness of a personal canvass. The result could only be to create an organization concentrating political power in the hands of caucuses or cliques, and so controlling in an injurious manner the independence both of the electors and the elected. Then there was another consideration in the expense rendered necessary by such a constituency. Even as it already existed, the election expenses of the constituency of Glasgow were very heavy. It had cost himself something like £4,000 to obtain his seat, and he could faithfully declare that not a penny of that money had been spent in an illegitimate, corrupt, or, as far as he was aware, in an extravagant manner. His hon. Colleague (Mr. Dalglish) was not protected by his long services and the great hold he had upon the people of Glasgow from having to contest the city, and the joint expenses of the three gentlemen who had sought the representation of the city at the late election had been something like £9,000. The increase of expense arising from the extension of the franchise would, he was informed, be something like one-half, and adding the increase that would be caused by the extension of the boundaries proposed by Government, he believed he should be within the mark in estimating the total expense of an election for Glasgow, if contested, at £20,000. The only possible reason, as far as he knew, for entailing upon the constituency and candidates that enormous labour, anxiety, and expense, was for the purpose of inflicting upon Glasgow that three-cornered representation which was put into the English Bill by the other House at the last moment. They strongly objected to that; and he thought it was with very great reason that they did so. He had no wish to discuss the principle of Lord Cairns' Amendment, although utterly disapproving of it; and he was aware that many hon. Gentlemen conscientiously held that that was a wise Amendment on the Bill; but its partial application to one solitary constituency here and there was thoroughly unsound. If the principle be good at all, it must be more widely extended; and if the triangular system could not be made general, if not universal, his belief was that they would have to give it up altogether. Besides, its introduction into England was no reason why they should force it upon a reluctant constituency in Scotland. So far as Glasgow was concerned the proposal of the Bill would reduce the active political influence of Glasgow, on the occasion of party divisions on great political questions in that House, to that of one of those small boroughs which have barely escaped disfranchisement. He held it to be unwise, unjust, and unsafe, to impose upon a great and intelligent community like that of Glasgow a system of that kind, which limited to so large an extent their choice of a representative, and diminished so unfairly their weight in Parliament. He believed it was not for the interest of this country to elect only men of great means; and yet what possibility was there for any man who had not large means to contest such a constituency? The proposal he now made to divide Glasgow into three constituencies would give three distinct constituencies each quite large enough in the experience of Members for any gentleman to canvass. Besides, it must be remembered that those constituencies were not decaying and diminishing ones. The constituency of Glasgow was, of all others, probably the largest and most increasing in this country. It was developing to an extent to which no other of which he was aware was doing. He opposed the proposal of the Government on the ground that it limited the choice of the constituency, involved great labour and expense, and endangered the independence alike of the Members and the electors, and deprived Glasgow of its just weight in the councils of the country. The hon. Gentleman was about to move an Amendment, when—

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that an Amendment of which notice had been given by the Lord Advocate was entitled to precedence.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved the omission of the words from the commencement down to the words "to serve in Parliament, and" inclusive, explaining that as the number of Members for Glasgow had been already fixed at three, the words in the clause which he moved to omit were mere surplusage.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GRAHAM then moved the insertion of words providing that Glasgow be divided into three districts, each returning one Member.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 27, after the word "Glasgow," to insert the words "shall be divided into three districts, each of which shall return one Member to Parliament."—(Mr. Graham.)

Mr. Graham

MR. DISRAELI said, the Committee would observe that, if they acceded to those words, they would run counter to the Resolution at which they arrived last year on the English Reform Bill. He wished the House clearly to understand the issue before them, and to consider whether they would rescind their last year's Resolution that minorities should be represented.

MR. BAXTER remarked, that when introducing the Irish Bill the noble Lord (the Earl of Mayo) stated that if the House decided to divide Dublin, instead of giving it three Members on the minority principle, he should offer no objection, adding that the Government were no great advocates of that principle, and that he should be sorry to see it applied to any great extent in Ireland. Now, the Scotch Members hoped the Government would consent to do for Scotland what they were willing to do for Ireland.

MR. SMOLLETT, as a Member caring little for party arrangements, and representing a constituency connected with Glasgow, intended to vote for the Amendment. He had always objected to triangular representation, and voted last Session against the addition of a third Member to Manchester and three other large towns in the North of England. He did so because he thought the system was an improper one, and because it was never palatable even to the constituencies to which it was applied by the Act of 1832, and he looked upon it as perfectly odious now that the extraordinary principle of the representation of minorities had been grafted upon it. The principle of the representation of minorities had been thrust upon that House by the House of Lords, after it had been repudiated in the House of Commons by a majority of 140 votes. It would, he thought, be better to confine the representation of Glasgow to two Members if the three seats were to be coupled with this ridiculous proposal. Glasgow had about 50,000 or 60,000 electors; it would be very difficult to find three gentlemen of position who would come before such a constituency; and he feared that after the first General Election there would be a great deterioration in the Members for that city. He believed that the third Member for Glasgow, under the proposal for the representation of minorities, instead of being a Conservative, would be much more likely to be the worst of the whole lot, and to be either a trades unionist or at all events a delegate representing the views of those mischievous associations. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), if he (Mr. Smollett) recollected rightly, contested this principle of the representation of minorities with great force when it came from the House of Lords. He (Mr. Smollett) did not believe that that principle would have been acquiesced in in the House of Commons, after it came from the Lords if a proper opportunity for discussing the question had been given. The debate was continued on the night of the 8th of August, when hon. Members on both sides of the House were sick of the name of Reform, and when they were anxious to go off as quickly as possible to their grouse-shooting and salmon-fishing in Scotland and Norway. The hon. Member for Birmingham, knowing the principles of the people of Manchester and Birmingham, repudiated a third Member if coupled with the principle of the representation of minorities. He (Mr. Smollett) believed the people of Glasgow would do the same, if they were applied to, to-morrow. In his opinion, it would have been better if, instead of adopting the proposition of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), the House had taken the resolution of striking off all the triangular Members from towns and counties in England; and then they would have had twelve seats to dispose of for the representation of Scotland. But, no matter what might be done, the best chance Glasgow had of a diversity of representation in future was to divide it into three distinct wards, and let each have a Member. On that principle, he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham).

Mr. GLADSTONE confessed that he much preferred the proposal made by the Government last year with regard to Glasgow to the one which was now before them—he meant the proposal to divide Glasgow into two divisions—one on the north and the other on the south side of the river. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) now made a proposal to divide Glasgow into three divisions, and to give one Member to each; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), if he (Mr. Gladstone) understood him aright, objected to the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow, on the ground that it would in some manner contravene the decision of the House last year. For his own part he should feel that, if it would at all contravene or overturn the decision of last year, that fact would only recommend it the more. He spoke so far individually and for himself; but he was aware that there were many Gentlemen, even on that (the Opposition) side of the House, who did not think with him on that point—and he wanted to know how it was best that, for the interests of them all, they should dispose of this particular matter. He thought it was obvious that they were all anxious to make rapid progress with the Bill—and it would be advantageous if they could avoid reviving the discussion of last year with respect to the representation of minorities. In his opinion both the friends of the principle and its opponents ought to concur in that. The friends of the minority clause, as far as he was acquainted with their opinions, thought that, in order to give full effect to the virtues of that system, it ought to be tried upon a very extended scale; and the plan of last year they looked upon as a mere morsel, and an experiment which was to give them an idea of the manner in which it would work; but they were of opinion that if according to that experiment it succeeded, it ought to be extended. If that were so, then, without any disparagement to their opinions, he should think the provisions of the English Bill were amply sufficient for that experiment. Why should they re-import into the discussion the whole of this controversy, only with the object of adding one more city to the number of those to which the principle was applied? They who were opposed to the principle were bound to give it a fair trial, which it must have under the provisions of the English Bill. The plan recommended by his hon. Friend (Mr. Graham) had this peculiar recommendation, that it did in some degree, and perhaps in a very considerable degree, meet the views of the advocates of the minority clause, without raising the objections of its opponents. It was a new kind of experiment, and let in a considerable new representation without departing from that old principle of the electoral system of this country, that the majority should rule, and that the opinions of the majority should have weight. The plan certainly involved a novel experiment, and he hoped the Government would not feel it to be necessary to object to the Motion of his hon. Friend. He should desire to see the adoption of any plan in order to avoid this needless and irritating controversy.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, he hoped the Committee would not allow itself to be led away from the real issue before it. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) asked the Committee to adopt a principle entirely without precedent in any other part of the kingdom. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire said that the Committee might adopt a novel experiment. He trusted that they would do no such thing. The proposal of the hon. Member for Glasgow was in reality to convert the representation for that borough into a simple representation by wards, a proposition which had been on a former occasion discussed and rejected by the House. He asked the Committee to divide Glasgow into three wards with a Member for each, and thus to overturn the decision of Parliament with regard to the representation of minorities. That was the most important principle laid down during the discussion of the Bill of last year, and the Committee would not now allow it to be abrogated by a side-wind. He trusted that in the present advanced stage of their proceedings they would hear no more of novel experiments.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, if the Committee agreed to divide Glasgow into three wards, in no one ward would the minority have the slightest chance of representation or of ever obtaining a Member. The proposal of a representation of minorities was spoken of as the plan of the right hon. Member for Calne, but it had been previously adopted by Earl Russell, who proposed to try it in thirty or forty divisions of counties.

MR. DALGLISH said, he was not quite sure that so large a principle as the representation of minorities ought to be discussed upon this clause. The Government proposed to give three Members to Glasgow: but they also proposed to increase the population returning these Members from 440,000 to 470,000. In the immediate neighbourhood of Glasgow there was a population of 30,000 who were equally connected with the borough, and it would simplify the question if the Government would consent to add 60,000 to the population of 440,000 returning the present Members, making a population of 500,000. They should then divide Glasgow into two divisions, and give two Members to each half. That would be an act of justice, and would save all discussion on this point. He left the matter with confidence to the Government.

MR. SCHREIBER said, the Scotch Members seemed already to have forgotten the plea they originally put forward when it was their object to secure additional Members. Then Scotland was to be regarded as an integral part of the Empire. He was reminded that when the remains of Napoleon were brought home from St. Helena to France, observant Frenchmen said they were not only bringing back the bones of that great man, but also his principles. Well, when the English seats were to be taken across the Scotch border, it was not the English seats only, but also the English principle that was to be taken there; and that English principle was the representation of the minority. He protested against the narrow spirit of provincialism which cropped up among Scotch Members immediately the question of an English principle arose. The representation of minorities was a true and a good principle, and as one of the few Conservative principles, if not the only one, contained in the Reform Bill of last Session, he would not consent to yield it without a struggle.

MR. OSBORNE said, he hoped the Committee would not be led away by the bones of Napoleon nor by the assertion that that Motion was a novel experiment. The principles now invoked on the 28th of May were not discussed as principles at all on the 8th of August last. They were last year all too happy to get away from that question, upon which they then voted under the pressure of extreme heat and equal disgust. He should now vote with the hon. Member for Glasgow, not in any spirit of provincialism, about which the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Schreiber) had lectured them; but because he hoped his vote would be the means of hereafter upsetting the most abominable of all experiments, the representation of minorities in England. He believed that a more mischievous experiment had never been introduced into our legislation. He trusted that all hon. Gentlemen who were shaky on that particular question would keep this in their eye—that by voting for this Motion they would eventually get rid of the representation of minorities.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE was much obliged to his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) for having so ingenuously let the cat out of the bag. The hon. Member had confessed that his object in opposing the proposal for bestowing the third Member upon Glasgow upon the minority principle, was the desire to get rid of that principle for England also—using the Scotch Reform Bill as other Members had done, as the instrument for tinkering the English Reform Act. For his own part, he was not afraid to say that among many absurd and mischievous propositions embodied in that Act as it had received the Royal Assent, he regarded this one as possessing some substantive merit. It was in the grammatical, and not in the partizan sense, a Conservative provision, inasmuch as it conserved for large masses of the population who would otherwise have been virtually disfranchised, a share in the national representation. There was, however, one point on which his hon. Friend had been prudently ambiguous. He had been almost pathetic on the discomforts of the August fight upon the minority principle during the Session of 1867, when the English Reform Bill had come back from the Lords, but he had forgotten to explain whether he intended his present opposition to the representation of minorities to bear practical fruit in the present Parliament, or to be a protest intended to influence the mind of the coming one. If he intended to follow up the advantage during this Session, the House might again be debating the point in August; and, for his own part, he (Mr. Beresford Hope) hoped it would be doing so. If it were but a protest thrown out to futurity, he could only declare against the idle attempt to bias the untried Parliament of an unknown constituency. The minority constituencies in towns like Birmingham counted respectively by tens of thousands, and he therefore declined to argue the superiority of their claim to be represented over that of the hundreds or at most thousands, who would form the entire constituency of many of the smaller seats existing under the Act of last year. In spite of his hon. Friend he was prepared to support the minority suffrage both in England and in Scotland.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) had called on Gentlemen on that side to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham), holding out to them the inducement of getting rid of the principle of the representation of minorities. That was the strongest possible reason why those who were in favour of the representation of minorities—not as being a Conservative measure, but as a measure of justice—should vote against the present Motion. Nothing could be more unfair than to speak of the representation of those persons who happen to be in a minority, whatever might be their political opinions, in any constituency, as being in any exclusive sense a Conservative principle. On the contrary, it was not only the most democratic of all principles, but it was the only true democratic principle of representation, and they could not have a complete system of representation without it. Man for man, those who happened to be in a minority had just as much claim to be represented as the majority.

MR. BRIGHT: I have only this moment entered the House, and have not heard the discussion; but I wish to take an opportunity of reminding the Committee that last year a majority of more than 140 Members of this House objected to this proposition, and that the circumstances under which it afterwards became law were very peculiar. The right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government on that occasion made, what I then described, and I now repeat the observation, as the most earnest and resolute speech which he made during the whole of the Reform Bill discussions, in opposition to the proposition supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill). The House, following his advice and the advice of a great many others, by a large majority—more than 140—rejected the proposition. Well, what then happened? The Bill went up to the House of Lords; and what occurred there soon afterwards? The House of Lords proposed some five or six Amendments of various kinds and various degrees of importance in the Bill. It came down to this House for those Amendments to be considered here. I need not state what all those Amendments were; but the two principal ones had reference, the one to the question of the representation of minorities, and the other to voting papers. The minority clause was the last of the Lords' Amendments that came to be considered in this House. All their other Amendments, as they were brought before the House, were rejected. The voting papers, which had been agreed to in the other House, were rejected in this. We came then to this question, whether this minority clause—being the only one of the Amendments of the other House which we had not rejected—should be rejected like the rest, or should be consented to? Then what happened was this. I speak it from no mean authority. I know exactly the truth of what I am saying. It was felt by Her Majesty's Government that if this House rejected every one of the Amendments of the other House of Parliament, it might be regarded as a little severe upon them; that, possibly, that House might have an excuse for suspending the Bill, refusing to go on with it, and postponing it till next year. And, more than that, perhaps Lord Derby felt—which was not unreasonable—that it would be hard for him, the Leader of the Conservative party, and so long its Leader in that House, to do anything that appeared to be like offering a rebuff or a humiliation to the House of Lords. The result was that the measure which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had denounced in the most forcible terms, which Lord Derby himself—and I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to bear this in mind—had described as utterly unconstitutional—a measure the mischief of which he pointed out with singular force, and which he declared could only be limited by the extent to which the proposition itself was limited—that very measure, in order that they might not appear to be a party to doing something like offering a rebuff to the House of Peers, the Government turned round and supported in this House, not having altered their opinion in the least—the right hon. Gentleman's opinion at this moment is exactly what it was then—hon. Gentlemen opposite, I say, some 200 of them, turned round, and the proposition which the House had rejected by a majority of 140 was carried by a majority of 30 or 40 on a subsequent occasion. Now, the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland the other night, in discussing the Irish Reform Bill, intimated what we all know to be true, that the Government are not very anxious to adhere to this minority principle, and would not care much if it were rejected. Let me tell the Committee in what condition this question stands in the country. I represent a borough to which this new system applies, and I am also intimately acquainted with what is going on in the city of Manchester, to which it also applies. Now, in these two boroughs—and I am told it is the same in the City of London—there is the utmost dissatisfaction—nay, indignation—expressed at the new system. Every person, I do not care what his politics may be, sees that there is a new element introduced into the election proceedings of the borough—a new element which can scarcely be comprehended, but which, at least, must lead necessarily to a state of chaos. For example, you have an election committee to manage the contest in Manchester, or Liverpool, or Birmingham, or the City of London. In three of these boroughs you have three candidates to be elected, and in the City of London four. Now, I will take the case of Birmingham or Liverpool. It is obvious that you cannot have a joint committee for the three candidates, because you cannot canvass for three. The canvassers can only ask for votes for two candidates. No matter how pure or impure the constituency, the organization of election is utterly disarranged, and, in fact, made almost impossible. The one of the three candidates who may fancy he is not being treated fairly by the committee or the canvassers will have great reason to complain; and, in all probability, you will have some one candidate at the head of the poll who happens to be the popular man, and where the others will be I do not know, though I suppose they will be like some of the unfortunate horses which we read about yesterday. As a matter of course, the minority in all these places will bring forward two candidates only, and will poll all their voters for both of them. They will have, therefore, a great advantage in that respect; but the majority will do nothing of the kind, and consequently their whole arrangements will be thrown into the greatest confusion. With respect to two of these great constituencies—Liverpool and Manchester—they consider the House, in agreeing to the principle of the representation of minorities, treated them in a manner not honourable to the House nor fair to them. They did not ask you to give them an additional Member in order to have this odious system introduced. They would not have come here and asked for another Member if they had known that you would have introduced a system which did not allow their representation to be increased, but which really diminished their effective power in the House. If I were a member of the minority at one of those places—for instance, if I lived at Liverpool, and were a Liberal, while the majority was Tory—I would never give my vote at any of these elections. And if these constituencies to whom this House has dealt out this measure of injustice, and, I may say, of gross folly, would take my advice, they would resist all representation to the House under these conditions. I agree with Lord Derby as to the utterly unconstitutional nature of the proposition, and I am ready to endorse every syllable which the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government spoke last year when he denounced this system. Then look at the utter humiliation to which we in this House were subjected because we adopted that which we had previously rejected by a majority of 140; and this merely in order to prevent a small temporary difficulty which the Government was likely to experience in dealing with the House of Lords in regard to the Reform Bill. As to this particular vote, it is of no great consequence whether another town is added to the four which have been injured in this manner. It is no use saying this is a matter of great importance as far as the mere extension of the principle to one more town is concerned; but I venture to say that after an election under this system you will find that the greatest hostility will exist in all these constituencies to the course which you have pursued; and if you give a minority vote to Glasgow, that town will simply be added to the other four large towns which will ask in some future and early Parliament that this disability should be removed. I do not know whether any hon. Gentleman thinks I am overstating the case; I myself am sure I am not. In the two English constituencies to which I have referred there exists the greatest possible objection to the system; and I believe the experience of the elections will show that they have not objected more than they ought to object. In point of fact, one of two things must happen—either the representation must be utterly confused in these boroughs or else destroyed, one party putting up one man and the other two men, so that Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and London will be reduced to that monotonous, lifeless condition which has existed in some small boroughs ever since the Reform Bill of 1832, and which will probably exist in them as long as they have any representation at all. May I, therefore, ask the Committee not to proceed further in a course for which they have no sort of argument except that which has just been urged by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), who, however, admitted last year that this was not the kind of representation of minorities which he advocated, and that, in point of fact, he did not advocate the representation of minorities at all, but a system under which everybody should be represented. There has been no argument whatever to overthrow the views enunciated by Lord Derby last year in the House of Peers, and by the right hon. Gentleman in this House. Furthermore, I maintain that there is not a single constituency in the United Kingdom which is in favour of this proposition. Hitherto you have had no trial of it by practical experience; but it has been received as a great, a grievous, and an unparalleled injury by some of the greatest constituencies in the kingdom. I appeal, therefore, to the House, and if you take my advice—and you will afterwards be glad to have taken it—you will not establish north of the Tweed a principle which, if I be not greatly mistaken as to the temper of my countrymen, will only be more hated on the south of the Tweed the more we have experience of it.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, he wished, as a representative of a minority county, to say a few words on the plea of justice. If the principle of representation of minorities was not to be maintained in large towns it ought not to be maintained in counties. When last year he voted for that measure, being a Member for a minority county, he did so under the distinct belief that the principle would be extended to large towns also, being of opinion that by such an arrangement the spirit of Conservatism might be kept alive in the great centres of industry. But if the principle were now to be broken through, and towns were to be exempted from this system, he maintained that counties ought also to be exempted. In such an event the whole matter ought to be re-considered, for we ought not to legislate for Scotland in a different spirit from that in which we legislated for England. He felt that this was the first step towards dividing the country into equal electoral districts, and he trusted the House would not make an experiment in that direction.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was one of those who gave a silent but unhesitating vote in favour of the experiment that was tried last year, and he thought it perfectly fair that they should also try the experiment proposed by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham). It was quite evident that the experiment of last year was altogether novel; it was the first time in the history of the representation of this country that such a principle had been applied; and if the present also were a novel experiment he should not shrink from trying it at a moment when they were making these great changes in the electoral system. But it was not in the same sense an experiment that the former was. When they were creating very large constituencies, amounting in Glasgow to not less than 60,000 persons, they were anxious in a spirit of fairness, whether Conservative or Liberal, that a small majority in those constituencies should not have a monopoly of the representation. But if they were to divide Glasgow into three parts it did not follow that the majority in each of the divisions would be the same as the majority of the whole, and he thought this a very fair mode of giving effect to the principle which guided the vote of last year. Last year a great objection was urged against the adoption of the principle of triangular voting and it was this. It was contended that if any Gentleman were forced to seek re-election during the existence of Parliament he would be placed in a very great difficulty in seeking again the suffrages of a triangular constituency. No such objection could, however, be urged against the present plan, and he trusted it would be accepted by the House.

Mr. JOHN HARDY said, that what was called the minority principle was last year supported on the grounds that it put an end to the monopoly of large towns; and there was no reason why a man living in one borough should have three times as many votes as a man living in another borough. The system of representation of minorities would, in his opinion, act as a check upon large constituencies, which might otherwise demand more than their fair share of Members. Manchester, for instance, had, he believed, asked no less than seven, and he did not know to what extent the claims of Birmingham had been urged; but now that this principle of the representation of minorities had been adopted there was less danger of such demands being made in future. If Glasgow wanted to try an experiment he would not divide it, but would let each man give a single vote, and then each representative would be really elected by his supporters.

Mr. LIDDELL said, they all knew that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) was a devoted adherent to American principles. ["Oh, oh!"] Gentlemen might demur to the remark; but the hon. Member had openly and manfully avowed it over and over again in that House.

Mr. BRIGHT: I beg leave to say, Sir, that there is not a syllable of truth in what the hon. Member has said. ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: I beg to call the attention of the hon. Member for Birmingham to the expression which has just fallen from him, and which I am sure he will upon consideration see is somewhat in excess of the liberty of speech that is allowed in this House.

Mr. BRIGHT: The hon. Gentleman said that I was a devoted adherent of American principles, and that I had openly avowed them. In return I say that such a charge is entirely without foundation. I have no doubt the hon. Member has made the observation under a mistake. I myself beg to assure him that he is entirely mistaken, and that there is not the least foundation for the statement he has made.

Mr. LIDDELL felt bound to accept the explanation. But whether the hon. Member for Birmingham was an admirer of American principles or not he had proved himself at least an admirer of American manners. The hon. Gentleman disliked the application of the principle under consideration to Birmingham, because he knew that the minority in that place, which had so long been kept under subjection by the iron will of the majority, was about to be emancipated. That was the true reason why he viewed the scheme with disfavour which the House solemnly established last year. It was getting too much the fashion to forget what was done last year. But the principle of the representation of minorities was adopted after one of the fullest and ablest discussions that took place last Session. He had merely risen for the purpose of putting a single question to the House. He desired to know whether there was anything specially sacred or peculiar about Glasgow, or whether it was so wholly different from other places that it should have special principles of legislation applied to it? That was the second time in the course of the week that a totally new principle of legislation was sought to be introduced with respect to Glasgow. First of all they were asked to give Glasgow four Members, and now they were asked to divide it into wards. He deprecated such a course of action. The minority plan was applied to all other towns which had three Members; and what was good for the great towns of England must be beneficial for the great towns of Scotland, and he therefore trusted that the House would abide by the system established last Session.

Mr. DISRAELI: I do not exactly understand the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the city of Oxford (Mr. Cardwell). He voted last year, he said, for the minority principle because it was an experiment, and now he says he is going to vote against the minority principle, also because it is an experiment; but the right hon. Gentleman gave some colour to the explanation of this inconsistent course on his part by his declaration that the course he takes to-night differs from that he pursued last year in consequence of the great size of the constituency of Glasgow. But the constituency of Glasgow is not greater than will be the constituencies of Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, and other places; and therefore I do not understand that this is any mitigation of the course which the right hon. Gentleman is taking. Before we divide I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the assumption running through the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), which was that this was a controversy between voting according to what is called the minority principle, and the usual plan of voting that has prevailed in this country; but that is not the case. The controversy now is between the minority principle, which the House thought fit to adopt last year, and a new scheme utterly unknown to the Constitution. If, indeed, the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) had proposed that the whole constituency should vote for three Members, that would be a fair and legitimate subject for the Committee to discuss; but the hon. Member for Glasgow has proposed to us a new scheme utterly unknown to the Constitution, and which, I think, it would be most imprudent for the House to adopt precipitately without discussion. Therefore, on the whole, I think the wisest course for us to pursue is to adhere to the Resolution at which the House arrived last year; and I, for one, shall vote that the city of Glasgow be dealt with as proposed in the clause before us.

MR. HORSMAN denied that the principle sought to be established by the hon. Member for Glasgow was unknown to the Constitution. At the time of the Reform Bill of 1832 the metropolis was divided upon the same principle as that now proposed, the only difference being that each ward in the City of London was to have two Members instead of one.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there was a still more recent precedent in the division of the borough of the Tower Hamlets last year. It was only just that the representation of a large place should be influenced by the fact that the minority was nearly equal to the majority; and therefore he voted last year for the minority clause; but all he had heard since satisfied him that the principle was extremely obnoxious to all those places to which it had been applied. The question now was, not the rescinding of the vote of last year, but the trial of an experiment in Glasgow. Liverpool objected to division, but Glasgow asked to be divided; and he was willing to try an experiment which was in accordance with the wishes of the people to be affected by it, without at all giving up the principle that, in certain cases, it was desirable the minority should have an opportunity of being represented. In many cases the division of a large borough would destroy the monotony of its representation. For these reasons he was prepared to vote with the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham).

MR. BAYLEY POTTER said, that the division of large boroughs into wards was a proposal which had been stamped with the approval of so high an authority as Mr. Cobden, who expressed favourable views of it in a letter which he wrote in 1865. He (Mr. Potter) would support the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham).

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he believed the decision come to last year was injurious, absurd, and derogatory to the dignity of the House. He would support the Amendment, although he would have preferred to have given three votes to the electors constituting the majority in Glasgow.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

to the wishes of the inhabitants of those burghs (Partick and Govan) and also to the wishes of the people of Glasgow, as evidenced by the fact that public meetings had been held, where resolutions were passed protesting against any such extension. It was quite clear that the inevitable result would be a large extension of the municipal boundaries. The county of Lanarkshire should at least have four Members. He protested in the name of these towns and of Glasgow against this measure being forced upon them.

MR. ELLICE said, he altogether objected to the extension of the borough of Glasgow. He did not want to be compelled to vote against the proposition that each elector should only have two votes. If, however, he had to vote on the whole clause he would have to vote against it.

After some further discussion,

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE withdrew his Amendment.

MR. BOUVERIE then moved as an Amendment to leave out all the words after "comprise the" to the end of the clause, for the purpose of inserting "existing Parliamentary boundaries," the object being to limit the constituency to those boundaries.

MR. DALGLISH said, that by adopting the Amendment they would withdraw the franchise from 7,300 electors—a principle which was opposed to the whole spirit of the Bill.

MR. M'LAREN said, he begged to remind the Lord Advocate that these two boroughs (Govan and Partick) were as completely constituted boroughs as was the city of Glasgow. During the Recess, a deputation of gentlemen from them came to Edinburgh to ask the Lord Advocate not to include them within the boundaries of Glasgow. These gentlemen, being in Edinburgh, asked him if he would receive them in his house, which he did. They came from the Lord Advocate's house to his, and they said there was hardly any difference of opinion in these two boroughs against being attached to Glasgow. It was not enough for this House to inquire what Glasgow wished. They ought to inquire what these two boroughs would like. When this plan might be altogether disapproved of the moment the Select Committee had reported against the extension of English large boroughs, why should they hurry on the people of Glasgow into a union with towns which repudiated it? As for giving them household suffrage,

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved to strike out all the words after "Glasgow" in the second part of the clause, which would have the effect of preventing the extension of the boundaries of Glasgow. The proposal of the Government was without any precedent in the English Bill. He protested against it, because it was opposed they did not want household suffrage on these conditions. The Lord Advocate said he was going to include some additional territory; in short, he was going to add 50,000 inhabitants to Glasgow, the population of which was already nearly 440,000. Would it not be better to make such a new district a borough, and give it a Member of its own?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that if the districts which it was proposed to unite to Glasgow were not so united, the inhabitants of those districts would not have the franchise. He therefore hoped the Committee would consent to the extension of the boundary, though he was sorry they had not been able to get another Member for Glasgow.

MR. MONCREIFF said, the proposal was one most arbitrary and most unjust, and was very repugnant to the people whom it affected; and for this plain reason, that the inclusion within the Parliamentary boundary would be the first step towards inclusion within the municipal boundary.

THE LORD ADVOCATE admitted there was some difference of opinion on this subject among the people in the districts proposed to be united to Glasgow. Some part of the municipal boundary of Glasgow was at present outside the Parliamentary boundary. This was a matter which might be settled by a Boundary Commission. As the town had increased very much since 1832, was it not reasonable that there should be a re-arrangement of boundary now, so as to include districts that ought properly to be deemed to be within the Parliamentary borough?

MR. J. STUART MILL said, Glasgow having grown to so great an extent, it was not unreasonable that its boundaries should be revised and extended, provided its representation were extended also. He apprehended that its fair proportion of Members, in reference to its population and wealth, would be not less than six. The arguments of the Government would be extremely good then; but as the vast population of Glasgow was represented by an inadequate number of Members, he could not admit that in order to admit an additional number of persons to share in that inadequate representation, a large proportion of them should be deprived of their county vote, which was really valuable to them.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he was perfectly aware that there were portions of Glasgow where the boundaries have extended, and he did not wish for a moment to stand in the way of any proposition of the Government to give a fair boundary to the burgh. That was, however, a question of principle, not of detail, to be referred to a Commission. He had no objection to refer it to a Commission, if the Commission were instructed to inquire, having reference to the municipal boundaries and the burghs.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) admitted that there were certain portions of the municipal boundaries of Glasgow that ought to be brought within the Parliamentary boundaries. With respect to those parts, the inhabitants were all unanimous in wishing to bring them within the Parliamentary limits. Now, this must be settled by the schedule, and Members by allowing the clause to pass in its present shape would not be precluded from discussing what the precise boundaries should be when the schedule was considered, while further time would thus be given for weighing the point which had been raised.

MR. BOUVERIE remarked that if his Amendment were carried, it would still be competent for the Government to move a rider extending the boundaries.

MR. BRIGHT said, he had understood from the statement of the Lord Advocate, as well as that of the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, that the Government were disposed to receive favourably the proposition made from that side of the House. With respect to the large English boroughs, they had had a Commission which reported that the same thing should be done as was now proposed to be done at Glasgow. But that Report, with regard to most of the great boroughs of England, had been entirely unsatisfactory, because the Commission paid no regard to the wishes of the people. When the Report came before that House, the House was compelled to appoint a Committee of the House to re-consider the decisions of the Commission. Of course, they knew not either when the Committee would report, or what they would report. But it was quite clear that, according to the principle the House adopted with regard to the large boroughs of England, it would be very unsatisfactory to accept at once a proposition like that which was shown to be equally unsatisfactory to all those persons within the burgh of Glasgow, and to those who were proposed to be brought within it. Let the right hon. Gentleman propose to extend the boundaries of the burgh as far as the municipal boundaries. It clearly could not be right to disregard the opinions of thousands of persons who objected to have their own municipal institutions merged in the municipal institutions of a larger and neighbouring city.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that what the hon. Member proposed was exactly what he had said. He should propose that the schedule should be filled up as far as the municipal boundaries, leaving the other question open for consideration.

MR. CRAUFURD thought as they had possession of the question they had better settle it at once.

MR. MONCREIFF suggested that the Amendment should include both the municipal and Parliamentary boundaries.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he adopted this suggestion.

Amendment proposed, in line 28, to leave out from the words "comprise the" to the end of the Clause, in order to add the words "space included within the existing Parliamentary or municipal boundaries."—(Mr. Bouverie.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 112 ; Nocs 112.

And the numbers being equal, the Chairman stated it was evident that the Committee hesitated to make the alteration proposed in the Clause contained in the Bill as it had been read a second time in the House ; considering, also, that if the Clause were maintained in its present form the Committee would have a further opportunity of discussing the question when it reached the Schedule, he felt he should best fulfil his duty by giving his vote with the Ayes.

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed a proviso—

"That at a contested Election for Glasgow no person shall vote for more than two candidates."

MR. BAXTER rose to protest against this proceeding on the part of the Government. Clause 6 was postponed with a general understanding that this question should be discussed with the postponed clause, and brought up in due course on Monday night.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the question had been raised by hon. Gentlemen opposite, the whole discussion having turned on the question whether the proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Graham) should be adopted, or whether the principle of representing minorities should, as the Government proposed, be carried out. It clearly could not be said that the matter had been raised without notice, since the other side of the House had distinctly raised it. He could see no reason for reserving a question which had been decided by so large a majority.

SIR GEORGE GREY thought more time should be given for the consideration of the question.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that although the division of the city into three wards had been negatived, it might be proposed to give two Members to that part of Glasgow on the north side of the Clyde, and one Member to that on the south. It was only fair that time should be given for fully considering the matter.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, rather than delay the progress of the Bill, would consent to defer the question, though he believed the feeling of the Committee would be as strong upon it on a future stage as it was now.

Proviso, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10 (New District of Burghs to return One Member).

MR. YORKE moved, that the clause be postponed.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY stated that the Government were willing to postpone this and the following clauses until it had been decided what course should be taken with the counties.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he was going to propose an Amendment on that clause, of which he had given Notice. He wished to raise the question as to whether the two counties should not be united.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY suggested that the best course to adopt would be to allow his right hon. Friend (The Lord Advocate) to move that the county of Selkirk cease to return one Member, and that the county of Peebles cease also to return one Member, and that the two be united and jointly return one Member, and then any discussion could be taken on the matter.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he was quite willing to accede to the suggestion which had just been made by the Home Secretary.

“ Motion, “ That the Clause be postponed,” by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE then moved, in page 3, line 30, after “ burghs,” to insert—

“ And Towns of Hawick, Galashiels, and Selkirk, specified in Schedule (B.) hereto annexed, shall be constituted into a District of Burghs, and such District shall return one Member to serve in Parliament.”

MR. MONCREIFF said, as far as his own feeling went in the matter, he was entirely against the proposed course of action, and he thought that was the general impression of the Scotch Members. If counties were to be doubled up in that way—he did not say that Selkirk and Peebles did not form a very strong case for the application of the principle; but, on the other hand, he said that it was a course which he did not think ought to be followed. If they once adopted that system, there was no knowing where it was to stop. However, he admitted that in the discussion of that Bill it was not desirable to have too many contests; and he should not carry his opposition further than the remarks which he had made, though he could not refrain from expressing the strong opinion which he held against the advisability of adopting the proposed system.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, he was very glad the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Moncreiff) did not propose to carry his opposition further than the remarks which he had just made, and he (Sir James Fergusson) must say that he thought the proposition deserved a more generous reception at his hands. He ventured to think that there was a great principle involved, and that principle was one which ought to commend itself to hon. Members. The towns in their schedule were rising towns—not very large, perhaps, from an English point of view, but still large for Scotland; and in proposing that Selkirk should cease to return one Member, they only proposed its disfranchisement for a special purpose—namely, to unite it with Peebles. He did not think that, under the circumstances, the Committee ought to consider the proposition of the Government anything but a liberal one, and he was surprised that it had been received in the manner it had by the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh.

MR. LAING said, he must also express his surprise at the observations that had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Moncreiff), and that he should be opposed to this proposition. He (Mr. Laing) thought the Scotch Members ought to look to the opinions of their constituencies. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that this proposition was against the opinion of the Scotch representatives. Now, he must say that assertion was entirely contrary to the fact; because the opinion of the Scotch Members was strongly in favour of the scheme originally proposed by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), in which several large constituencies would have obtained additional representation. Not being able to carry out that—because they have only succeeded in getting seven, instead of ten Members—the question now comes, whether, by uniting those very small counties in Scotland, which were obviously below the standard of county representation in England and Wales, they could get additional Members to supplement the inadequate representation at present existing in some parts of Scotland. A Conservative Government—he must do them the justice of saying—had made a step in that direction, and they had volunteered and offered what was really a Liberal measure, and then opposition was made by the Law Adviser of the late Liberal Government to any more progress being made in that direction. Of the two counties in question one had a population of 10,444 and the other of 11,408. They would in future be represented by one Member, and that would enable the Committee to give one Member to Perthshire, with a population of 100,000, or to the city of Aberdeen, with a population of 90,000, and which would have 7,000 voters under the new Bill.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE, referring to a statement that no such thing as a union of counties existed in Scotland, reminded the Committee that he represented the counties of Nairn and Elgin. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Moncreiff) talked about the Scotch Members having objected to this proposition, he forgot to say that some of the Scotch Members had never heard of some of the meetings which had been held until after they were over.

MR. M'LAREN said, the assertion of his right hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Moncreiff), that the Scotch Members were not favourable to this proposal required to be explained a little, because it was apt to convey an erroneous impression. The Motion for uniting those two counties was put upon the Paper by himself a month ago, and at the meetings of the Scotch Members which had been held, he was not aware that any Member objected to it. One hon. Gentleman certainly did ask him if he was going to persist in it, and he said he was. This was all that occurred. On the merits of the question, therefore, he thought that the hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson) had a right to appeal to this side of the House. There were towns in that district which had increased in an extraordinary degree; the three burghs would have 25,000 inhabitants, and he did not think there were 25,000 more industrious, active, or energetic people anywhere. Only to-day he had a letter from a gentleman, expressing the pleasure universally felt at the fact that the Government had agreed to the proposition.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had said that this was not a question of nationality, and that Scotland was only the name of that portion of Her Majesty's dominions north of the river Tweed; and further, that if a place was worthy of representation it ought to have it. In both of those opinions he coincided, and wished them to be applied to England; for it was well known that some of the enfranchised counties of Scotland were not so numerous and wealthy as some in England which had no representation at all.

MR. AYTOUN begged simply to say that he was exceedingly surprised to hear the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Moncreiff) declare that the Scotch Members as a body agreed with him in feeling a dislike to the system of uniting counties, as proposed. He was in favour of that principle when it could be done without straining, because he desired to adopt any means which would diminish the undue influence of very large landowners, and he was delighted to see any measure proposed or carried which would effect that object. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman makes the remark which he has done, he was bound to tell him that he did not think he had taken the trouble to ascertain the opinion of the Scotch Members to whom he alluded.

MR. G. YOUNG reminded the Committee that the only question before it was that the counties of Peebles and Selkirk should be united, and as that proposal was not opposed it was only a waste of time to continue the present discussion.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, as representative of one of the counties (Selkirk) that was to be amalgamated, he could state that if his constituents were to make the sacrifice required of them, it could be only upon the understanding that the seat should be disposed of within the district. He could speak as to the energy, industry, and intelligence of the inhabitants of these towns. He had represented in Selkirkshire a manufacturing rather than an agricultural constituency, and he could speak to the importance of the great woollen manufactures in which they were engaged. He thought the Government deserved credit for this proposition, and he hoped the inhabitants of the towns when they got their Member would remember it was due to the Government, and not to hon. Gentlemen opposite.

Clause agreed to.

MR. CRAUFURD wished to move the insertion, after the words which had just been adopted, of the words—

“And the City of Aberdeen shall return two Members to serve in Parliament.”

His object was to give the additional Member obtained by uniting the counties of Peebles and Selkirk to the city of Aberdeen, instead of to the group of small boroughs—namely, Galashiels, Selkirk, and Hawick—which the Lord Advocate proposed to constitute. The proposal of the learned Lord would destroy the whole effect of the Amendment to which the Committee had just agreed, because, having amalgamated the counties of Peebles and Selkirk on account of the smallness of their population, it was now proposed to cut them down again by taking out the towns in order to form them into a group. He therefore proposed, instead of creating such a group, returning one Member, to give the Member thus gained to the city of Aberdeen.

COLONEL SYKES seconded the proposition.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he was surprised that the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) should have made this proposal to the Committee. The intention of the Government in uniting the counties of Peebles and Selkirk was to provide a Member for a set of populous and rising places in the South of Scotland. The county of Peebles, which he represented, had no objection to sacrificing a Member in order to provide representation for these populous places; but it was absurd to think that they would be willing to make that sacrifice for the purpose of giving another Member to the city of Aberdeen.

COLONEL SYKES congratulated the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government on his recognition of the principle that representation, population, and contribution to the public Revenue ought to bear some relation to one another. The admission of the principle in the present instance established the claims of Aberdeen to an additional Member, remarkable as that city was for its progress, industry, accumulation of wealth, and the intellectual character of the majority of its inhabitants. The question the Committee had to determine was, whether or not they would give the liberated Member to Aberdeen. That city had at present 4,236 electors, and when the Scotch Reform Bill was passed the number would be closely approximate to 9,000. According to the official Returns of the Town Council, it had a population of about 90,000. The trade of the city had received a great impulse. Manufacturing industry was flourishing, and the character of its shipbuilding was known all over the world. The valuation of the city had risen from £193,000 in 1860, to £257,000 in 1867-8, an increase of 23 per cent. Its harbour, which was one of the largest in the Kingdom, of thirty acres in extent, having cost £250,000 would be rendered more convenient to the mercantile world—a Bill having passed through the House enabling the energetic people of Aberdeen to alter the course of the river Dee, and to improve the harbour, at a cost of £238,000, and when completed it would form a harbour of refuge for the east coast of Scotland. These were not small claims upon the consideration of the House and the country. Then the paper manufactories and granite works of Aberdeen should be remembered; and in referring to the latter he felt no remark was necessary on his part to justify their high character, since most great ornamental works in Great Britain testified to the tribute paid to the Aberdeen granite manufacturers. Since 1861 the city had built 620 houses, accommodating 2,000 families. Its commercial and intellectual activity was evidenced by the fact that last year the number of letters delivered amounted to 4,090,000. There were numerous other instances which he could cite to establish the claim of Aberdeen to a second Member, but he did not think it was necessary to enter into minute details beyond what he had already stated. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and ask him whether, after having had these claims brought under his consideration, he was to place Aberdeen, with its flourishing industries, its great intellectual status, in the same category as the three burghs he had abstracted from Scotland, and which were left to what?—to flourish in Scotland? no, but to rot in England? Was Aberdeen to be left in the same category with these? He could not think it possible; and he felt assured that after the sense of right shown by the right hon. Gentleman he would by hook or crook give another Member to Aberdeen.

MR. MILLER considered that Leith had stronger claims to another Member than Aberdeen; for although the population was not so large, the electors in proportion to the population were more than at Aberdeen; and further, Leith contributed more to the Revenue than any place on the East coast excepting Hull. He had placed an Amendment on the Paper, to the effect that Musselburgh and Portobello be joined to Dalkeith and Lasswade, in forming a group of boroughs to send a Member to the House.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE expressed his surprise that the Government had not recognized the importance of places near the Clyde and erected them into a borough. They were places of the highest importance; and if they were not formed into an independent borough they would prefer remaining in the county.

MR. BAXTER said, that this country should be treated as a united Empire, as far as England, Scotland, and Ireland were concerned; and where constituencies were found too small for representation, the House should not necessarily look to the immediate neighbourhood. Therefore, in his opinion there was no force in the argument that because Selkirk and Peebles were too small to return one Member each room should be found for the second Member in a burgh. He represented a larger bistrict than Leith, and his constituents had used pressure upon him to get a second Member; but he had steadily refused, and for this reason—that he believed they were not entitled to a second Member. He thought if they were to act on the principle of taking one Member here, and putting another there, they would find themselves by-and-by in a position of considerable difficulty. To his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Sykes) he would say, “Have patience.” Glasgow, with a population of nearly 500,000 of inhabitants, and with an extension of its Parliamentary and municipal boundary, had three Members; and he was perfectly satisfied that before two or three years had passed over it would have fair representation in the House. He was told that this matter was “squared” and arranged already. He appealed to the present House of Commons and to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), and he was confident that, as they had left the burgh untouched, and left Glasgow, with its population of upwards of 400,000, untouched, their successors would take up the question in a different spirit, and that in future years Scotland would have a fair representation in the Commons House of Parliament.

MR. LAING said, the representation of seats in Scotland should not be settled upon mere questions of local jealousies and prejudices, nor yet be the subject of arrangement out of doors between hon. and learned Members on either side of the House. He thought they ought to look at the matter broadly, and do what the public opinion of Scotland expected them to do. They might do themselves infinitely more harm by securing this matter than by acting on intelligible principles; and the principle they contended for was, that the same system of representation which existed south of the Tweed should be extended northward. The claims of Aberdeen were, in his opinion, peculiarly strong. It was not a mere ordinary burgh town. It had been for many centuries the provincial capital of a large and important district of Scotland. It was the centre of intellectual life and education, and as a commercial place, its position was one of great importance. The population was between 80,000 and 90,000. It would have a constituency under the new Reform Bill of between 8,000 and 9,000 electors, belonging to a class than which, in his opinion, none more intelligent or independent could be found anywhere. He ventured to say that the people of Scotland would look upon this settlement as a job. Great misfortune would attend it, because it would undoubtedly lead to the re-opening of this question under the new Parliament. He confessed he was a very moderate Liberal, and in the exertions he made last year for a better re-distribution in England, he did so very much on the ground that he wished for a settlement which would stand for a long term of years. He was therefore disappointed that in the case of Scotland it was proposed to act on principles that would necessitate the opening of this question at an early date. He should vote on the earliest opportunity for giving a second Member to Aberdeen.

MR. GRANT DUFF supported the claim of Aberdeen to increased representation. If that claim were not now allowed the question would speedily have to be re-opened.

MR. PIM thought Aberdeen was fully entitled to another Member, and if she had been placed south of the Tweed she would have got it long ago. Edinburgh, as the capital of Scotland, deserved a third Member, and Glasgow also ought to have a Member more than she had yet obtained.

MR. KARSLAKE expressed a hope that the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim) would point out some places in Ireland from which Members might be transferred to Aberdeen and Edinburgh.

COLONEL FRENCH recommended the union of Scotch counties where the constituency numbered only 180 in order to provide additional Members for Edinburgh and Aberdeen.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE thought Scotland should be treated in the same way as England. Aberdeen had a right to another Member. The three seats obtained from England and still left undisposed of should be kept in reserve to meet other wants that might arise. He was inclined to deprive some small Irish boroughs of their representation.

MR. M'LAREN questioned the correctness of the figures which had been put before the Committee by the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes), and stated that according to the Census recently taken by the local authorities, Hawick had 11,000 inhabitants, Galashiels about 10,000, and Selkirk 4,000.

MR. LAMONT said, he felt that upon this subject he ought not to return a silent vote. Should the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Craufurd) press his Motion to a division, he should certainly follow him to the Lobby, and whatever might be the result, he hoped that the Government would not ignore the claims of the large and important city of Aberdeen. He wished also to say, as a Liberal Member, that he thanked the Government for having sacrificed some Members by the union of those two counties.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he was very much satisfied with the discussion raised upon the Amendment which he proposed, and he could not hesitate to say that he felt the force of the arguments put by his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes). He perhaps had not raised his Amendment in the manner most advantageous to Aberdeen, and he thought it would not be desirable in a matter of this kind to detain the Committee by a division. But he thought he gathered the feeling of the Committee as being that the claims of Aberdeen to an additional Member were fully sustained and endorsed. His feeling was that it would not be fair to remove the Member who was liberated in the south-east of Scotland as far away as Aberdeen. As there was another Motion about to be made presently, either by his hon. Friend or himself, for liberating another Member, he thought he should consult the interests of Aberdeen better by withdrawing the present Motion.

THE LORD ADVOCATE then proposed to insert after the words "burghs and towns" the words "Hawick, Galashiels, and Selkirk."

MR. CRAUFURD said, the decision of the Committee had been taken as to joining the counties of Peebles and Selkirk, and a further proposal was now made to take out of those counties a very large population. He wanted to know if he was to understand that the Committee were agreed to go back from their previous decision, and content that the remnant of the county of Selkirk should be added to the county of Peebles, for that was what it really amounted to? They had decided that the whole of the county of Peebles and the whole of the county of Selkirk should be added together. Now, it was proposed to take out of the county of Selkirk a population of between 6,000 and 7,000; so that when they were joined together they would only have a joint population of barely 15,000. He did not think that the proposal now before them was one which could be entertained. If it were true that some arrangement had been come to out of the House, that this thing had to be assented to in order to save a similar grouping taking place in another part of Scotland, he should be most unwill-ling to give credit to it. He should, however, be able to ascertain the truth presently, when the Motion was made for grouping two other counties of Scotland. It was a matter which ought to be resisted altogether, and he thought that the subject was one which ought not to be settled without some discussion.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BOUVERIE asked how the boundaries were to be settled?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that Selkirk was a Royal borough, and that Galashiels and Hawick had boundaries constituted under the General Police Act of Scotland, and they would not be disturbed unless there should be a Boundary Commission.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 11 (Towns added to certain Districts of Burghs).

MR. LAING thought that the decision which the Committee had come to with regard to Selkirkshire and Peeblesshire virtually decided the question in respect to Sutherlandshire, for the Committee had decided that the two former counties were not large enough to return a representative each. The county of Sutherland had only 180 electors, and the new constituency would only increase that number by 118, so that Sutherlandshire would only have 300 voters under the new Reform Bill. If two counties which had each constituencies of 700 were not worthy of a single representative each, then a county having only 180 electors, and which under the Reform Bill would not have 300 voters, ought not to continue to send a single Member to Parliament. He always wished to avoid touching upon personal questions; but it seemed to him that there were circumstances which were of much public notoriety, and it would be quite impossible to shut their eyes to them. The county of Sutherland happened, with the exception of one small estate, to belong entirely to one single proprietor. Of course, it was impossible for the people of Scotland or of England, in weighing a question of this sort, to shut their eyes to such a fact. The principle extensively acted upon in England in disfranchising "pocket" boroughs was that, when a borough was clearly under the influence of one individual, it ought not to have one share in the representation possessed by an ordinary constituency. He did not say the same principle should not be applied to "rotten" counties as well as to "rotten" boroughs. The Committee, in considering the re-distribution of seats, could not come to the conclusion that it was fair that a great centre of intelligence and commerce like Aberdeen should not receive a second Member, while a miserable county like Sutherlandshire should be left to return a representative to Parliament. The only question which could arise was as to the county with which it should be united—whether with Ross and Cromarty to the south, or with Caithness to the north; and, in deciding that question, it would be proper to consider the amount of population and constituency, the similarity of circumstances, and the convenience of intercommunication. The circumstances of Sutherland and Caithness were totally dissimilar, while those of Sutherland and Ross were entirely identical. The new constituency of Caithness would be 1,277, that of Ross and Cromarty 1,162. Ross-shire was a Highland county, inhabited, like Sutherland, by a Gaelic population; Caithness, with the exception of one parish, had a purely Lowland population, consisting of small owners and occupiers, who, either as fish curers or owners of a herring boat, or a share in one, formed as intelligent and independent a constituency as they could wish for. The county of Caithness represented a branch of industry which was most important to a maritime country like this. It was said that the city of Amsterdam was built upon herring bones, and the same might be said of the county of Caithness. It contained a hardy population bred to the sea, which, in case of exigency, would be of great service to this country. He thought, therefore, they had a claim to separate representation. With regard to the question of proximity, they ought to look, not to mere geographical distance, but to facility of communication. Now, it so happened that the bulk of the population of Sutherland lay on the east coast; that the county town was within sight of Tain, in Ross-shire; both were connected by railway, and could communicate with one another in the course of a single day. On the other hand, Sutherland was cut off from Caithness by a great range of mountains, and it might be long before a railway was carried so far north. In the meantime, there was practically next to no communication between the two. That Sutherland with its 180 electors should return a Member was a rank job which stunk in the nostrils of the people of Scotland. On the other hand, the claims of Aberdeen or Perthshire were exceedingly strong. He begged to move that the county of Sutherland be added to the adjoining county of Ross and Cromarty, for the purpose of returning jointly one Member to serve in all future Parliaments.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

"The county of Sutherland shall be added to the adjoining county of Ross and Cromarty for the purpose of returning jointly one Member to serve in all future Parliaments."—(Mr. Laing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

LORD RONALD LEVESON-GOWER said, that he did not mean to take up the time of the Committee with his own personal affairs, but the attack which had been made on his county required refutation. It was not correct to say that there was any difficulty about the communications, which were good throughout the county, and therefore he saw no reason why it should be treated so badly as was proposed by the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing). His own county (Sutherland) had got a population of 25,793, which was larger than the population of two English counties—Rutlandshire and Radnorshire—the former of which had a population of 21,861, and the latter 18,305. He believed the way in which the counties had been attacked lately was owing entirely to the borough interest. He did not think the boroughs had got so much to say for themselves. He had got a list of half a dozen of them, all of which had a smaller population than that of Sutherland. The Dumfries burghs had a population only of 22,996; the Inverness burghs of 20,380; Kirkcaldy, 23,476; St. Andrews, 16,777; Wigton, 10,385; and Wick only 16,995. Then there were three boroughs in England which were to retain their representatives, and which had populations under 5,000—namely, Evesham, with 4,680 inhabitants; Marlborough, with 4,893; and Northallerton, with 4,755. He thought it quite unfair to swamp the landed interest in Scotland, as was evidently the design of those Gentlemen who had brought forward this Motion. It should never be said of him, however, that he was willing—

"To throw away the dearest thing he owned
As 't were a careless trifle."

2 K

MR. CRAUFURD said, he hoped that the Committee, having amalgamated the two counties of Peebles and Selkirk, the joint constituency of which would be over 1,100, would apply the same principle to Sutherland. Whether it should be united with Ross or Caithness was for the decision of the Committee.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, that if the Committee had the slightest regard to its own consistency it could not refuse to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs (Mr. Laing). The noble Lord the Member for Sutherland (Lord Ronald Leveson-Gower) had been voting with all his might for the disfranchisement of a number of English boroughs, not one of which had not a much larger number of electors than the county which he represented. To unite Sutherlandshire with the constituency of Ross and Cromarty would be a great mistake. These questions must be decided, as those of the English boroughs had been, according to population; and the population of the counties of Ross and Cromarty was larger than that of Caithness and Sutherlandshire together; while the two latter counties were, he believed, under one sheriff, one set of Customs' officers, and one police organization, and were, in fact, virtually united. All they wanted was to have a representation in common, and that he wished would be the decision of the Committee.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he thought the case against Sutherlandshire was not quite so clear as the hon. Members for Wick and Ayr (Mr. Laing and Mr. Craufurd) seemed to think. There was a large tract of country, consisting chiefly of sheep farms, and thinly populated, but with a considerable population of small householders on the coast. It was all very well to talk of the number of electors, but population had guided the House hitherto; and this enormous tract of country had a population of 25,000, larger than that of the county of Bute or than that of the county of Rutland, which returned two Members, or the proposed united counties of Peebles and Selkirk. He knew it was said the whole tract belonged to one proprietor, who held, as it were, the seat in his pocket, and could return what Member he pleased; and that he argued was not a desirable state of things. But this was an accident which did not exist twenty-five or thirty years ago, and which might not exist that time hence; and Scotch tenant-farmers were capable of taking political questions into their own hands, and rebelling against their landlords, as they did at the last election for Aberdernshire, while there were some who wished to protect the independence of tenants by means of the ballot. Was this body of tenantry to be deprived of the privilege of returning a Member because the land happened to be in the hands of one proprietor? There were English boroughs in the same position; he knew one in the West of England where the great landowners had returned a Member ever since the passing of the Reform Act, and yet no question had been raised about it. He was not satisfied they would be doing right to act upon the notion that because a county belonged to one proprietor it ought to be disfranchised. In this case he believed the population to be entitled to independent representation.

MAJOR CUMMING-BRUCE said, he objected to the proposed amalgamation of Sutherlandshire with Ross and Cromarty instead of Caithness, seeing that Caithness and Sutherlandshire were contiguous and connected by railway as well as in local administration; and he objected to the virtual disfranchisement of Sutherlandshire, whose people distinguished themselves in the last war, and who were entitled to all the more consideration because of their distance and separation from the seat of Government. When the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was referred to as having defended small constituencies, he said he did not defend them, but nomination boroughs. This was the case of a nomination county, and therefore the right hon. Gentleman must consistently oppose its absorption in a larger constituency, which it was proposed should embrace not two but three counties—Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherlandshire. Ross and Cromarty had a population of 81,000, which was larger than the united populations of Sutherlandshire and Caithness, and the property Returns also gave Ross and Cromarty a pre-eminence.

MR. HORSMAN said, he wished to remind the Committee that there were on the Paper twenty pages of Amendments. They were on the eve of the Whitsuntide holydays, and if the Committee did not get through the Bill to-night a new crop of Amendments would turn up, and nobody knew when they would get through the Bill. The only way they could do that would be by the Government propounding, or by there being propounded from some other quarter, a basis on which they might the Prime Minister to a Question in the all agree. He thought that the Answer of early part of the evening gave them a fair prospect that the Bill would be advanced rapidly through the Committee. All the Scotch Members must have felt that the right hon. Gentleman tried to meet them in a fair and conciliatory spirit, which was reciprocated on that (the Opposition) side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman, in answer to a question put to him, said, he was prepared to adhere to the scheme propounded by him at a late hour on the last evening they had this question before them, a few minutes before a division, when there was really no time to consider the question at all. When the right hon. Gentleman said he intended to adhere to that plan, they all thought it was a well-considered scheme of the Government; and on that understanding the Opposition assented to the plan of the Government. Now, of these Amendments, there was hardly one in favour of which a good deal might not be said, and if one were carried there was no telling how far the Committee might not have to go. The hon. Member (Mr. Laing) rested his case entirely on the number of electors; but what you wanted to know was the amount of population and the interests to be represented; you must take the population as a basis of representation, not the mere number on the electoral roll. Sutherland had a greater population than that of some English counties; it was greater than Rutland, which had two Members, while Sutherland only had one. By raising such questions you opened a wide door to further discussion, and no one could tell when the labours of the Committee would close. The Government had agreed that seven Members should be given to Scotland. He thought that Scotland was entitled to ten; but, in return for the concessions which had been made by the Opposition, the Government ought to stand by their scheme.

MR. DISRAELI: The scheme of the Government was one framed with a due regard to the interests and the wishes of both sides of the House; and, on the whole, I am of opinion that, under the circumstances, it was calculated fairly and reasonably to satisfy those interests and wishes. I think it of great importance that we should close the Committee, if possible, on this stage of the Bill to-night. We know well, from our experience of last year, that on such a subject as the re-distribution of representation and the re-adjustment of our electoral system there is no end to the Amendments which may be proposed, all of which you can prove by statistics to be the most just which can possibly be brought forward. The proposition submitted by the Government was made with as much regard to the interests and wishes of those sitting opposite as of Members on this side of the House, and it was made with the hope of bringing the question to a settlement. I am not therefore prepared to support any further alteration in this clause. I understood that there was, not a secret compact, but an understanding in favour of a scheme which would bring the discussion of the present Bill to a close to-night, and I must therefore resist any proposition made from either side of the House in favour of further changes. At the same time, without reference to any such understanding as I have mentioned, but upon the abstract merits of the question, I should certainly oppose this proposal to disfranchise Sutherland. It is an extensive tract of country; the population is very considerable—as considerable as that of some counties in England represented by a larger number of Members—and I should be opposing that interest which I have always for the sake of our constitutional liberty endeavoured to uphold in this House—namely, the real representation of the landed interest—if upon a Motion of this kind I agreed to disfranchise Sutherland. The Bill has been fairly considered, and after some difference of opinion it has been generally, if not unanimously, adopted by the House; and for my part I am not prepared to countenance any further alterations in it.

MR. GLADSTONE: I need hardly say that there is no understanding between me and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government other than that which may have been arrived at across this table; but I am bound to say that I think the language of the right hon. Gentleman on the present occasion is the language of good sense. The question of opening up the representation of the county of Sutherland is nothing but the first of a long list of questions, and if you concede to the plausible motives which have been urged and adopt this Motion you will bitterly repent it before you come to the end of your labours. My hon. Friend the Member for the county of Inverness (Mr. H. Baillie) said that if the Committee has any regard to consistency it must adopt this Motion. Now, I dispute the proposition altogether, in spite of the high and almost overwhelming authority of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee). It requires great audacity to offer the smallest doubt, or qualification, or exception to anything which falls from the hon. and learned Gentleman, either by way of speech or cheers; but on this particular occasion I must take the liberty of differing from him. Now, let us see how we stand with regard to this question. We on this side of the House were firmly persuaded that Scotland had a good claim to ten additional seats, and also that these ten additional seats might most conveniently and properly be obtained by drawing a line, which happened to coincide with the population, at the figure of 5,000. The House, however, was pleased to give a vote the other night which implied, though it did not directly affirm, that only seven additional seats were to be given to Scotland. Now, if we are to enter upon a consideration of conflicting claims in Scotland, as they are likely to be advanced by Gentlemen who are strongly impressed with the merits of their own individual schemes, one effect will be that we shall be compelled to re-open what I, for one, have no anxiety to re-open—namely, the question of English seats, with a view to the fuller satisfaction of the claims of Scotland, and thereby to begin again at the beginning after we have so nearly got to the end. I must protest entirely against the doctrine of my hon. Friend as regards the consistency of the House. How is it consistent after giving a Member to two counties with a population of some 22,000 we should take away one from a county containing a population of 25,000? He says there are more voters, but how is the electoral roll made up in the counties of Selkirk and Peebles? What number of the electors in Selkirk and Peebles does he think have a bond fide interest and tenure in the soil and real property in those two counties? But I think my hon. Friend is wrong in his fundamental proposition. And first as to the question of property. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) was not accurate in what he said as to the whole county of Sutherland belonging to one individual, with the exception of the small estate. I am aware that the Duke of Sutherland has an overwhelming share in the property of the county; but I believe that about one-fifth of the county is in other hands. ["No!"] Well, one estate which did not belong to the Duke of Sutherland was sold the other day for £130,000. Now, the question to be considered is, whether it is expedient and convenient for the House, in determining the distribution of representation, to inquire what proprietors are possessed of large properties in the different counties and boroughs; for if that is to begin in Scotland it cannot stop there. There may be some hon. Members who are conscious that there exist divisions of counties which are not altogether different in this respect from the county of Sutherland, and there are certainly boroughs which must be disfranchised if the county of Sutherland is, on the ground of the great bulk of the tenantry belonging to one individual, to be disfranchised. [An hon. MEMBER: Not disfranchised.] Yes, as much as Thetford is disfranchised. Every man in Sutherland having a county qualification will be represented in another county, and consequently Sutherland will be disfranchised as a county. ["No, no!"] If Sutherland is to undergo that operation, call it by what name you like, on the ground of its belonging to one particular person, an inquiry will have to be instituted in other cases, and while I do not assert that there may not be plausible reason for instituting such inquiry, I maintain that, on the whole, the inconveniences attendant thereupon would be much greater than the benefits to be derived from it. But my hon. Friend (Mr. Laing) takes the number of electors in Sutherland; but if we were to propose to increase that number by lowering the county franchise, my hon. Friend would meet the proposal with stern opposition. I confess for my own part I think it has pleased the House to establish such a discrepancy between the borough and county occupation franchise in this island as is not likely to be very endurable; but, independently of that, I must say that the principle of our representation is founded on the basis of population. This doctrine of disfranchising on account of there being only a certain number of electors is a totally novel doctrine. It overlooks the fact that our movements in regard to the franchise are movements forward. Do not suppose that there is not in the county of Sutherland a most intelligent population, for I will venture to say that in the whole of this island there exists not a more intelligent population connected with the labouring and industrial interests than the population of the county of Sutherland, particularly on its eastern coast. If, then, you are prepared to found your representation on any other ground than that of population, you must re-consider all you have done. We disfranchised certain boroughs the other day because they had less than 5,000 population; but if we had taken the number of electors the results would have been totally different, and some boroughs which now retain their Members would have been included in the list if we had proceeded on the principle that the number of electors ought to be the test according to which representation is to be distributed. Then, it is only fair to remark that this population of the county of Sutherland is almost entirely without borough representation, for there is only one small borough, which is, in point of fact, a village with a purely agricultural population. Now, if you are prepared to say that a seat should be withdrawn from a community of 25,000 persons in order to satisfy your notions of equality, you will be laying down a principle of which you ought to measure well the consequences and results before you adopt it by implication by agreeing to a Motion of this character. Whether you are satisfied or not with the proposal of the Government, I believe the wise course to take if you mean to go forward with the Bill will be to adopt their proposals as far as re-casting the distribution is concerned and to reject the Motion of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Laing).

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING-MAXWELL said, it appeared to him that a Reform Bill, whether for England or Scotland, must necessarily be a thing of surprises. At the commencement of the evening he was very much surprised to hear his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Moncreiff) protesting against the creation of a popular constituency in the South of Scotland. The right hon. Member made that protest in a few faltering sentences, and his speech then came to an end with a suddenness very unusual with his right hon. and eloquent Friend. Later in the debate he found the two counties of Selkirk and Peebles, with an electorate of over 1,000 and a population of 22,000, joined together without the Committee going to a division on the subject. Soon afterwards, he was surprised to find his right hon. Friend at the head of Her Majesty's Government, which proposed this extinction of one county constituency, defending from a similar fate another county constituency, with an electorate of only 180. He was yet more astonished, however, to hear the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) describe the language of the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister as the language of good sense. This was certainly the most surprising of all these occurrences. Then the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Sutherlandshire (Lord Ronald Leveson-Gower), who had made so spirited and agreeable a defence of his county, was also to some extent a surprise. Those who had the honour of sitting in that House at the time when the noble Duke who had been so frequently alluded to was a Member of it, must have perceived that the invariable tendency of the noble Duke's votes and action was towards the achievement of what had now been actually achieved—namely, a Reform Bill with considerable disfranchisement. Seven seats had been taken from England in order to supply the wants of Scotland. In spite of the ingenious arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and his—he would not say menaces, but his solemn warnings to both sides of the House to mind what they were doing, it appeared to him a perfectly monstrous thing that this anomalous county constituency should be allowed to continue its existence. He (Sir William Stirling-Maxwell) should have thought that, so far from the representative of the county of Sutherland objecting to the Motion before the House, he would have been the first person to propose it; having himself always been disposed to sympathize with the noble Duke in what he conceived must have been his feeling of disappointment that he had never been able to obtain in any Liberal Reform Bill the disfranchisement of the county of Sutherland. In making the suggestion that the county of Sutherland should be united to the county of Ross and Cromarty, he had been deferring to the local knowledge of the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing). However, after what he had heard on the subject in the course of this discussion, he confessed that his own judgment in the matter had been premature; and he should vote for the Amendment of which his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Elgin (Major Cumming-Bruce) had given Notice—to unite Sutherland, not with Ross, but with Caithness.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE, in reference to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, begged to say he had yet to learn that an independent Member below the Gangway was not entitled to express his opinion, as well as hon. Gentlemen who sat on the Treasury Benches. He certainly, upon most points, had an opinion of his own, and that generally a decided one, and if that required any apology, he found it in his having been so long an humble follower of the right hon. Gentleman. Though one Scotch Member, without any acknowledgment had stolen half his plan, and another the other half, he was the first Member to propose in that House the disfranchisement of the small English boroughs—

"Hos ego verniculos feci, tulit alter honores."

But he did not want applause. He got, by the kindness of the House, too much of it. He felt that he should not be acting consistently with his own principles if he did not vote for uniting Sutherlandshire with some other county. A pocket-borough was bad enough, but a pocket-county was very much worse. He hoped the right hon. Member for South Lancashire would allow him to remind him without another lecture, that to unite Sutherlandshire with another county would not be to disfranchise it. Not a single freeholder would be disfranchised by that operation; but each of the 182 voters in the county of Sutherland would only have that power of voting to which he was entitled.

LORD ELCHO observed, that some hon. Gentlemen seemed to suppose that with reference to the proposition now before the Committee, there had been an understanding between the two front Benches. Whether that were so or not, the duty of independent Members was to take what appeared to them to be the right course in the matter. As a rule, he did not think it was a judicious proceeding to disregard time-honoured divisions of the country; for by so doing they would drive men who did not wish to see the whole country governed by the towns to adopt the principle of electoral districts. It appeared, however, that the system of joining counties had been established in 1832, and it had been again acted on in an early period of this evening. If the principle of grouping was sound in the case of Peebleshire and Selkirkshire, it was equally sound with regard to Sutherlandshire and Rossshire and Cromartyshire. He was opposed to any such junction; but if this were determined on, he would rather see Sutherland joined to Caithnessshire. In former times very intimate relations had existed between these two counties. There was still an old leafless tree pointed out in the former county, whereon the Earls of Sutherland were accustomed periodically to hang the Earls of Caithness.

LORD HENRY SCOTT was understood to protest against the counties of Selkirk and Peebles being spoken of in a depreciating manner.

MR. M'LAREN said, that at the time of the Union six counties were joined in pairs; and in 1832 six were dealt with in the same way, only that under the junction arrangement made at the time of the Union each of the two counties joined together returned a Member to Parliament alternately; while by the Reform Act of 1832 the counties then united in pairs always returned one Member jointly for each pair. It was ridiculous to talk of the great importance of Sutherland when the number of sheep and deer there as compared with the number of men was mainly what was taken into consideration.

Amendment made to the proposed Amendment, by leaving out the words "Ross and Cromarty," and inserting the word "Caithness."—(Major Cumming Bruce.)

Question put, "That the words of the proposed Amendment, as amended, be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 103; Noes 195: Majority 92.

MR. H. BAILLIE rose to propose an Amendment, the object of which, he said, like that which had just been negatived, was to show that to a certain extent Scotland was able to help herself. The district of burghs which he proposed to disfranchise contained a number of electors very little larger than that of some of the English pocket-boroughs which were about to be disfranchised for the benefit of Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) had argued that population was the proper test; but he maintained that the number of electors was the proper criterion, since it involved property as well as numbers. The Wigton district consisted of four towns, if they could be dignified by that name, or rather of one town, Stranraer, with 6,500 inhabitants, and three villages—namely, New Galloway, with 450 inhabitants; Whithorn, with 1,623; and Wigton, with 2,100. The number of electors was less than 500, while in Northallerton, which was to be disfranchised, it was upwards of 450. Now, what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander, and if English boroughs were to be disfranchised for the sake of Scotland, these small districts ought to undergo the same fate if the large towns were to have additional representation. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving—

“That from and after the present Parliament the Wigton district of Burghs shall no longer return a Member to serve in Parliament; the Burghs of Stranraer and Wigton shall be added and form part of the Dumfries district of Burghs; and the City of Edinburgh shall return a third Member.”

THE CHAIRMAN expressed an opinion that the Amendment should have been proposed on Clause 10, which created or extinguished constituencies, whereas the present clause only added certain towns to existing districts of burghs.

MR. H. BAILLIE remarked that part of his Amendment added towns to an existing district.

MR. M'LAREN supported the Amendment.

SIR JOHN HAY said: Sir, I rise to entreat the Committee not to be led away by the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Invernessshire (Mr. Baillie) and I trust that my right hon. Friend the First Minister will give this proposal his most strenuous opposition. It may, no doubt, be argued that the Wigton burghs are the smallest burgh constituency in Scotland, but the Committee has just refused to sanction the partial disfranchisement of Sutherland—a county whose constituency is not half that of the Wigton burghs. Stranraer, the principal town of the group, is a most rising seaport, and has increased and is increasing most rapidly both in wealth and population. The burgh of Wigton is also rapidly improving. I live near Stranraer, and am able to speak on this subject with the greatest impartiality. I do not agree in political views with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Wigton burghs (Mr. Young), but I feel bound to do all in my power to resist this disfranchisement. These towns sent representatives to the Scotch Parliament, and since the Union have had a separate Imperial political existence. Though the present feeling in this district is to support the party opposite, it is unfair to say that this will always continue, or that it is brought about by undue influence. Indeed, not many years since, a Conservative candidate polled within one of the Whig who was returned. These burghs have a separate interest, and, owing to their geographical position, could not well be added to any other existing group. It is impossible for the Committee to sanction their union with the Dumfries district, as Stranraer is more than ninety miles from some towns in the Dumfries group, and which have no community of interest to recommend this grouping. I trust the Committee will resist the proposal.

Amendment negatived.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 12 (Certain Counties to be divided, and each Division to return a Member).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE proposed to omit the clause, on the ground that it would divide Lanarkshire, with its 200,000 inhabitants, in an unequal and objectionable manner, leaving one division with a population of only 20,000, another with one of 60,000, and a third with a population of 120,000.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he was surprised to hear such an objection coming from the hon. Member for Lanarkshire. The object of the clause was to divide the county so as to have the mercantile and manufacturing interest represented in that House as well as the agricultural interest. It was somewhat extraordinary to find an hon. Member opposing the representation of a district in which his property was situate. He trusted that the hon. Baronet, on consideration, would not persevere with his Amendment.

MR. MONCREIFF thought that the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane) was open to the charge of inconsistency in the course he had just advocated in respect to Lanarkshire and that which he had supported when the question of the representation of Glasgow was under consideration. It appeared to him that the proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was a reasonable one. The uniform practice was that two Members should sit for each county without having any division.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that this was the first opportunity which had arisen of discussing the question how two Members should be allotted to one county. In England divisions of counties were represented by two Members; but in the present case the county was seventy miles in length and fifteen miles broad, and it would be a great convenience to have a division. The proposal to divide Aberdeenshire met with approval, and the proposal to divide Ayrshire was not objected to. The only objection was in the case of Lanarkshire. The division of the county inserted in the Bill of last year was, however, the same as that now proposed, and he then understood that the hon. Baronet did not object to it, if the county were to be divided at all. On the whole the plan of the Government was thought the best for large and extensive counties.

MR. LOCKE observed that there appeared to be a great difficulty amongst the Scotch Members as to the mode in which they should divide the spoil. Seven Members, to be taken from England, were to be appropriated to Scotland, but there did not seem to be any inhabitants to receive them. He understood the proposition was to divide the county, and give a Member to a certain number of agricultural individuals. He should support the proposition of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), as he objected to leave one Member to be returned for a division in which there appeared to be no constituency at all.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, as the learned Lord Advocate had referred to a private communication which he had had with him in his office when the right hon. and learned Gentleman invited him to inspect the plan of the boundaries to be proposed, he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) thought it only fair to refer to what had really passed on that occasion. No doubt on that occasion he had expressed a strong suspicion that an unfair division would take place; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not when he went to him propose any distinct plan, but named several propositions which he had under his attention. The impression left was that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not made up his mind, and he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) said that if a fair and equal division were proposed the right hon. and learned Gentleman would stand upon strong ground. In his opinion, however, this had not been done, and no division of the county could be made which would separate the commercial from the agricultural population.

MR. FORDYCE thought that so far as Aberdeenshire was concerned, the division proposed by the Government was most fair and equitable, and he hoped the proposal would be persevered in. He had presented two petitions from Aberdeen in favour of it, one largely and influentially signed, and another from the Committee of Supply of the county. The county contained, he believed, 1,250,000 inhabitants, widely scattered so that none but the most wealthy could hope to canvass the entire county. He trusted the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) would not include Aberdeenshire in his opposition.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING - MAXWELL said, he had never heard a word of weight against the Government's proposed division.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he believed strong local feeling existed in favour of having the two Members for the undivided county.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, his experience as a Member for the county differed from that of the hon. Member (Mr. Craufurd). He knew from personal experience the difficulty attending a canvass of the county, and remarked incidentally that it was of not the slightest importance to any party how the matter was decided.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 206; Noes 141: Majority 65.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 13 and 14 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 15 (Liferenters, Joint Owners, and Joint Occupants).

MR. CRAUFURD proposed the omission of certain words, with a view to prevent joint occupiers below £50 in counties, with certain exceptions, from exercising the franchise.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was surprised that any objection should be taken to this clause, which was precisely similar in its terms to the 27th Section of the English Act. He did not see why a distinction should be drawn between the two countries.

MR. ELLICE proposed the insertion, in line 9, page 5, after "joint tenants," of the words "or joint owners," so as to provide that only two joint tenants or two joint owners should have a vote for the same property.

THE LORD ADVOCATE intimated his willingness to accept this Amendment.

Previous Amendment withdrawn; Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 16 to 19 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 20 (Registration of Voters).

MR. YORKE moved that the Chairman report Progress. ["No, no !"]

MR. DISRAELI said, he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion. They were now getting on very well, and he trusted some further progress would be made with regard to the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 21 and 22 agreed to.

Clause 23 postponed.

Clause 24 agreed to.

Clause 25 (Rooms to be hired for polling wherever they can be obtained).

MR. M'LAREN said, that he had an important clause to propose, and he thought it would be better to report Progress. ["No, no !"] The hon. Member then moved after "burgh" to insert—

"And all the expenses for or connected with such polling booths or rooms, including therein the fees for clerks and poll sheriffs employed by the Returning Officer within the same, shall, in burghs, be defrayed in the same manner as the registration expenses incurred under the Acts of nineteenth and twentieth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter fifty-eight; and in counties shall be defrayed in the same manner as the registration expenses incurred under the Act of the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth years of Her present Majesty, chapter eighty-three, are now defrayed."

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Amendment, on the ground that a similar proposal had been made in the English Bill, and had been rejected.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 26 to 36, inclusive, postponed.

Clauses 37 to 50, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 51 (In event of Dissolution of Parliament before 1 Nov. 1868, Elections to take place as heretofore).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE urged that the clause should be postponed for the purpose of being amended.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it could be amended on the bringing up of the Report.

MR. MONCREIFF suggested the postponement of the clause, as there was a great desire on the part of both sides of the House that the dissolution should take place, if possible, before the 1st of November. ["No, no !"]

Clause negatived.

Clause 52 agreed to.

Postponed Clause 6 (Restriction on Number of Votes in Glasgow).

MR. BOUVERIE asked if they were to discuss this clause at one o'clock in the morning?

MR. DISRAELI said, there were some other postponed clauses to be considered; for instance, the clause relating to the seven seats to be given to Scotland; and he supposed they would like to get those seven seats.

MR. GRAHAM moved that the clause be postponed, with a view to consider the alternatives that might be submitted for adoption—namely, that there should be a division of the city into two parts—one division to return two Members, and the other one Member—or to consider whether it was advisable that Glasgow should take a third Member under the circumstances.

MR. CRAUFURD moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. DISRAELI said, he thought it would be discourteous, after the assistance they had received, to oppose the Motion.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Monday 8th June.

SUPPLY—VOTE ON ACCOUNT OF CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH asked the House to go into Committee of Supply to pass a Vote on Account. He made the proposal on the supposition that it would be impossible to take all the Votes before the 1st of July, when several half-yearly payments were to be made.

MR. BOUVERIE: How long will the money last?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: We only took a Vote on Account for six weeks on the last occasion, and it is necessary to take one now. The money we now ask for will last until the middle of July.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That a further sum, not exceeding £1,412,000, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the following Civil Services, to the 31st day of March 1869.

[Then the several Services are set forth.]

BOUNDARIES OF BOROUGHES.

INSTRUCTION TO SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE moved—

“That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on Boundaries of Boroughs that they have power to consider the Petitions presented to this House on the subject of the places of nomination for County Elections; that the Petitions from South Molton, Barnstaple, Torrington, and Ilfracombe, relative to the place of nomination for the Northern Division of the county of Devon, be referred to the Committee.”

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING MAXWELL said, the Committee had nearly concluded its labours, and was almost ready to report, and he did not think it reasonable that this new duty should be imposed upon the Members. The subject was one which was not submitted to the Boundary Commissioners; the Committee did not think it should be submitted to them, and he therefore hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not press the Instruction.

MR. CRAUFURD also hoped the Motion would not be pressed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, as he understood from his right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Walpole) that this was a business that they would not be willing to undertake, he would not press the Motion; but he thought it right to move the Instruction, because a desire had been expressed that the question should be referred to the Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MOFFATT, Bill to amend “The Bankruptcy Act, 1861,” ordered to be brought in by Mr. MOFFATT, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. AYRTON, and Mr. CHARLES FORSTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 145.]

COURTS OF CHANCERY AND EXCHEQUER (IRELAND) FEE FUNDS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH, Bill for transferring the Fee and other Funds of the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer in Ireland to the Consolidated Fund, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH and Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 146.]

ASSIGNEES OF MARINE POLICIES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CANDLISH, Bill to enable Assignees of Marine Policies to sue thereon in their own names, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CANDLISH, Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, and Mr. NORWOOD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 147.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

UNIVERSITY TESTS.—PETITIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he had given Notice that to-day he would present Petitions from resident and non-resident Members of the University of Oxford, praying for the Removal of Religious Tests in the University. He had given this Notice because the Petitions were of so much weight and importance that he desired to call the special attention of their Lordships to them. One of these Petitions, signed by 102 persons who now were or formerly had been Fellows of the University of Oxford, set forth that theological tests at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, while failing to secure unity of religious opinion, had proved injurious to learning and education, and had the effect of excluding large numbers of Her Majesty's subjects from the benefits of University education. For these reasons the Petitioners prayed that all theological tests in the Universities might be removed. If he were to read to their Lordships, which he certainly should not trouble them by doing, the names appended to the Petition, it would be seen that they were the names of gentlemen of great weight and reputation, and such as undoubtedly would have influence with their Lordships. The other Petition, to which he attached even greater importance, was signed by eighty resident Members of the University of Oxford, and it was especially to be remarked that it included the names of sixty out of the 105 Tutors and Lecturers of the University of Oxford, representing, therefore, a clear, distinct and considerable majority of the whole teaching power of the University. To pursue the analysis a little further—in Merton, Corpus, Trinity, and New Colleges the whole of the educational staff had signed the Petition; in Baliol, Oriel, Lincoln, and Worcester at least two-thirds of the staff had signed; and out of the whole eighteen Colleges in which teaching was carried on there were only six where a majority of the tutors and lecturers had not signed the Petition. The Petitioners stated that they were—“Engaged as Heads of Colleges, Lecturers, Teachers, or resident Fellows, in the work of education in the University; that a portion of the nation were excluded from the benefit of the University by the religious tests imposed in it and in the Colleges; and that, in the opinion of the Petitioners, these tests might be removed without injury to the Church, without prejudice to the religious character of academical education, and without interference with the religious working of the Colleges.”

The importance of this Petition consisted not only in the number of the signatures, but in the plainness and distinctness of the prayer—there was no doubt or hesitation as to the ground that should be taken up—the Petitioners declared that tests were an hindrance to an extension of education to the whole nation, and they prayed Parliament to remove them. The present state of affairs was this—in the University of Oxford persons not belonging to the Established Church might proceed as far as the Bachelor degree, and at Cambridge as far as the degree of M.A.; but in both Universities such persons were excluded from any share in the government and from the Fellowships. They had in this matter made some progress of late years; but it seemed to him that the very progress they had made in the right direction was a proof that now it was impossible to stand still. But a very few years ago no one could be admitted to either University unless he conformed to the Church of England. Now Nonconformists were admitted to the benefits of the education given, but were still excluded from any share of the privileges and emoluments open to a successful academical career. That he ventured to think was a state of things which was utterly untenable. He could understand the Universities being dealt with as institutions exclusively Church of England in their character; but he could not understand why, having admitted Nonconformists and Jews to enter the Universities and attain certain degrees, an arbitrary barrier should then be created to prevent their further progress. He did not say that an Act of Parliament ought to be passed compelling the Colleges to open their Fellowships to persons of all religious beliefs, but he did say that Parliament should remove those barriers which it had itself raised to the free action of the Colleges in the matter. The measure of last year had been complained of as an incomplete one, because it extended only to offices in the Universities, and did not touch offices in the Colleges; and, to meet that complaint, he would suggest that upon the occasion of any measure on the subject again coming before their Lordships, they should consent to deal not only with offices in the Universities, but also to abolish those Acts of Parliament which prevented the Colleges from opening their Fellowships if they should think fit to do so, to persons not belonging to the Church of England. It must be admitted to be a matter of extreme importance that all the upper and middle classes of the country should have the opportunity of receiving the best education that the Universities could afford. Was it, therefore, a desirable thing that so large a portion of the middle classes as belonged to Nonconformist bodies should be excluded from the main benefits and attractions which the Universities held out? The Nonconformists themselves felt acutely the distinction that was drawn to their disadvantage, and had expressed, in a very remarkable statement, their sense of the great good they would reap if the whole privileges and emoluments of the Universities were thrown open to them. What were the objections that were capable of being urged? He thought they must either be objections derived from some argument connected with education, or else from some consideration exclusively connected with the Church. Could it be contended that the education of members of the Church of England would suffer by others, not members, being admitted to share in the privileges and emoluments of Universities? He knew that such an argument had been put forward; but he believed that since he had the honour of being a resident member of the University matters had not very much changed, and he could say for himself that the amount of direct religious instruction which he had received at Oxford was so infinitesimally small that whether he had received it at the hands of one who was or was not a member of the Church of England made, he thought, exceedingly little difference. He remembered that a great portion of the instruction which was given at that time consisted of a short lecture on the Greek Testament given to freshmen during their first and second term, being left after that pretty much to their own devices, and of the Thirty-nine Articles, which men were compelled to get up with great labour, and, he feared, with little profit, in order that they might be called upon to repeat them in the schools. If a similar system were pursued in the present day, he did not think, as far as religious teaching was concerned, anybody need much care whether the Universities were or were not opened to persons not being members of the Church of England. Undoubtedly, as far as those undergraduates were concerned who were going to take Orders, their religious instruction was a matter of great importance, and especial care should be taken to preserve to them such advantages as they now enjoyed. It was not proposed that any alteration should be made in the lectures given upon special subjects of theology, and those wishing to receive special instruction in the doctrines of the Church of England would continue to receive it; but could it be advisable that an exclusive policy should be persisted in with regard to the Universities as a whole, merely for the purpose of securing the education of one portion of the people? The Church of England, he maintained, was not supported or strengthened by such a policy. The true policy of the Church, like that of every other institution, was to make as many friends and as few enemies as possible; and, believing that an exclusive policy and the maintenance of restrictions tended to make enemies, he believed that it was calculated to weaken the Church. It seemed to him that the Church would fare better if its adherents would allow it to stand upon its own merits. He ventured to suggest that the Universities were national institutions, that they should be maintained for the exclusive use of no particular portion of the community, and that when Petitions such as those he now presented to their Lordships came before them signed by those who were best acquainted with the character of their University, and undoubtedly had its interests at heart, Parliament should certainly pay great attention to the prayer of such Petitions, and, if possible, proceed to legislate in their spirit. The noble Earl then presented Petitions of Heads of Colleges, Professors, &c., resident in Oxford; and of non-resident, present, or former Fellows of Colleges at Oxford, for the Abolition of Tests in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

LORD HOUGHTON thought that a Petition coming from a body of men of such varying opinions, but all of whom occupied a position of considerable weight and influence, was deserving of their Lordships' highest consideration. He sincerely hoped that the press of Public Business would not be such as to prevent their Lordships from taking into their consideration and coming to a decision upon the Bill now before the other House, which dealt with the subject of this Petition—he meant the University Tests Bill. He proposed, when the Bill should be before their Lordships, to express his opinion on this subject at length. At present he would simply say that this Petition was of extreme value, as showing the opinion of the members of the principal Colleges of Oxford in regard to the management of their own affairs. He had always insisted that there was a great distinction between the University and the Colleges, and he regretted that the extremely moderate measure proposed last year was not adopted. While they recognized the right of the Universities to the title of Imperial institutions, there was some difference in respect to the Colleges; and when such a proposal came from the heads of those Colleges, he thought it high time to set about their reform. He could certainly endorse the remarks of his noble Friend with respect to the high importance of a religious education: but at the same time it was not the main business, either of the Universities or our public schools to enter into theological teaching. The foundations of a religious education ought to be laid before young men went to the University, and a College should, properly speaking, confine itself to preventing its students from receiving evil impressions while it confirmed whatever was good in them. Certainly religion ought not to be ignored at such institutions, although there might be very little direct religious teaching. It had been said that the effect of the removal of existing disabilities would be to introduce a great deal of theological controversy into the Universities. He did not think that that argument was well-grounded. The Church of England itself contained in its various sections the elements of continual controversy, and theological disputes were much more due to points raised within the Church herself, than to any raised by Nonconformists; and if the polemical discussions now rife did no harm, he did not see that they could do much if their sphere were somewhat extended. He did not believe that the maintenance of any restrictions in the University would secure the Church of England from attack, nor did he believe that the young men who would go to the University after such restrictions had been removed would be exposed to any more theological controversy than exists at the present moment. On the contrary, he believed that it was for the interest of the Universities that they should attract all the intelligence of the country, whatever might be the religious opinions of those who sought admission; and as he believed that the prayer of the Petitioners pointed to a consummation of this result, he trusted their Lordships would give it the fullest consideration.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the Petition presented by his noble Friend went so thoroughly to the root of the whole University system and its influence on the country that he felt bound to say a few words on it. Since he had had the honour of a seat in their Lordships' House the question of religious tests in the Universities had passed through three distinct phases, which might well illustrate the growth, he would not say of opinion, but at all events of feeling on the part of one section of the community—namely, the so-called University Reformers. The question was before the House when he first had the honour of taking his seat among their Lordships, and they were distinctly told in the other House of Parliament that the Bill which was then under consideration—the University Reform Bill—was not to affect in any degree religious teaching in the University. He had learnt since then how little trust could be placed on Parliamentary professions or securities. The second stage, which had lasted almost up to the present time, was an attempt on the part of the Reformers to lower successively the standard with regard to the government of the Universities—first at Oxford, afterwards at Cambridge—taking care never to lower the standard of both Universities to exactly the same level, but making the lower standard in one University the pretence for advocating a further reduction in the other; and care being taken that the standard at the two should never be equalized. Since then a bolder front had been assumed, and the House was now asked, not to relax University tests, but to abolish them utterly. The more open Reformers declared the Universities were not places for religious education at all. He did not understand that to be the desire of the noble Earl, or of the Petitioners whose prayer he endorsed; but he doubted whether, when the real views of those who were pressing forward this question became known, they would obtain the sanction of the country. The proposal in fact was to hand over young men of from seventeen to twenty years of age—the age at which they were most susceptible of religious impressions—to a University system, in order not that they might make their selection of that form of religious education which they might approve, but that they might be placed under a system from which public religious teaching was deliberately excluded. He doubted whether the country was prepared to accept such a proposition. The arguments of a less advanced school, to which his noble Friend seemed to belong, asked for relief from religious tests, on the ground that the more a Church was deprived of artificial barriers in the shape of religious tests and securities, the more the cause of religious truth was likely to be promoted in a University. But could that rule be applied to any other description of teaching? The fallacy of the argument was apparent the moment it was applied to matters of secular education. Could it be argued that just as students in secular subjects were relieved from tests and examinations, knowledge would be developed? Was it just then to the different Universities that a different standard and different view should be applied to that which was applied to all other institutions? He admitted that religion might still exist in the Universities after the removal of the tests; but after their removal there would exist that hazy undefinable atmosphere of religious sentiment which as it was little connected with positive religion so was injurious even in an intellectual point of view to that habit of clear definition which was the great object of education. His noble Friend opposite said that the religious teaching at the University in his day was very small — and he dared say it was. But some persons went further, and said that the religious teaching of the present day was worse, and that most of the Masters of Arts of the present generation were of a sceptical turn—a fact which, if it were true, might pretty well account for so many being in favour of the removal of all religious tests. His reply was—that, first of all, he doubted the fact. But, in the next place, even if it were so, was that a reason for changing the system of a University? He doubted not that if such an amount of scepticism existed as was said, it was, after all, only one of the phases of thought which might be here to-day and gone to-morrow, and which would produce no more effect than the wave which swept over the sands of the sea shore, but which in its retiring left the old landmarks clearly definable. Would the noble Earl argue that because there was a sceptical phase of thought now prevailing, they were to abolish tests and safeguards which were created for other purposes and for other circumstances? Such a proceeding would be as sensible as if in a time of pestilence, they were to proceed to destroy the whole science of medicine which was found efficacious in all ordinary times for the cure of disease. His noble Friend spoke of this as a Dissenters' question; he wished it was, for he should not despair of being able to come to terms with them; but what was wished, so far as he could understand, was not the removal of tests and disabilities which pressed upon Dissenters, but to remove tests and securities which weighed upon every honest Churchman. It was therefore a serious question which Dissenters had to ask themselves—whether or not they were prepared at all hazards to support a party which desired to eliminate from the Universities all religious tests, or whether they would stand by those who desired to retain them. In his opinion those who sided with those who now proposed the abolition of those tests would find themselves carried much further than they intended. But anyhow the time of the decision of the question had not yet arrived. There was no Bill before their Lordships' House, and it was not necessary for the House to attempt any definite settlement of the question. Still no one could deny the fact that the time was approaching when some decision must be come to. Things could not go on very long as they were; it was evident that both parties were collecting all their strength, and it would be for the religious Dissenters to say what side they would take—whether true to the principles which they had often recognized they would side with the cause of the Church of England—or whether they would take part with the enemies of the Church of England, and espouse the cause of those who desire absolutely to banish all religion from the educational system of our two great Universities.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE said, that in his position, he thought he ought to say a few words with reference to the state of feeling in the University of Cambridge on this question. The opinions of the members of that University had been materially influenced by what had already taken place on the question, and his knowledge of the University justified him in saying that the preponderance of feeling on the part of the resident members was decidedly against the relaxation of the disabilities which it was proposed to remove; while, on the other hand, there was a very considerable and a decidedly increasing minority in favour of the removal of these restrictions. The University, in its corporate capacity, had protested against the relaxation, the matter being decided in the Senate house by a majority of about 2 to 1 against the Bill before the other House of Parliament, and he believed that those numbers very faithfully represented the relative strength of the two sides of the University. There was also the Memorial presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury, signed by 1,000 graduates of the University, combining, no doubt, a large number of eminent men. On the other side a Petition had been presented by 226 gentlemen, including many Professors of the University and Fellows of Colleges who had attained the highest University distinctions, and also by a number of laymen, which petition was decidedly in favour of the relaxation of the existing restrictions. The distinguishing feature of the Petition was that the motive was not so much to obtain a large number of signatures as to secure the assent of men of mark and distinction; and it was worthy of remark that the names included those of many whose opinions on general questions were decidedly of a Conservative tendency. Besides the Petitions emanating from the University, Petitions had been presented from Trinity College, Christ's College, and St. Peter's College. The Petition from Trinity was signed by a majority of the Fellows—by 32 out of 60—and he was informed that among the minority were several who declined to affix their names to a Petition on the opposite side of the question. The Petition from Christ's College was signed by the Master and all the Fellows but one. What conferred a value on these Petitions was that the maintenance of these disabilities was a practical grievance to the Colleges; and at the latter College he understood it was contended that the interests of the College had suffered material injury from the continuance of these tests. At Trinity for many years past a large number of Nonconformist students had constantly been admitted, many of them being Presbyterian students who had received a portion of their education in Scotch Colleges; and the Fellows of Trinity spoke favourably of the result. He could not help thinking, looking at the fact that the uniform tendency of the legislation of late years had been to remove such disabilities, that it was hard that these tests should still be continued. As far as concerned a considerable proportion of the members of the University of Cambridge, a measure affecting their removal would not have to be forced on those who were reluctant or unwilling to receive it. There was every reason to believe that if the Act of Uniformity were repealed, as far as it related to the admission to College Fellowships, some of the Colleges would avail themselves of the liberty afforded them and admit Dissenters to Fellowships in such cases as they might deem expedient; while the remaining Colleges would have an opportunity of judging from experience the results of the relaxation which had been made in the case of the other Colleges.

THE BISHOP OF ELY said, the noble Lord was correct in his statement, that some very important Petitions against the Bill had been presented by members of Colleges. Indeed, he held in his hand one important Petition, which the rules of the House prevented him from presenting on that occasion. It was a Petition signed by nearly 1,000 undergraduates and Bachelors of Arts of Cambridge, who, though they held no political status in their University, were most of them probably of full age, and so fairly entitled to petition Parliament, representing as they did a large body of the most highly educated young men in England. The Petition strongly urged their Lordships not to entertain either of the Bills now before the other House of Parliament. He might further state that a short time since he had been present when a deputation from the University of Cambridge waited upon the Primate with a Petition or Memorial, signed, not as the noble Duke had said by 1,000, but by 2,800 graduates of Cambridge, a very large number indeed, considering how widely scattered such persons are, over England, Scotland, Ireland, the Continent, and the Colonies. The Petition, which had the names of many of the most eminent members of the University attached to it, urged the Archbishop of Canterbury to plead the cause of the University against the proposed changes. It was true that these changes were advocated by a certain number of able men; but there never was a time when there were not able men who took liberal views both in politics and theology, and he should be sorry that their Lordships should be carried away by the statement that, on this occasion, the liberal view was the view of the leading men in Oxford and Cambridge. It was stated the other day at Lambeth by a distinguished lay member of the University of Cambridge, who accompanied the deputation to the Archbishop, that not only the clerical members of the University but a large number of the most distinguished laymen, especially many of the lay professors at Cambridge, men of world-wide reputation, who did not so much represent Churchmen as men of science, literature, and intellect, protested against them. He had not been aware that there was any intention to discuss the subject that evening; but, as it had been brought forward, he trusted that their Lordships would allow him, as Bishop of the diocese in which one of the Universities lay, to make a few observations in answer to remarks which had fallen from noble Lords opposite. As regarded the question of the religious education of the Universities, he must respectfully say, that he could not agree with what had been said by the noble Earl opposite concerning theological lectures. Personally he felt that he owed a debt of gratitude for the lectures which he had attended when he was an undergraduate; and he knew by testimony which he had received from many quarters that thousands had been indebted through life to the religious instruction they had received in Colleges. Without question, much of the religious and theological teaching of the Colleges, as well as of the University, was not compulsory teaching, and therefore one person may have profited by it, whilst others were wholly regardless of it. He was speaking only for Cambridge; but as his Oxford friends were rather fond of twitting Cambridge with the inferiority of its system of religious teaching, he presumed that what he had said of such teaching at Cambridge, applied at least as much to the teaching of Oxford. It was said that the Colleges would profit by the proposed changes. In the first place, he would remind their Lordships that these Colleges were all Church foundations. They were all founded by members of the national Church—very many of them clergymen—for education on Christian principles connected with that Church. All the benefits of their education were, indeed, open to everyone, whatever his creed—all the honours, even the degrees; everything but the positions which would admit them to power and authority. But they were founded and endowed by Churchmen, and, though he did not for a moment admit the distinction between pre-Reformation and post-Reformation foundations—for the Reformation did not change, though it purified the Church—yet it was to be observed that some whole Colleges, and many foundations within the Colleges, came into existence since the Reformation, for the special purpose of educating Churchmen, often for the special purpose of educating clergymen. One of his own predecessors, Hugo de Balsham, Bishop of Ely, founded, out of his own episcopal revenues, the first College ever founded in Cambridge. Another of his predecessors, in the same manner, Bishop Alcock, founded Jesus College. The College to which he himself belonged had been founded since the Reformation by an English Churchman for the education of English clergymen. It would be a strong measure indeed if the Houses of Parliament, by a single vote, were to sweep away these institutions, founded by the piety of our forefathers, and revolutionize them by placing at their head persons who might not be members of the Church of England, not only Dissenters or Roman Catholics, but even persons of no religion whatever. The noble Duke had spoken of the improvement which would be introduced into that most distinguished College of which he (the noble Duke) was a member. But was it not possible, nay, even probable, that the proposed changes would entirely revolutionize that College? What was the constitution of that College? It consisted of a Master and sixty Fellows; but the governing power was entirely vested in the Master and the eight seniors. It would be possible enough that a certain number of Dissenters might be elected into that body without materially affecting its principles or the working of the College. But suppose, at any time, some six or seven of the sixty Fellows were Roman Catholic priests, especially Jesuits, what would be the inevitable result? These six or seven men could never marry, could never take College livings: so they would never vacate their Fellowships. They would therefore in the course of time become members of the seniority, would become a large majority of that seniority. Now, the seniority elects Fellows, appoints tutors, governs the whole College. Hence if six Jesuits or Roman Catholic priests were once elected among the sixty Fellows of Trinity, they would have it in their power, by holding on till they were seniors, to revolutionize the whole body, and to convert it from what it now is into a simple Roman Catholic College. They would have it in their power, and on their own principles they would naturally exercise that power. Neither then on principles of justice, nor on principles of expediency, can it be well to deprive our Colleges of their religious character.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN begged their Lordships to consider, whether the Universities were really national institutions, of the nation and for the nation, or merely to be devoted to the education and advantage of those who belonged to the Church of England? He, with many of those who belonged to the University of Oxford, turned to their noble Chancellor (the Earl of Derby), who so gracefully and ably presided over the destinies of that University, with a feeling of confidence that his powerful voice would be heard in favour of the Bill to which allusion had been made when it came up to their Lordships' House. They had instituted inquiries into national schools and middle-class schools, showing that the intentions of founders need not always be carried out to the very letter; and he asked them to consider whether, when in politics, in law, and in the lower kinds of education, the thoughts of men were widening, they would not consent to the proposed changes with reference to the highest education of all—whether they were not prepared to accept a measure which must confer the highest advantages on future generations?

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he would not detain their Lordships from a more interesting, if not a more important, discussion; but he wished to say a very few words for the purpose of obviating the great confusion which evidently arose from mixing up the case of the Colleges with that of the Universities. He was glad to hear from the noble Baron (Lord Houghton) that these two things should be kept distinct. They were in reality very different. One point he thought of importance, and that was, that Colleges should not be allowed to regulate themselves by persons who might accidentally be members at the time; if there was any right in the matter, it should be regulated by Parliament itself. In his time a great deal of religious instruction was given in the Colleges. During the seven years he was tutor of a College, at least one-third of his time was occupied in giving religious instruction. How far it was profitably received by those to whom it was given it was impossible for him to say. It was lamentable to think that time so given had been wasted, as many would have them believe.

Petitions ordered to lie on the Table.

WHITSUNTIDE RECESS—VOTE OF THANKS TO THE ARMY IN ABYSSINIA— STATE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, before moving the adjournment of the House to Monday, the 8th of June, I wish to inform your Lordships that I shall move a Vote of Thanks to the Forces who have been so victorious in Abyssinia on Tuesday, the 9th; and on Monday, the 8th, I shall be able to lay on your Lordships' table the terms in which I propose to put that Vote to the House. My Lords, I move that this House do adjourn till Monday, the 8th of June.

Moved, "That this House do adjourn to Monday, the 8th of June next."—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

VOL. CXCI. [THIRD SERIES.]

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I have given Notice to call the attention of your Lordships to the state of public affairs, because I wish to obtain some explanation from the noble Lord (the Lord Privy Seal), on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, and also because I conceive that the present state of affairs is one without precedent since the accession of the House of Hanover. I think there never has been a time when Parliament was proceeding quietly with the ordinary Business when it had been formally announced that the Government had not the confidence of the House of Commons. I state this on no mean authority. The Prime Minister himself has stated, and the statement has been circulated throughout the country, that in consequence of the vote of the House of Commons with respect to the Irish Church he had thought it necessary to ask an audience of Her Majesty, and that at that audience he had asked of Her Majesty, in the name of the Ministry, permission to use the Prerogative of the Crown for the purpose of dissolving Parliament. Now a more authoritative declaration never was addressed to the House of Commons by the First Minister of the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman naturally and truly stated that he was an express authority on the subject. Her Majesty, on that advice, gave him permission to use the Prerogative of the Crown for that purpose, in order to take the sense of the people on the question of the Irish Church as soon as the despatch of Public Business would allow of the dissolution of the Parliament. But the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury did not take the course which Her Majesty had sanctioned—namely, that as soon as Public Business would allow there should be a dissolution of Parliament. There were, I confess, strong reasons for not taking that course. There seemed no object to be gained by putting the whole country to the trouble and vast expense of a General Election, when that election would produce no adequate result. Supposing that the right hon. Gentleman's prediction should be fulfilled, and that he had a majority against the disestablishment of the Irish Church on an appeal to the present constituencies, still it was evident that before very long there must be another election, and an appeal to constituencies very considerably enlarged, especially in the boroughs of the country. Therefore, the opinion to be derived from the present electors would not be a final decision; and the country would have been put to a great expense and the Members of the House of Commons to very considerable trouble by a General Election under the existing system—and that, too, as I said before, with no adequate result. It is evident, therefore, that there were sufficient reasons why there should not be a dissolution at once; and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, while not advising an immediate dissolution, has taken another course, which, however defensible it may be, is altogether new, and requires at least the attention of your Lordships. The course proposed is, in effect, that the present Ministers should continue to keep their places after having declared that they had not the confidence of the present House of Commons, and that the House should continue transacting its ordinary Business, and that that position should last for six months after the time at which the Prime Minister had advised a dissolution. I must say that that is an extraordinary and unprecedented state of things. There have been many instances in which a Minister who has been defeated in the House of Commons has tendered his resignation, and often the Minister so defeated has obtained the permission of the Crown to resort to a dissolution of Parliament; but I do not recollect any case in which a Minister, having advised that there should be a dissolution, that dissolution should not take place for more than six months after the advice has been tendered to the Crown. No doubt there is great convenience to be obtained by that course—a great convenience to the Minister, who would thus remain in Office, though not possessing the confidence of the House of Commons; and, likewise, it is greatly convenient to the Members of the House of Commons, who otherwise would have to undergo the expense of two General Elections instead of one, while the country is spared a great disturbance. At the same time, I must say that if Parliament and the country acquiesce in that state of affairs—a state of things which is without precedent, and difficult of justification—there are some conditions, at least, which we ought to have from the Executive Government. I think that the first condition should be that no time should be lost, and that there should be no unnecessary delay before the registration, which would afford the means of having a General Election completed. It appears to me that there was great and unnecessary delay in the course taken last year. In looking back to the Session of 1832, I find that a very large and extensive measure of Reform was passed for England and the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills were also passed; there were Boundary Bills for England and Ireland, and, I rather believe, for Scotland also; and the Session ended on the 16th of August. I must say it seems to me that, in the course of last year, the Government, of which the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) was then the head, seemed rather to have procrastinated Business, with a view not to pass the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, so that there might be an unnecessary Session in the present year. That being the case, I hope the Government will assure us that, instead of interposing unnecessary delays, they will rather hasten some of the processes by which the registration is to be made out. There is no need, for instance, for so very long a time being allowed to the Revising Barristers. By the Reform Act of 1832 power was given to the Judges to increase the number of Revising Barristers if it were inadequate, to get through the business in the time limited. If that power were now exercised, no doubt considerable expedition in establishing the rights of the voters would result. I do not know that there can be great despatch obtained by a step which has been suggested—namely, that before the registration is completed there should be a dissolution of Parliament; because I believe that when there is a dissolution the elections in London, Westminster, and all places near the metropolis will occur in about four days afterwards. But we may ask that there should not be any unnecessary loss of time, and that the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills and the Boundary Bill should be proceeded with as speedily as possible, so that the country may have the satisfaction of exercising the suffrage under the new Reform Acts, which many persons believe to be an improvement of the electoral system, but which the noble Earl opposite called “a leap in the dark,” and which, as I believe, was very justly so described. At all events, we should know what we are to expect from it. The next thing which I think we have a right to ask is that there should be some definite policy announced by Her Majesty’s Government. I think that whenever the dissolution occurs it would be unfair for the Government to ask the decision of the country as to who should be its representatives unless they announced certain principles. In the summer of last year I ventured to state that I thought there were three questions of great importance to be decided. The first is the question of church rates. There is no policy on the part of the Government with respect to church rates. Mr. Gladstone, who is in fact the Leader of the majority in the other House, and who introduced a Bill in respect to church rates, was impressed with the belief that the Government intended to oppose that measure; and it was only because the demonstration of force against it proved insufficient that they abstained from direct resistance to it. The Bill then passed by a considerable majority, and came to this House. We were then assured that the Bill, having passed the other House by a large majority, would be fairly treated in this, and the noble Earl opposite proposed that it should go to a Select Committee, not, as he represented, with the view of defeating it, but for the purpose of its improvement. Well, I trust that the Bill will come out of that Select Committee uninjured, and in such a shape that the House of Commons will have no difficulty in adopting the Amendments. But when I understand, as there was a great demonstration of force against it in the other House, and when I know that it has many enemies in this House, I feel doubtful whether some of the Members of the Government will give it that cordial support by which alone it can obtain the general assent of Parliament. Another subject to which I alluded as being of vast importance was the great question of education. I will not now anticipate the discussion on that question; but I hope that the Government have some measures in contemplation which will comprehend that subject in all its breadth—which will provide for the primary education of the poorer classes, the education of the middle classes, for the treatment of endowed schools, and, lastly, for the improvement of education in our Universities. I hope when the Reformed Parliament meets some measure worthy of its consideration will be proposed on these subjects. There is another subject of which I then stated I thought there must be a consideration at an early period. That is the state of Ireland. Everything shows that it is a question which requires immediate consideration. When the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland was passing through this House, and I was giving my ready assent to that measure, I said that I hoped the policy of the Government with regard to Ireland would be stated and developed. In reply to my observation on the subject the Government replied that the only reason for not stating that policy in this House then was that it would be more convenient that the noble Earl the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant—himself a Member of the Cabinet—should state in the other House of Parliament what was the whole policy of the Government with respect to Ireland. We were told in the month of March that within a few days—I think on the Monday following—the whole of that policy would be stated by the noble Earl in the House of Commons. It was stated in the House of Commons, and it embraced that portion of the Irish question which had engaged the special attention of your Lordships—namely, the position of the Church. I think I have got here what was said by the Earl of Mayo when speaking on that subject. He said—"There would not, I believe, be any objection to making all Churches equal, but the result must be secured by elevation, and not confiscation." That was a very important declaration. It was the deliberate declaration of the policy of Her Majesty's Government in the month of March last. Undoubtedly, equality may be produced by what is called "elevation" as well as by endowment; but I cannot see how with one Church in possession of establishment and endowment you could produce equality among all Churches—which is Lord Mayo's phrase—otherwise than by giving establishment and endowment to the Roman Catholic and the Presbyterian Churches in Ireland—I say I do not see how equality can be established by elevation, if establishment and endowment are to be continued to the Protestant Episcopal Church in that country, in any other way than by raising the Roman Catholic Church and the Presbyterian Church as regards endowment and establishment to the same level as the Episcopal Church. Of course, every one supposed that was the policy of equality by elevation put forward by Her Majesty's Government—that their policy was to extend to the Roman Catholics and the Presbyterians privileges similar to those now enjoyed by the Established Church in Ireland. It is obvious that equality together with elevation could be produced in no other way; and yet, after some three months, when we ask what this policy amounts to, it appears that the plan at one time entertained of giving a charter to a Roman Catholic University, which threatened to create a most calamitous division on the subject of education in Ireland, has been abandoned. Indeed, as far as I can see, the whole of that policy which was stated in such detail by Lord Mayo in a three hours' speech has been abandoned. It appears that the elevation of all Churches which the noble Earl proposes amounts simply to this—that the Roman Catholics will be allowed to lay out their own money and build their own churches—that, in fact, no law will be proposed to prevent them from laying out their own money in providing for their own spiritual wants according to the rites of their own religion. The policy of the Government is, therefore, to do nothing; but that is hardly a policy to require more than three hours for its exposition. It is a policy which ought to be fairly stated, at all events. When we ask what the Government mean to do to meet the evils of Ireland, I do not mean to say they ought to adopt any views which I may entertain; but, at all events, they should say, "We intend to do nothing. We think force is sufficient; force has been used hitherto, force will do in future, and we have no other policy." There are many other subjects with regard to which I think the Government might be asked to state their policy; but those are three very main subjects. Well, I ask next, what has been the conduct of the Government in respect to executive administration and the preservation of the public peace? I find a most remarkable assertion made by the Committee of the Reform League with regard to the preservation of the peace of this metropolis on a very memorable occasion. The late Government proposed a plan of Reform which the country generally appeared to approve. It was heartily approved by numerous meetings composed of very large numbers. It failed, however, to obtain the approval of Parliament. But when the party of the noble Earl opposite came into power, the Reform League appears to have thought that nothing but very great demonstrations of numbers and power would obtain a measure of Reform from the new Government. The Chairman of the Executive Committee, I believe, of the Reform League thus states what happened—

"Then followed the now celebrated demonstration at Hyde Park on the 23rd of July, 1866. The Tory Government, having illegally closed the Park gates against the people"—I am not adopting this assertion—"the Park palings fell. The police and military, called in to the aid of the Government, were unable to clear the Park either that evening or on the two following days, and on the afternoon of the 25th the same Government which had closed the Park against the League and the people on the 23rd applied to the League to restore that law and order which the Government themselves had broken, and to preserve the peace of the metropolis from what threatened to be a very serious and dangerous crisis."

My Lords, I am not entering into the question of the legality or illegality of the meetings in the Park; but that the Reform League was applied to when the Government were unable to restore order in Hyde Park I believe to be perfectly true. There are too many instances of their inability to preserve the public peace and order. Your Lordships recollect the case of the men who were executed at Manchester for the rescue of persons charged with high treason.

THE EARL OF DERBY: They were executed for murder; not for treason.

EARL RUSSELL: They were properly convicted — properly convicted of murder committed in the rescue; but I refer to the case as one in which proper precautions were not taken — had such precautions been taken there would have been no loss of life. Again, there has been the case of the working men from Staffordshire who went into Lancashire for a peaceable purpose, who were there subjected to acts of physical violence, and who were obliged to return again to Staffordshire because they could not obtain protection in Lancashire. Then the peace has been broken by the destruction of Roman Catholic chapels, and there, again, there was a neglect of precautionary measures. It was only after the steed has been stolen that precautions were taken to shut the stable door. There is another question on which, I think, we ought to call on the noble Earl to state explicitly what are the views of the Government. As I have already stated, the Government have themselves declared that they have not the confidence of the House of Commons. On the question of the Irish Church there had been at the time to which I alluded two divisions. In one of these there was a majority of 60 and in the other a majority of 65 against the Government. A third division has since been taken with a less majority, but still with a majority of 54 against the Government. It is clear, therefore, that on the subject in respect of which they themselves proclaimed that they had not the confidence of the House of Commons, they have not obtained that confidence since the power of dissolving was accorded to them. The key-stone of the arch on which the Constitution of this country rests is that a Ministry should not remain in Office unless it possesses the confidence of Parliament. The present Prime Minister was so strongly impressed with this conviction in 1841, that he quoted a saying of Mr. Fox, marked, as his sayings generally are, with superabundant energy. Mr. Fox said that the Minister who remained in Office without the confidence of Parliament was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour. I do not say that; but I do say that the safety of the Constitution depends on the Government not remaining in Office when it ceases to possess the confidence of the House of Commons. I need not particularly refer to the events of old times, before this principle was acknowledged, when those violent means were resorted to; when Lord Strafford lost his life on the scaffold, Lord Clarendon was banished, and Danby was imprisoned; but from the time of Sir Robert Walpole to this day the machine has worked smoothly, and the safety of the Constitution of this country has depended on a change of Government being made whenever the Minister lost the confidence of the House of Commons. I am not now referring to the question of dissolution or to the appeal which may be made to the constituent body, as established upon a novel system. But I ask whether the Ministers acknowledge the principle, and whether they do not think it would be wrong to remain in Office after the dissolution if they were not supported by the confidence of the House of Commons? For that, I say, is the great key-stone of the arch of the constitution of this country. And I think, from the accounts which we had of late from the other side of the Atlantic, we may see the importance of such a principle, and that the absence of such a test is attended with great inconvenience. The President of the United States has been for some considerable time at open variance with the Congress of the United States. Had he been a Minister in this country a Vote of Want of Confidence would have displaced him; but as they have no such convenient machinery or conclusive test in America, they have thought it necessary to impeach him, and so, by obtaining a verdict of guilty, to remove him from his office. In this case we see the evils that follow from a course such as I have spoken of. I trust that at all events this contest will cease when the new Parliament is elected. If the decision of the new House of Commons be against the party to which we belong we shall bow to that decision; and I trust that Ministers will likewise bow to the voice of Parliament, and will not endeavour to set up an unconstitutional practice by attempting to sustain themselves in power in spite of the adverse decisions of the House of Commons.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, the noble Earl (Earl Russell) has made use of the privilege which, no doubt, he possesses as Leader of the Opposition in this House, of calling Her Majesty's Ministers to account for the many and various delinquencies which he charges upon them, and also of seeking for an explanation of those delinquencies. But, unless your Lordships have a better memory than I have, you will hardly remember with any distinctness the disconnected accusations which he has brought against us. The noble Earl began by attacking us for certain acts done one or two months ago, as to which he was totally and completely silent at the time—

EARL RUSSELL: At the beginning of this month, I think.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I allude to the time when the Prime Minister had an interview with Her Majesty. From that he went to events which occurred quite recently; and from them he jumped back again to the now historical causes and effects of the Hyde Park riots. It is rather difficult to answer a speech so fitfully expressed as that of the noble Earl; and therefore I must beg your Lordships to grant me all your usual indulgence while I try to make intelligible that which the noble Earl, like one of the heroes of Homer, has thrown a cloud around, probably to prevent any effective reply. It was first of all asserted that we have not the confidence of Parliament; and the noble Earl, as an ancient friend and supporter of the British Constitution, stated—and stated very truly—that for a Ministry to continue in Office which does not possess the confidence of the House of Commons is not only a delinquency in itself, but may have the worst possible results upon the country and its institutions. But then the noble Earl begs the question. He says we have not the confidence of the House of Commons; but how does he prove that? He may justly say that we have not the confidence of the House of Commons on a particular question; but I have not yet heard that the House of Commons has exercised its undoubted privilege—one that has been frequently resorted to in other cases—of expressing by a distinct declaration its want of confidence in the Government. I can only say that if the House has not any confidence in the general conduct of public affairs by the Government the discredit rests, not with the Government for remaining in Office, but with the House of Commons, which does not force them out of Office by a bold and straightforward Vote of Want of Confidence. And if the House of Commons fails in its duty, what is to prevent the noble Earl who sits opposite, or any of his Colleagues who sit near him, from inviting an expression of opinion by your Lordships by bringing forward a Motion of Want of Confidence? There must be some reason why this is not done, and I think your Lordships can easily imagine why such a Vote has not been come to, and why the noble Earl does not come forward to propose it. The plain answer must be that for the general purposes of carrying on the Business of the country the House of Commons and the House of Lords have confidence in Her Majesty's Government; and therefore all the constitutional arguments which we have heard—arguments which I have not the slightest idea of opposing—fall to the ground, because the premises will not bear the test of examination. Then, with reference to another complaint of the noble Earl, why, when the Prime Minister had the important conference with Her Majesty, and Her Majesty was graciously pleased to refuse to accept our resignations which the Prime Minister had put into her hands, why did not the noble Earl come forward at that time and explain to the House and the country how unconstitutional our conduct was in his eyes? Why, we did not hear a whisper from the noble Earl on the subject, and I think it is now nearly two months since those events occurred. Then the noble Earl entered into a discussion of various points to show that we had not the confidence of the country—or rather, that we ought not to have its confidence.

But the noble Earl forgets that he and some of his former Colleagues, far from uttering the opinions which he now expresses, have on various occasions, with a generosity which we perfectly appreciate, actually gone out of their way to express satisfaction at the conduct of public affairs in several Departments. Sometimes in this House, sometimes in the other House, Her Majesty's Government have received the compliments of leading Members of the Opposition upon three or four very important subjects. The foreign policy of my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office has constantly been received with approbation in Parliament, and this feeling has been expressed especially by my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Clarendon), who, I would say, knows as much of foreign affairs as probably any of your Lordships. Then, as to the management of Ireland by the present Lord-Lieutenant and Chief Secretary for Ireland, under the great difficulties arising out of the Fenian conspiracy, from individual Peers who do not agree with us upon general subjects, as well as from individual Members of the Opposition in the other House, we have received compliments upon our conduct of Irish affairs. As to our home policy, to which the noble Earl himself adverted in speaking of the execution of the Fenians for murder, very high encomiums have been passed from time to time upon the Home Secretary for the manner in which he maintained the peace of the country, and for the great sagacity which he exhibited and labour which he bestowed upon discovering and unwinding the threads of the Fenian conspiracy. In ten days' time your Lordships, I hope, will be called on to return thanks to the gallant military and naval Forces of the Crown for their deeds in Abyssinia. I would not detract one iota from the inestimable services of those troops and their officers; but they themselves would be the first to say that this success could hardly have been looked for if the civil servants of the Crown had not exerted themselves assiduously to arrange for the transport of the troops and stores necessary to carry out that most dangerous and uncertain expedition; and, therefore, Her Majesty's Government may claim, at least, some credit for the success which, under Providence, they have had in Abyssinia, and I do not think it likely that upon that score the House of Commons will express any disapprobation of our policy. I must confess that I did not quite understand the drift of one part of the noble Earl's observations. He thinks we act unconstitutionally by remaining in Office; and, somehow or other—for he does not explain that point—he thinks that Public Business has suffered, that many important questions have been neglected and have fallen through, and that we are not as much advanced as we ought to be at this season of the year. Well, my Lords, such are the facts; but what are the causes? Allow me to ask your Lordships to take a retrospect of past events; they have been very important, and to a great extent they certainly have been unforeseen. I have no scruple in saying that in January this was the general view formed by public men of the course which public affairs were likely to take this Session. The great controversy which had been going on for some years had been partly closed by the efforts of my noble Friend the noble Earl the late Prime Minister; the Reform Bill for England had been carried; but the Bills for Scotland and Ireland were still outstanding. And if the noble Earl reproaches us for not passing them last year, all I can say is—remembering the time that the English Bill occupied—it was physically impossible for us to do so. In January last, therefore, the organization of the Constitution was in abeyance; the Reform Bill for England had passed into law, but those for Scotland and Ireland had still to be adopted. Under these circumstances what were the expectations of nine men out of ten throughout the country? They thought this Session would be occupied in maturing the great question of Reform, and completing it in all its points—by passing the Scotch and Irish Bills; by passing the Bill for restraining corrupt practices; by passing the Boundary Bill; and thus having prepared a new arena for both parties to engage in a trial of strength and integrity, the country would decide in a fair field by which of the two parties it would be governed. This was the universal feeling: and although this feeling would not necessarily prevent the proposition of measures of another description, we purposely selected measures that were not likely to provoke opposition and political feeling; and in the like spirit we withdrew the Education Bill to which the noble Earl has referred. But a great misfortune befel the country; the noble Earl at the head of the Government (the Earl of Derby) was obliged to resign Office at the beginning of the year, and the whole aspect of affairs was altered. The armed truce which we expected would last till the Reform Bills had passed and until the dissolution in the autumn was suddenly broken; there arose new causes for political agitation, and these circumstances are in reality the cause of those defects in legislation on which the noble Earl has commented. My Lords, a new and extraneous question of the highest possible importance was broached; it was a question of far more importance, indeed, than the Reform Bills, because they involve only questions of detail as to the method of Parliamentary election and management. And that important question to which I refer was not dealt with after the manner in which it was brought forward by the noble Earl opposite some time ago; he proposed only a modification of the Irish Church by taking a little from it here and adding a little there, by apportioning its possessions among itself and neighbours; but Mr. Gladstone came upon the scene and treated the proposal of the noble Earl with as little respect as if it had come from this side of the House. Mr. Gladstone declared at once—"This scheme won't do; it's mere milk and water. It's not worth having; it's like the drag which you ran thirty years ago—the Appropriation Clause." That was Mr. Gladstone's view; the remedy was not strong enough for him—he felt he could get no followers with such a programme; and having no more respect for a measure proposed by the noble Earl than he would have had for one proposed on this side of the House, he boldly and at once declared, not for reforming the Irish Church, but for its abolition. The noble Earl has asked me to state the opinions of the Government on one or two points, and among others he has asked what I think respecting the state of Ireland, and what would be the best means to adopt for its pacification. Now, I think the noble Earl is about the last man who should press that question, because when a noble Viscount connected with Ireland (Viscount Lifford) recommended interference with the Irish Church only two years ago, the noble Earl with considerable energy absolutely put him down and said the thing should not be. And I might ask what did the noble Earl then depend upon to keep Ireland in a state of comparative order? Force, my Lords. No doubt the noble Earl had some statesmanlike reasons for adopting that policy; he could not have summarily rejected the counsels of the noble Viscount from mere caprice, and rebuked him in a fit of ill-temper. I need hardly tell the noble Earl what are our views upon the subject of interference with the Established Church of Ireland. I would not remain silent on that subject if I were not a Member of the Administration, and as long as I have a vote in this House I will use it to support the Irish Church; and I will do so because I am convinced that Church cannot be disestablished and disendowed without carrying with it in its downfall the Established Church in England. These are not my opinions only; I hear them expressed by men who are best judges of what the result would be, and they are largely shared in by Dissenters, some of whom deprecate the disestablishment of the Irish Church. I happen to have heard, from both those Dissenters who favour, and those who object to this movement, the opinion that, if carried, it will be but the prelude to the total disestablishment of the English Church; and this opinion has been expressed on the one part with joy, and on the other with the deepest regret. I therefore give the noble Earl my opinion very plainly; and I believe my Colleagues entirely concur with me in the view I take. The noble Earl has touched upon the Roman Catholic University scheme. The proposition we made was rejected by the Roman Catholic Bishops because we made it a sine quâ non that a lay element should have part in the management of the University; and if the noble Earl will read the published Correspondence between the Earl of Mayo and the Roman Catholic Bishops he will be in possession of all the information he asks for. I think I have nothing more to say in answer to the noble Earl, except to add with regard to the dissolution that the sooner the event occurs the better Her Majesty's Government will be pleased, and no one will welcome it more heartily than myself. If the noble Earl has not patience to wait until such time as the dissolution can be brought about with fairness to the electors, I can only entreat him to move in this House, and ask his Friends in the other House also to move, a Vote of Want of Confidence against Her Majesty's Ministers.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned accordingly at half past Seven o'clock to Monday, the 8th of June next, Eleven o'clock.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. SCHREIBER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, On what day after the Recess it is his intention to proceed with the Committee on the Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill?

MR. DISRAELI said, in reply, that he was sorry he could not fix a day at present, but would do so on the first day after the holidays.

TURKEY—BRIGANDAGE NEAR SMYRNA. QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If any information has been received from Her Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople announcing the release of Mr. J. W. Stevens, a British subject, who has been captured by Brigands near Smyrna; and if the restoration of Mr. Stevens cannot be obtained without the payment of the money demanded by his captors, application will be made to the Ottoman Government to pay the required ransom?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I am sorry to say I have as yet no intelligence upon the subject. There is a mail at present due from Constantinople, and I daresay I shall receive information in a day or two.

CEYLON—UNAUTHORIZED PUBLICATION OF A DESPATCH.

QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, At what time the noble Duke the Chief Secretary for the Colonies received an official letter fully addressed to his Grace by Mr. George Wall, the President of the Planters' Association of Ceylon, and dated Colombo, March 5, 1868, which letter was entrusted by Mr. Wall to the hands of the Governor of Ceylon, Sir Hercules Robinson, to forward, in accordance with the usual etiquette; if he is aware of the fact that such letter so entrusted to the hands of the Governor was tampered with, and was published in a local paper called the Ceylon Herald before it could have come to the hands of the Chief Secretary, and without the knowledge or consent of the writer, or of the Chief Secretary; and, what course is intended to be taken in reference to such a proceeding?

MR. ADDERLEY, in reply, said, the noble Duke the Colonial Secretary received Mr. Wall's letter dated Colombo, March 5, in a Despatch, dated March 21, on April 27, and a further letter from Mr. Wall, dated April 17, complaining of the first having been published in a local newspaper. On inquiry it appeared that this publication was without the authority, consent, or even knowledge of the Governor, but much to his annoyance, as unfair to himself. But the substance of the letter, and of one of the League Committee of the same date, was sent by Mr. Wall himself to a local newspaper before even the transmission of the documents from the island. The Governor, however, had been requested to ascertain, if possible, whether the letter appearing in a local newspaper supporting the Government had been effected by any Government officer or by any breach of official duty. An answer had not yet been received.

IRELAND—UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in order to secure an adequate discussion on the subject of University Education in Ireland, he will promise that there shall not be a Morning Sitting on Friday, the 19th of June, the day fixed for a Motion relating to Trinity College, Dublin?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I really am unable to see so far ahead as the 19th of June. At the same time I shall be very sorry to interfere with the discussion indicated by the hon. Gentleman.

LOSS OF THE "GARONNE."—QUESTION.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, If the Board will institute an inquiry into the loss of the steamer Garonne on the Land's End, which is said to have been caused by a want of seamanship, and to have been attended by a great loss of life?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: Sir, The Board of Trade have already sent instructions to the Solicitor of the Customs to take steps for an immediate inquiry into the circumstances attending the unhappy loss of this vessel.

RIOTS AT ASHTON, STALEY BRIDGE, BIRMINGHAM, &c.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to institute any inquiry as to the origin and nature of the recent riots at Ashton and other places in the county of Lancaster, and at Birmingham and other places in the counties of Warwick and Stafford; and whether the Government has made any and what provision for the better protection of public lecturers and those who may attend such lectures in the event of threats to suppress such lectures by riot and outrage, and then prevent the recurrence of such riots as before referred to?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I practically answered this Question the other night. It is not the intention of the Government to institute any inquiry at present, whilst trials are pending; and with respect to the latter part of the Question, I may say it seems to me that the matter is one that rests entirely with the local authorities.

METROPOLIS—OBSTRUCTION OF THOROUGHFARES.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works a Question of which he had given private Notice. When Parliament re-assembled after the Easter holidays the usual access to the House was obstructed through a street having been broken up. On the eve of the "Derby" the access to the South-Western Railway was similarly obstructed in the Westminster Road. At present, Bond Street, Vere Street, and part of Oxford Street—to say nothing of Park Lane and many other thoroughfares—were also obstructed. He, therefore, wished to ask, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to these obstructions; by whom they are authorized; and whether any Department of the Government has power to prevent persons breaking up the thoroughfares at a time when London is full, and when it is most necessary that traffic should be unimpeded?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, he could only repeat the Answer he had given privately to the hon. Member, which was that the Government had nothing whatever to do with the management and control of the streets of the metropolis. The cost of the maintenance and repair of them was not defrayed out of moneys voted by Parliament, but out of rates levied upon ratepayers by local authorities. It was clear, therefore, that the management and control of the streets must be vested in the representatives of the ratepayers, who had to pay for the maintenance of them. Those representatives were the local authorities, and they, and not any Department of the Government were responsible for the state of the streets.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, Sir, to ask a Question with respect to the Established Church (Ireland) Bill, which stands for Committee on Friday next. I apprehend there may be many Members of this House who would not feel themselves obliged to return to London next week except for this Bill. I understood the Government to say they should not feel it to be their duty to attempt any Amendment of the Bill in Committee. I think it might be a convenience to the House if the right hon. Gentleman is in a condition to state what course the Government will take at that particular stage of the Bill?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, not to be misunderstood, I may say that my opinion of this Bill remains the same. I think it is a bad Bill and badly drawn; but I do not think it incumbent on us to attempt to improve it. Therefore I shall not offer any formal opposition in Committee.

IRELAND—UNIVERSITY OF DUBLIN.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON said, he wished to ask a Question about some Returns which had been ordered some time since and had not been produced, although they would require very little preparation. He hoped they would be forthcoming before the re-assembling of Parliament after Whitsuntide?

MR. DISRAELI, in reply, said, he would endeavour to get them issued during the holidays.

BOUNDARIES OF BOROUGHES.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. WALPOLE brought up the Report of the Select Committee. There were several corrections which required to be made in it before it could be circulated; but such instructions had been given that he hoped the Report would be in the hands of Members by Monday morning. In the meantime he was authorized and instructed by the Committee to communicate to the House the results of their labours, which, he hoped, would be satisfactory to the House. There were three classes of cases into which the boroughs as dealt with by the Committee might be divided—cases in which the Report of the Commission had been recommended for adoption; cases in which the Select Committee recommended that modifications should be made in the Report of the Commissioners; and cases in which the Committee recommended that the present boundaries should be retained. The first class, in which it was recommended that the Report of the Commissioners should be adopted, included the cases of Bolton, Chester, Greenwich, Newport (Monmouthshire), Northampton, Preston, Stalybridge, and Windsor. The cases in which the Committee recommended that the Report of the Commissioners should be modified were those of Chelsea, Cheltenham, Darlington, Gloucester, Hastings, Middlesbrough, Newport (Isle of Wight), Oldham, Salisbury, and Wilton. It was recommended that the present boundaries should be retained in the cases of Birkenhead, Birmingham, Bristol, Gateshead, Lambeth, Liverpool, Marylebone, Manchester, Nottingham, Portsmouth, Reading, South Shields, Tynemouth, Warwick and Wigan.

Report read; and ordered to lie on the Table, and to be printed. (No. 311.)

Minutes of the Proceedings of the Committee to be printed. (No. 311.)

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE WHITSUN HOLIDAYS.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House, at rising, do adjourn till Thursday next."

NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose to call attention to the site of the New Law Courts. That site was accepted by the House at a time when the embankment of the Thames had scarcely been commenced, and when it was impossible for the House to have decided fairly upon so important a point. There was an opportunity now, however, of carrying out a most magnificent design, and of carrying it out without additional expense and with the greatest advantage to the public. Three conditions should be satisfied in the choice of a site for such a building: there must be space, light, and air. Another point should be remembered—that things beautiful in themselves became more beautiful still by juxta-position. Thus, a woodland scene, and a venerable abbey, each beautiful in itself, had new charms when placed side by side. Apply this principle here. Nothing could well be finer as a building site in European capitals than the banks of the Thames. There was nothing like it in Europe, except the Neva and the Tagus. Well, place the Law Courts on the river side, and their architectural effect would be greatly enhanced. The three conditions requisite in public buildings were space, light, and air. The site on the Thames Embankment combined these requisites. At present it was proposed to build the Law Courts on a site which would give a frontage of 700 feet and a depth of 550 feet. Now, the Quarterly Review had shown clearly that that space was utterly inadequate. When erected the Law Courts would be surrounded by most miserable streets—such as Carey Street, Drury Lane, and its purlieus. He had seen an estimate showing that in order to procure the necessary approaches it would be necessary to spend another £1,000,000; and the Courts would be so crowded that they must be enlarged at a probable cost of £1,000,000 more. On the other hand, between King's College, adjoining Somerset House, and the Temple, you had 1,000 feet of river frontage, with a depth to the Strand of 700 feet—150 feet deeper and 300 feet longer than that of the Strand site. The accommodation would be admirable, the approaches would be made for you, the Underground Railway would be close by, and yet the House hesitated to acquire a site which would be unequalled in any capital in Europe, because they had formerly agreed to place the Law Courts in the Strand. Some of those Gentlemen (among them Mr. Abraham) who had been of opinion that the Strand would be the best position were now most anxious to place the Law Courts on the Embankment. The objection that, having bought the site you must make use of it, reminded him very much of the answer given in one of Mr. Dickens's works by a man who was getting very drunk on a bottle of bad port, and who, when remonstrated with, said, "I cannot help it; I have paid for the wine and I must drink it." Why should the House throw away £2,000,000 and lose all the advantages they would derive from the adoption of the Embankment site? They had performed a good and philanthropic work in purchasing the present site and clearing it from the dens of dirt and infamy with which it was crowded, even if they had never intended to place the New Courts there at all. The persons whom it would be necessary to turn out from the houses between King's College and the Temple might be transferred to the vacant ground which had been bought fronting the Strand. The calculation was that the land would cost about £1,000,000; but the result would be a great economy in comparison with the existing site, for the Embankment and the Strand would be ready-made approaches. They would have only one street to open out, leading from the Strand down to the River. He did not care how admirable the architecture might be, the building on the site now contemplated could not have the same beauty as if placed upon the Thames Embankment. They had now got a great opportunity of beautifying the metropolis, and not only that, but of doing honour to the whole country, for almost everyone was interested in whatever promoted that end. Some Gentlemen might consider that such a matter was not worthy of the attention of Parliament;

but he, on the contrary, had been much struck by the truth of a passage on this subject which he would read to the House—

“The greatest statesmen and philosophers have ever considered the cultivation of art, and the building and adornment of cities, as of primary political importance. Plato attributes the origin of legislation to the cultivation of the arts. Public buildings are the most lasting and effective ornaments of the country, and at the same time the cheapest the people can obtain.”

No matter how important matters of political feeling might be, it was most desirable that when we were going to spend millions of money we should be sure of doing what was right and beautiful. He had brought forward this subject thus briefly because he thought it desirable that the House of Commons should know the position in which it was placed, for upon it would rest the responsibility of whatever decision might be come to. To the House of Commons therefore he appealed, before it was too late, to take advantage of an opportunity of beautifying the metropolis which might never occur again, and which, if lost now, might be lost for ever.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he desired to express his concurrence in the recommendation of the hon. Gentleman. We had laid out a large sum of money, and obtained what he (Mr. M. Chambers) thought at the time would be the most eligible site for the New Law Courts. But since that expenditure and the partial clearing of the ground it had become known that it would be next to impossible to accomplish the original grand scheme. They had had the mortification of seeing that some of our ablest architects had failed in producing even one design adapted for the purposes in view. There were, however, reasons which might account for that failure. In the first place, the site was perfectly inadequate and unfit for its object. It was upon a steep descent, or ascent, and of a very irregular shape. In the next place, there would be the greatest difficulty in getting access to the edifice if erected. He had been informed by a gentleman of great experience that it would cost half as much as had been already expended to make proper approaches. Then, with regard to the nature and situation of the plot of land, he did not know whether any Gentleman in that House had ever walked in that unfashionable neighbourhood; but if so, they must have discovered that the houses to the west were the dirtiest and worst that could possibly be imagined, and to the north and east equally unsightly. Of course those houses could not continue in the neighbourhood of the Courts, for they would be an absolute disgrace. But what would be the result? Why, that these must all be bought and pulled down; and how much that would cost it was not for him to say. But everyone knew that as soon as a spot was improved and beautified, that moment the adjacent lands and premises were rendered three, six, and even tenfold more valuable than before. But besides, light and air could not be obtained without buying other property, hemmed in as the Courts would be by Carey Street, Bell Yard, and Chancery Lane. Then how were they to approach the Courts from Holborn and the West End; for access would be required from every side? Owing to the land being on a slope, it was most remarkable that in one of the two plans—the external and internal—which had been most approved, the Judges, counsel, witnesses, and, in fact, all who had to go to the Courts, would have to ascend, as he was told, nearly as high as the Chamber in which he was speaking, by means of a magnificent staircase. How they were ail to climb so high was matter for consideration. Some people said there were such things as lifts; but if they were to put such an expedient into practice how ridiculous they would make themselves. He ventured to say that we laid too much stress on external beauty, or florid ornament, and did not sufficiently consider, in the first instance, what the object of the building was, and what the purposes were for which it was intended. He thought solidity and sedateness should be consulted, and he was disposed to prefer the mixed Roman and Grecian or Palladian architecture to towers and turrets and the monastic or cathedral style proposed in the plans. Before any active measures were taken it should be ascertained by the authorities how much had been paid for the present site, what sum it would be likely to realize either now or a few years hence, and what a new site on the Thames Embankment would cost. His impression was that if the latter site were purchased and cleared the value of the present one would immediately be considerably raised, so as to preclude any danger of loss; and a building having the Embankment on one side and the Strand on the other would have an access far superior to one erected on the north of the Strand. We should not be in too great a hurry to do something simply because we had a site in hand. No plan having been adopted, no harm could ensue from waiting. It would be better even to sustain some loss than to have a bad site and a bad building; but from the experience of the Metropolitan Board of Works with regard to some of their purchases, he believed that if the matter were properly managed the change of site would be attended with gain rather than with loss.

MR. COWPER said, he felt some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baillie Cochrane)—who was known in that House for the interest which he took in matters of taste—in his desire for the erection of a fine building on the banks of the Thames, and he admitted that on purely æsthetic grounds there was much to be said on behalf of that site. He could not, however, admit that it was preferable to the present one in point of convenience and economy. It was obviously undesirable that the Courts should be bounded by two noisy thoroughfares; and the present site, while having the Strand on the one side, would have on the other streets which, though wide, would not be thoroughfares, except for persons attending the Courts. The slope, moreover, so far from being a disadvantage, would be a great advantage; for it would furnish a considerable amount of space for records on the lower side, while the ground floor would be at a proper height to prevent inconvenience from the traffic. The site, too, was just in the centre of the legal quarter, equi-distant from Lincoln's Inn, the Temple, and Gray's Inn, so that one object of a concentration of the Law Courts would be accomplished, and the convenience of the gentlemen of the long robe would be consulted. On the other hand, a site on the Embankment would cost at least twice as much; for the houses in Norfolk and Arundel Streets, and all the streets which would have to be pulled down, were of a more valuable description than those which had been purchased for the Carey Street site, the cost of which, moreover, had not exceeded the original estimate. If 1,000 feet instead of 700 feet were required, the extra space could be obtained at less expense on the present than on the proposed site; but he did not believe that such an enlargement was necessary. Many architects, indeed, had fancied that the present site was insufficient; but this question depended on the amount of accommodation which the Government might finally determine upon. It had not been necessary to consider this point before the final adoption of plans; but he felt confident that when the plans were ultimately adopted and were carefully scrutinized, with a view of avoiding any unnecessary Offices or Courts, additional space would not be required, and that it would not be necessary to expend much money upon the approaches to the Courts. The site was amply sufficient for the real and necessary wants of the Courts. There was another ground on which the House ought not to make any change. An immense inconvenience would be caused by the delay which would arise from changing the site—a delay of at least five years. Four years had already elapsed since an Act was passed authorizing the purchase of a site for the Courts of Law. He hoped the Government would endeavour to push on the work with as little delay as possible, and that, now the Report of the Attorney General had been received, they would give effect to the report of the judges as to the design to be adopted, so that the two architects might proceed to prepare a plan with reference to any change that might be determined upon as to the number of the Courts. He entirely demurred to the assertion that these designs were so bad that none were worthy to be selected. The reverse was the fact; for the difficulty of the judges arose rather from the excellence of the designs than their want of merit.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, it was evident that considerable delay would occur before the plans of the New Courts were settled, because the Commission of Judicature proposed great alteration in the system of the Courts of Law, and it would be absurd to build a Palace until they knew what Courts were wanted, and what Parliament would do upon the Report of that Commission. He thought it would be a great advantage to have the Law Courts built upon the Thames Embankment; because there they would be accessible both by land and water, and would not be surrounded by old and low streets and lanes like those which surrounded the selected site. Then as to the question of ornament and beauty the Thames Embankment was, in his opinion, far preferable to the present site. Having bought a site it might be said that it was necessary to make use of it; but if they had not, after all, got a good site, it was better not to use it. Dr. Johnson being at a tavern where the wine was not good, said that he called for the wine for the good of the house, and he abstained from drinking it for his own good. The site already bought was as good as a bank note, and, if sold, it would probably fetch more than the Government had given for it, especially if it were settled that the New Courts were to be built in immediate proximity to the site. With regard to the style of the new building, the plans were very picturesque, but none of them were, in his opinion, appropriate to the style of a Court of Justice. They seemed to be formed of reminiscences of feudal castles, cathedrals, and chapels, — one imitating the interior of Westminster Abbey, and others being reminiscences of the Sainte Chapelle at Paris and various picturesque buildings on the Continent. What was wanted was a plain, handsome, and noble style, with no ornament at all. He thought the Four Courts at Dublin was a building which would be a very good model of a structure of this kind. It was elegant, yet plain, with no ornament; yet it was admired by all persons of taste. Why could not the new Courts be built something in the style of Somerset House? It would be less expensive than the fanciful Gothic building in which they were assembled, on which thousands had been thrown away on ornament consisting of a repetition of panels and an excess of details, the result being very florid and very expensive. It was a building resembling a wedding cake, covered with ornaments, but unfit for the purpose for which it was intended. What was wanted for the New Courts of Law was a structure with an exterior plain and severe, and in accordance with the uses for which it was designed.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, his hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had expressed a hope that the Government would not hastily decide on the site of the New Courts of Law. But the Government had no decision to make in the matter. This question had been decided years ago by both Houses of Parliament — not hastily, nor by one decision, but after consulting the highest authorities, and by repeated Acts of Parliament, extending over a series of years. Ten years ago a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into this very question of site. That Commission reported in favour of the present site. Parliament sanctioned the purchase, which was now virtually completed, and the whole legal profession were anxiously awaiting the proper steps to be taken to carry out the intentions of Parliament; yet at such a moment the hon. Member had thought proper to raise the question of an entire change of site. If the question could be re-opened, no doubt much might be said in favour of the site of the Thames Embankment; but the question had been definitively settled by the Legislature. In answer to the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Mr. Montagu Chambers), he was able to state that the site had cost £789,000 up to the present moment, and there were additional purchases and contingencies, so that the total amount for the purchase of the site would amount in a very short time to £896,000. The hon. and learned Member asked what they could sell the site for, two, five, or ten years hence? It was impossible to form anything but the most vague conjecture as to that. They knew what the site had cost; but what it would sell for if put into the market was a matter of speculation about which he could give no opinion offhand. Then it was said it was a drawback to the present site that the Strand was not on a level with Carey Street; but he thought it would be found that there was as great, if not a greater, slope between the Strand and the Thames Embankment. There could be no doubt that, as far as the suitors were concerned, the Carey Street site would be extremely convenient. Then, again, the House had, from time to time, appropriated considerable funds for one of the best public buildings of which we could at present boast — namely, the Public Record Depository, behind Chancery Lane. Including the sum of £60,000 sanctioned by the House the other day, during the last few years upwards of £200,000 had been expended on that building. It was of the greatest importance that the public records should be kept in immediate proximity to the Courts of Law; and that point ought also to be taken into view when they were asked to place the Courts of Law on a different site from that which Parliament had decided upon. He did not think, therefore, that the present Government ought to take upon themselves the responsibility of changing the decision of the Legislature on that matter; and he felt that if anything of that kind were now attempted, not only would the greatest delay ensue, but in all probability there would be an immense outlay incurred, he did not say of public money, because the fund applicable to that purpose was the Suitors' Fund, but there would be an immense demand made upon that fund, the result of which no human being could tell. Most probably, however, at the end of four, five, or six years, when the new site had been purchased and cleared, and when the Government of the day had selected the architect for erecting the building, other Gentlemen would rise in the House and say that the circumstances were altered, that a still better site might be obtained in the east, the west, the north, or the south, the whole question would be left in suspense, and no final decision whatever would be come to. On the question of space, he agreed with the right hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper). The site already acquired was seven acres; and if the Courts of Law could not be accommodated on that space, their requirements must be very extraordinary indeed. Under those circumstances, as his hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had made no Motion, he hoped he would be content with the discussion which had just taken place.

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can inform the House what steps he intends to take in reference to the contemplated measure for expediting the dissolution of Parliament on the new constituency in the autumn? He believed that both sides of the House would be agreed that it was desirable that as little uncertainty as possible should prevail in reference to that important subject; and, before they separated for a short holiday, he wished to remind the House of what he considered to be the condition in which they stood with respect to it. The right hon. Gentleman at the Head of the Government had brought the matter before them in a Ministerial statement about three weeks ago. The right hon. Gentleman then told them that Her Majesty, acting on his advice, had announced her readiness to dissolve Parliament as soon as the state of Public Business would permit; and, he added, that by that he meant the autumn of this year, when, he believed, an appeal could be made to the new constituencies. The right hon. Gentleman informed them that the House of Commons having come to a vote opposed to the views of the Government upon a most important point of public policy, the Government only held Office upon the condition of making that Appeal at the earliest possible moment; and he repeated that assertion on last Monday, in urging them to proceed as rapidly as they could with the Scotch Reform Bill. On the following day the right hon. Gentleman in replying to a question from the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) said the matter had been under the consideration of the Government, and that he was bound to state that the difficulties connected with it were greater than had at first been contemplated, and the answer of the right hon. Gentleman must be his (Mr. Foster's) excuse for bringing the subject, at that moment, under the notice of the House. It appeared to him, after having looked into the question as carefully as he could, that the difficulties were not insuperable—that it would be possible so to facilitate the registrations as to enable Parliament to meet in the middle of November—say, Thursday, November 12. By the present law, six weeks were allowed for the work of the Revising Barristers; but he believed that if they appointed more barristers, that work might be completed in four weeks. Then, again, the printing of the register, under the present law, occupied two months; but that was an alteration of the previous law, under which the register was printed in one month, and he saw no reason why they should not return to that former system. Thirty-five days were at present allowed for the actual process of election; but he thought that on an emergency, twenty-five days would be found sufficient for the completion of the whole of the elections. Then there might be a few days gained by shortening the time within which claims and objections could be furnished. He did not believe there could be any change made with respect to the date at which the new registration was to begin. The existing law declared that it should begin on the 1st of August; and he did not think it would be possible to ante-date that event. Under any circumstances, some new legislation would be necessary. The 10th section of the 6 Vict. c. 18, provided that the town clerk of every borough should issue his precept to the overseers, to make out the lists before the 10th of June in each year. The precepts should, of course, be issued for those additions to the boundaries to be made under the Boundary Bill, and he supposed it would not be possible to get that measure passed before the 10th of June; so that some fresh legislation would be necessary, in reference to that matter. That was not, however, an important point, because there would be time between the 10th of June and the 11th of July for the overseers to prepare the lists. Under all the circumstances, it appeared to him that it would be quite possible for Parliament to meet in the middle of November—say, the 12th of that month, so that they might begin business on Tuesday, the 17th, which would be the same time at which they had commenced business last year. But other Members might entertain a different opinion upon that subject; and that being the case, he hoped that the Government and the House would take into their consideration the suggestion which had been made by his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), that the question should be referred to a Select Committee. There would be this advantage in adopting such a course, that as the Committee would no doubt consist of Members from both sides of the House, any decision to which it might come would be regarded as one perfectly irrespective of party or personal considerations. Many Members, it was true, objected to having their holidays cut short by an autumn Session, but, on the other hand, a longer Recess with several months spent in canvassing, would come to much the same thing. Whatever might be the general opinion, however, he was sure the House would not approach this question in any personal or party spirit. How an early dissolution would tell on party aims, he, for one, had not the remotest idea. There were several reasons for having as early a dissolution as possible. Undoubtedly it might be found that the difficulties in the way of the adoption of such a course might be insuperable, and that the new elections could only be hurried forward at the risk of disqualifying the voters who had been enfranchised under the new Reform Bill. In the latter event, of course, it would not be advisable to have an immediate dissolution, for certainly it was the first duty of the House to take care that the new electors to whom votes had been given by the English, Irish, and Scotch Bills, should not be disqualified in consequence of any haste in the registration. But if there were no such difficulties he thought little difference of opinion could exist as to public convenience being promoted by an early election. Even the right hon. Gentleman opposite had himself stated that a great question of public policy having been debated, and the House having arrived at a decision adverse to the opinion entertained by Her Majesty's Ministers, it was important that the opinion of the country should be taken without delay. There was another reason why the decision of the country should be given as soon as possible, and that was that the longer this great question was in debate, the worse it would be for England and Ireland. If it turned out, as was urged from the other side, that the feeling of the country coincided with that of the minority of the House, the quicker that opinion was known the better, in order that Gentlemen on the Opposition side might give up a fruitless agitation. If, on the contrary, the majority of the people in the country coincided with the majority of the House, even Gentlemen from the North of Ireland would agree that the sooner the question was settled for the interests of Ireland the better. The saving of three months during the present year might be the means of saving much bad blood, agitation, and hot water in Ireland. He did not think the question whether or not the present Administration possessed the confidence of Parliament was of sufficient importance to justify the putting of the country to inconvenience in the matter of a General Election; but nobody could deny that owing to exceptional circumstances the Constitution of the country was strained at the present time. Her Majesty's Ministers were holding Office in a manner that was contrary to the usual custom of this country. They held it in opposition to a majority of the House, upon a question of the very utmost importance. The Government had stated that they held Office simply because, in the present exceptional circumstances, they found it difficult to appeal to the country, though they were most anxious to make such an appeal. He gave them credit for that being their view, and upon the whole he believed that they had not taken a wrong course in determining to appeal to the new constituencies. That however, was only another reason why the Constitution of the country should be strained as little as possible, and that the appeal should be made at the earliest possible opportunity. These were the reasons which induced him to put his Question to the First Lord of the Treasury.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. HIBBERT said, he could fully confirm what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Bradford as to the possibility of having an election in the middle of October, and he thought that only very slight alterations would be required in our electoral machinery for the purpose of accomplishing that end; but the real question to be determined was whether the House were really desirous to have a sitting in November? He went so far with his hon. Friend as this—that he should be very glad, in common he was sure with most hon. Members, to have the opportunity of eating his Christmas dinner in peace, and unless there was to be an election during the present year, that desirable object could not be attained. According to the present law Parliament could not be dissolved until after the 31st of December, and consequently there could be no elections till the beginning of January; but without going as far as his hon. Friend proposed, and without even attempting to alter any part of our electoral machinery, he wished to point out that we might have an election in December, so that the new House might meet either in the early part, or the middle of January. Thus the unpleasantness of canvassing during Christmas would be got rid of. He would briefly indicate how this might be accomplished. Under the present law the lists must be handed over by the Revising Barristers to the clerks of the peace on the 31st of October, and the clerks of the peace were allowed two months from that time to prepare the lists, by putting them into alphabetical order, and causing them to be printed. But prior to the Act of last year the clerks of the peace were only allowed one month to prepare the lists, and were obliged to have them ready on the 30th of November. Now, if a return were made as to what was the law on this subject previous to last year the elections might easily occur in the middle of December, and the House might then meet not less than thirty-five days afterwards, or some time in the middle of January. That would be one way of getting over the inconvenience and unpleasantness of a long canvass during the winter months. He did not, however, say that the object of his hon. Friend could not be accomplished; for he thought there might be an autumnal meeting of the House in November, if the House desired it. That object might be attained, either in the way just sketched out by his hon. Friend, or in the way suggested by the Solicitor General some evenings ago. At all events, he was sure that all hon. Members must desire to prevent the long period of excitement which would be inevitable if the elections were postponed till after Christmas.

LORD ELCHO: Sir, last evening when the Scotch Reform Bill was under discussion the late Lord Advocate said it was the unanimous wish of the House that the dissolution should be hurried forward. I expressed my dissent by a "No," which found a response on both sides of the House. Now I think this is a question which affects other persons in this House besides the right hon. Gentlemen who sit upon the front Benches. It affects the convenience of private Members, and the interests of the public, though I perceive it is too much regarded simply as a question between right hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House and right hon. Gentlemen on the other. On this side of the House you have right hon. Gentleman who, no doubt, suppose it is not in the interest of the country that a Government in a minority should continue in Office. On the other hand, we have Gentlemen on that side of the House who have thought it their duty to carry on the Government with a minority. I should remind the House, however, that although the Government were in a large minority on the Irish Church question, yet they were in a majority on the great constitutional question which has occupied so much of our time. Last year, when the English Reform Bill was under discussion, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) did all he could to carry certain propositions which would have turned out the Government, but he failed to do so. Last night we had the Scotch Reform Bill under discussion, and again the right hon. Gentleman spoke against the proposition of the Government, and his party to a certain extent supported him; but what was the result? Why, the propositions of the Government were carried. On this great constitutional question, therefore, the Government has been able to command a majority. Is there, then, any important public reason which would justify the forcing of our whole system of registration, and the torturing of the machinery of registration, in order that two months, or perhaps one month earlier, a vote may be taken in this House as to which right hon. Gentleman is to be at the head of affairs? I maintain that there is no public reason which justifies or demands that such a course should be taken, and as a private Member I boldly say, that after the hard work of a long Session, we ought not to be put to the inconvenience of spending the months of August, September, and October in electioneering. I say boldly that I want to have those three months free. I want my holiday in August, September, and October, instead of having it sacrificed in order that an early decision may be come to as to whether this or that right hon. Gentleman should be in power. At the same time, I, with other private Members, shall be quite willing to make the sacrifice if the public interest required that that decision should be precipitated. The speech of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) showed the great difficulties in the way of bringing about a dissolution in time to enable the House to re-assemble on the 12th or 17th of November. You were to repeal and enact, and, indeed, such a description of the difficulties to be got over was given that it seemed to me the argument by which the hon. Gentleman attempted to show how possible it would be to do, what I hope is unnecessary, proved the impossibility, or, at any rate, the impolicy of doing it. The right hon. Gentleman says that if we postpone a dissolution we shall be spending all the autumn—the time we should naturally spend on the hills of Scotland, or the hills of Switzerland, or, at any rate, in enjoying the country—in canvassing our constituents. Let the hon. Gentleman speak for himself, if his constituents have so little confidence in him that he has to spend a whole holiday in going about from door to door canvassing them. I hope my constituents have more confidence in me than to require that I should go about from door to door for three months waiting upon them. I maintain that the public interests, so far from requiring all this, require that it should not be done. The hon. Gentleman talks about registration agents, but a letter appeared in The Times this morning from the gentleman who is, perhaps, the best authority in this kingdom on the question—an authority which, at any rate, the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) will not dispute; for it is in a great measure to the exertions of Mr. Sidney Smith the Secretary of the Liberal Registration Society in London, that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues, including the worthy Alderman (Alderman Lawrence), owe their seats in this House. Mr. Smith's opinion is not that of a theorist, as the opinion of the hon. Member for Bradford is, for the hon. Member is no more competent than any other Member who is not a lawyer, nor a practical registrar, to express an opinion on the subject. What does this practical man say? He says—

"Sir,—May I be permitted to ask" [not on behalf of the right hon. Members on the other side, but] "on behalf of the world outside the House of Commons, what urgent necessity there is for hastening the business of registration and the dissolution of Parliament?"

"If the new constituencies are to be properly tested, the register must be rightly formed. Every official has a new and excessively ill-drawn Act to understand and to work; every Revising Barrister has to dispose of a fresh statute, bristling with points of doubt which will all have to be argued out, and to reconcile, if he can, anomalies betwixt the new and the old Acts, which will puzzle all concerned."

The whole letter is equally to the point. Towards the close of it, he says—

"If the General Election is to be anything but a scramble, in which nobody will be allowed time to discover the colours under which he would march, it should not be before January at the earliest."

MR. GOSCHEN: Which party would gain by it? Read the latter part of the letter.

LORD ELCHO: I am ready to read the whole, but I do not wish to trouble the House. I had marked that passage to read—

"The only faction that can gain by precipitating the business of revision is that which would be weakest if the new statute were duly carried out, and that is certainly not the Liberal party."

I never said it was in the hope that you would gain by precipitating things that you wished to precipitate them. All I say is that you are of opinion it is absolutely necessary in the interests of the public that the two sides of the House should change places—because you believe they will ultimately do so—two months sooner than this Gentleman says is compatible with a fair testing of the constituencies—instead of a scramble—which testing, he says, ought to be in January instead of November. I can enter into the feelings of the right hon. Gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury Benches—to a certain extent, unconstitutionally, because they have not a real and trusty majority at their backs; but we must not forget how they are there, and that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire inherited from Lord Palmerston a majority of 70. ["Question!"] There can be nothing so much to the question as that that majority was destroyed simply by the action taken on this side of the House —[“No, no!” and “Yes, yes!”]—by the mode in which this side of the House was led. I can understand the feelings of honourable men, who must naturally writhe under the accusations of tenacity to Office which have been made so freely this Session from this side of the House—so freely, indeed, that they had been reproved from the same side—and I therefore can understand the anxiety and the strict sense of duty which impel these Gentlemen to meet this accusation at the earliest opportunity, and even to force the registration, so as to have the question decided yea or nay whether they are to continue sitting on the Treasury Benches. But, on the other hand, the interests and convenience of private Members of this House, and the importance and necessity of obtaining a purified register and a fair decision from the constituencies, furnish, I maintain, stronger grounds for delay than can be shown for pressing forward the Dissolution and torturing the machinery of election in the way the hon. Gentleman has suggested. Although it may be painful to the Government, it is their duty to hold on until the question at issue can be fairly tried, and not to put us to the unnecessary inconvenience we should be put to if the course suggested by the hon. Member for Bradford were adopted.

MR. CLAY said, he had never accused right hon. Gentlemen opposite of undue tenacity to Office. On the contrary, he was of opinion that the course they had taken was the right one. Although it might be doubted whether any Prime Minister ever had a right to a dissolution before leaving Office, he believed that, if ever a Prime Minister had that right, it was the right hon. Gentleman opposite, not on the ground on which he himself had put it, that the present Parliament was not elected under his auspices, or those of his predecessor; but because his Government had passed one of the most remarkable and important Acts in the history of this country, and he had every right to ask whether the country gave him credit for it or did not. He had his own opinion as to the answer that would be given, and thought the country would rather give the credit to the Liberal side of the House; right hon. and hon. Gentleman opposite had as good a right to their opinion; and it certainly was a question which they were entitled to put to the country. That feeling was very general on the Liberal side of the House; and it was because of that that remarkable forbearance had been shown to the Government. That forbearance was entirely due to the very peculiar circumstances in which the Government were placed. It must be recollected that the ordinary chance of a dissolution was almost denied to the present Government by the necessity of appealing to the new constituencies. Nothing but the direst necessity would have warranted the Government in dissolving with the existing constituencies. Under ordinary circumstances, he believed the right hon. Gentleman opposite would not, but for this reason, have delayed a dissolution the first time he was beaten by a majority of 60. At that time a dissolution would have been almost wanton, and would have brought together a Parliament which could have sat only for a few months and could have settled nothing. It would have been a serious inconvenience to hon. Members, and, which is of far greater importance, a serious disaster to the country, to have had two dissolutions within a year of each other. It was owing to these circumstances that we had not a dissolution two months ago, and that very proper forbearance was shown to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. It certainly behoved the Government, for the sake of their own characters and to justify the forbearance to them under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, to see that not a moment was lost in consulting the country as soon as it was possible to do so. The country undoubtedly expected it; and he had been asked over and over again, “Do you believe the Government are sincere in telling us that they will expedite matters as much as possible in order to give us an early dissolution?” He always said he believed such was their intention; and he still held that belief. Whether that were so or not, it was the right thing for them to do, and for the Opposition to insist upon as the only means of justifying the forbearance they had shown. At the commencement of the Session, looking forward to the difficulties that were sure to arise, to the probability of the Government being in a minority, and to the probability of a Vote of Want of Confidence being moved, which he and others, however, had determined not to be parties to, it was his idea that the proper Business of the Session was the passing of the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, and of the Bill against Corrupt Practices at Elections. That was the Business that Parliament ought to endeavour to finish now, and the Opposition ought to insist on a dissolution at the earliest possible moment.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, after it has been admitted that this Parliament would have been dissolved were it not for exceptional circumstances, it appears to me that we are not in a position to deal with contested measures, or measures of public importance about which there may be great difference of opinion. The supplemental measures of Reform relating to Scotland and Ireland—which may be considered to form part of the original question of Reform—should alone be the measures dealt with by this Parliament. I have doubts whether the Bill with regard to Corrupt Practices at Elections ought to be decided by this Parliament, because it is proposed by it to transfer the jurisdiction over contested elections to Judges out of the House. And we can never get that jurisdiction back if we part with it, without the consent of the other House. Therefore, a question of that importance should not be disposed of by the present Parliament. There is also the Telegraph Bill, involving questions of importance that will lead to long discussions. There is also the measure relating to the Importation of Foreign Cattle. That will lead to discussion. I think that all these measures had better be deferred to a new Parliament, rather than that we should take upon ourselves the responsibility of deciding upon them. This may be considered a dead Parliament, and we ought not to attempt to settle these great questions in it. I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, whether he will give us some assurance that the business of the Session will be limited to the subjects to which I have referred?

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, he wished to remind the House of the position in which they stood with regard to the Corrupt Practices Bill. In 1860 his hon. Friend Mr. Bentinck, who was then Member for West Norfolk, proposed as an Instruction on going into Committee upon Lord John Russell's Reform Bill that the Committee should have power to deal with the question of bribery and corruption. Lord Palmerston, with his usual good sense, assented to that view, and the Instruction was adopted. In 1866 he (Sir Rainald Knightley) made a similar Motion. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) thought proper to object to it; but the House re-affirmed their former decision, that bribery and corruption were part and parcel of the same question. In deference to this repeated expression of opinion, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) last year said he would either deal with the question of bribery and corruption in the Reform Bill, or on the same night would bring in a separate measure. He did not reproach the right hon. Gentleman for failing to carry out that intention, for circumstances made it almost impossible to do so. But both sides of the House were pledged to deal with the question of bribery and corruption, and as soon as the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills were dealt with he hoped that the Government would proceed with the Bribery Bill without any delay.

MR. OTWAY said, he had not hitherto uttered one word about the "clinging to Office" which was said to characterize the Government; but, on the other hand, he had seen nothing of the "writhing" process which the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had described as going on upon the Treasury Benches. He was not surprised that the noble Lord should have taken advantage even of this opportunity of expressing his sympathy with her Majesty's Government. But on this occasion it seemed to be wasted. He (Mr. Otway) thought that Ministers retained their seats with astonishing calmness and composure, although there had been a Ministerial crisis about once a fortnight. The fact was that the question of the gravest importance just now was not what party should be in Office; the credit of the House itself was at stake. Of late the House of Commons had fallen into great discredit throughout the country. Scenes had occurred there which had rarely been witnessed before; and those who presided over the affairs of the country had shown such an indifference to public opinion and to constitutional usage as had never been shown by any Government of recent days. Now, he did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown would say anything on this matter which he thought would bring discredit upon the House of Commons. But as the right hon. Gentleman had said it was his earnest wish to dissolve as soon as possible, and the Solicitor General added that means might be taken for facilitating a General Election, it was desirable, that the House should know whether the right hon. Gentleman would on an early day introduce a Bill to shorten the time between the dissolution and the elections. Not only was the honour of public men at stake on this occasion, but the House would remember that the longer this question of the Irish Church was kept in abeyance, the greater would be the turmoil and the disorder in Ireland itself. Again, from the moment the House separated it was tolerably certain that canvassing would be carried on all over the country. For instance, if he (Mr. Otway) gathered correctly the opinions of Scotchmen, the noble Lord must make great exertions in order to secure his return for Haddingtonshire, and would have to make a larger distribution of tobacco than at the last election. He believed the feeling of the country to be that the right hon. Gentleman should do all in his power to expedite the General Election, and he trusted that he would make a declaration to that effect.

MR. WHALLEY said, he did not think that any arguments could be advanced on public grounds in favour of an early dissolution. Hon. Members were well entitled to a quiet holiday when they left Westminster; besides which, the period between the dissolution and January was short enough for the country to form an opinion upon the great question of Popery and Protestantism on which the new Parliament would probably be elected.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, with reference to the inquiry of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton (Mr. Milner Gibson) as to the conduct of Business, I thought I had before expressed the views of the Government upon that subject. Our opinion is that we should confine our labours, generally speaking, to that which is necessary; and I should describe as "necessary" only the supplementary Reform Bills and the Estimates. With regard to the Bribery and Corruption Bill, I myself should relinquish it with a pang. It is, in my opinion, most desirable, if not absolutely under the circumstances, indispensable; and if, after proceeding with the supplementary Reform Bills, and the Public Business which is absolutely necessary, we have time also to carry the Bribery and Corruption Bill, there will be no lack of effort on the part of the Government to do so. Then, with regard to other measures. We have allowed some of them, such as the Bankruptcy Bill, to drop. There are, however, two measures, which have been especially alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, the Telegraphs Bill and the Bill with regard to the Importation of Foreign Cattle which have not been formally withdrawn. There are special reasons why these subjects should be brought under the consideration of the House; but then it will be for the House to express an opinion whether they should be proceeded with or not, or whether certain objects of public interest connected with them might not be accomplished without going on with the entire measures. With regard to the inquiry of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) as to the steps which we intend to take in reference to the contemplated measure for expediting the dissolution of Parliament and the appeal to the new constituency in the autumn, I have nothing, certainly, more precise to say than I had forty-eight hours ago, when the subject was introduced to my notice. It is a matter on which it is useless to speak unless you are prepared to speak with great precision. When I originally made to the House that declaration to which the hon. Member adverted—namely, that I was assured by those in whom I placed confidence that an autumn Session was practicable—and of course at that time I never contemplated a Session earlier than November—I felt that it was a very great object to obtain that result, and great incredulity was expressed by many hon. Gentlemen opposite. It was even intimated that I had made a random observation without having consulted the Law Officers. The right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) brought the matter before this House, but he brought it forward in a spirit of scepticism and incredulity, not for the purpose of pressing the Government to accomplish an autumn Session—or facilitating that operation, but rather of making some critical remarks by which he wished to prove that it was impossible. Upon that occasion the Solicitor General—though it has been insinuated that I had not consulted with the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject—placed before the House the general conclusions at which he had arrived. But that was not a mature statement on the part of the Government, but was rather intended to show to the House that we were in earnest, and had given considerable attention to the matter. We were obliged to make that statement then in self-defence; but it was not put forward by the Solicitor General as a complete and mature exposition of the views of the Government, and the means by which they hoped to accomplish their purpose. Well, the subject has been more or less under our consideration since that period, and though some time has elapsed, not a day has been lost so far as regards the ultimate accomplishment of our object. But we had not only to consider what were the best means by which that object could be accomplished; some regard was also due to the progress of other Public Business, and our calculations must be affected in some degree by that consideration. I said when I spoke first that it was very important that the Boundary Bill should be passed by the 10th of June. That was an element in our calculation, but, unfortunately, now there is no chance that it can be passed so soon. Then you are to have questions of boundary with regard to the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills which are of a very vague and disturbing character. But, at the same time, I am bound to state that these are difficulties which I think may be overcome; but, nevertheless, we must remember that in preparing any proposition for the consideration of the House, it is of the utmost importance that no suspicion should enter into the minds of the new constituencies of this country that there is any attempt to neutralize the great privileges which we, in my opinion most wisely, accorded to them last year, by, as it were, hurrying and hustling them in obtaining their electoral privileges. And although I have had schemes put before me for reducing the period of registration—which I must say were far from impracticable, though they might have been expensive—but in a matter of this kind the House would not hesitate as to the expense—still, in other respects they proposed such a serious reduction of the time for making claims and defending and vindicating rights, as to require the utmost delicacy and consideration on the part of this House, otherwise the result might be of an undesirable and even a calamitous character. Because, if there be an impression after all that, though we have given those privileges to the great body of the people, yet at the last moment they have been deprived of time to avail themselves fully of their new rights, the House of Commons that would be elected would be one in which the mass of the people would not have confidence. That consideration has not been absent from the mind of the Government, nor should be absent from that of the House for a moment, and in any propositions which we shall make to accomplish an earlier dissolution than the law at present provides, that consideration will necessarily influence us. I must repeat to the House that no time has really been lost, and that Her Majesty's Government have given to this subject a constant, and, I hope, a candid consideration.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, there are two branches of this subject. One of them relates to the Bills as to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton (Mr. Milner Gibson) has inquired whether, in case they are contested, the Government would go forward with them or not, and on that matter the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown is a perfectly just and fair answer. He says that in his opinion all Business ought to be dropped except the measures necessary as a supplement to the Reform Act, unless there be some very special cases indeed. I think the right hon. Gentleman has specified in a very fair manner all the measures essentially supplementary to the Reform Bill. I presume him to mean the Irish Bill, the Scotch Bill, and the Boundary Bill. I think the House entirely sympathizes with the right hon. Gentleman in his strong desire to dispose, if possible, of the Corrupt Practices Bill. But, with regard to the Foreign Cattle Market Bill and the Electric Telegraph Bill, we are not precisely cognizant as yet of the special reasons which make the Government desirous of carrying them forward at this moment. As to the Foreign Cattle Market Bill, I confess I am very sceptical, if not extremely jealous, of the policy it involves; but I will not give any opinion upon it now. But, with regard to the other branch of the question, I cannot speak with quite so much satisfaction. And here I greatly regret that, after my hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) introduced the subject in a tone which could give offence to none, and which involved no matter of controversy, my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), in that indulgence if not of his sympathies, at all events of his antipathies, found it necessary to trouble, perplex, and embroil the question by the introduction of very invidious, not to say offensive topics. Now, Sir, I must very frankly make this protest in the face of the noble Lord. The noble Lord says he is anxious for the credit of the House. It is not for the credit of the House that this matter, with respect to the time of dissolution, should be made to turn upon the holidays of the noble Lord or any other person. I must say that ingenuous confession of his is one which I must take the liberty not to pass by in silence, and I think the noble Lord himself will feel it is not a consideration upon which this matter ought to turn. [Lord ELCHO : Hear, hear.] I am glad we are agreed in that; it was a part of his speech on which the noble Lord dwelt with some emphasis, and it elicited some cheers from another quarter of the House. Well, the Session of Parliament, by the very declaration of the right hon. Gentleman, is a maimed and mutilated Session. It is a Session in which the House is quite averse from carrying forward a variety of important measures, not simply from want of time, because we have not yet reached that period of the year at which measures would have been dropped from want of time, but on account of the political situation which has arisen. What is that situation? On an occasion upon which this House arrived at certain votes with regard to the Irish Church, the right hon. Gentleman attached, I will not say an exaggerated, but an enormous importance to those votes. I thought, however, that there was some degree of exaggeration in the remark of the right hon. Gentleman—that the consequences were more important and vital than those of a foreign conquest. But at the same time he recognized, and properly recognized, the facts then before him as constituting what we in our peaceful way looked upon as a constitutional crisis. The right hon. Gentleman, though he did not say so at the moment, stated afterwards that the votes of Parliament did not justly represent the opinions of the country. That is the opinion which he has expressed, and he holds that opinion irrespectively of other doctrines to which I do not assent, but which the right hon. Gentleman has sometimes laid down with regard to the general right of a Minister to dissolve Parliament. But with respect to the case of dissolving Parliament when the Advisers of the Crown consider that the existing Parliament does not actually represent the country, they are clearly in the right when they undertake upon a bonâ fide declaration of that kind to appeal to the sense of the people. But do the facts supply the reasons for delaying that appeal which my noble Friend said had been supplied in this case? Undoubtedly, it would have been a great waste of labour on the part of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), if he had entered into an elaborate argument and exposition of facts which he naturally supposed to be present to the mind of every man. The Government have recognized them; they have declared that a case had arisen either for resignation of their offices or for an appeal to the people. Well, now, it is the A B C of Parliamentary knowledge that when such an appeal to the people is to be made under circumstances like these—that is to say, as an alternative to resignation, it is to be made at the first practicable moment, and I am certainly astonished that a man of the experience of the noble Lord should have to be instructed in a truth so elementary. Well, let me look back to what has happened in former years. There were three of those cases. In 1841, a case of this kind arose. A Vote of Want of Confidence having been passed, the supplies were voted for a few months, Parliament was dissolved, and the new Parliament met in August. [Lord ELCHO : There had been a Reform Bill.] I will come to that presently, for I like to deal with things in order. In all these cases, it was a matter of course, and according to the practice of the Constitution, that the appeal should be made at the earliest possible moment, and that the new Parliament should meet immediately after that appeal. The case of 1841 was a remarkable instance of that kind, and in neither instance was there any direct declaration of want of confidence in the Government, but the Government was in a minority in a general vague sense—not that they were unable to carry on the Business of the country, or that they did not sometimes obtain majorities in the House; but they were in circumstances which the Government itself recognized as rendering it its duty to wind up the business of the Session, and appeal to the people. The appeal was made in due course, and the new Parliament met for the purposes of an autumn Session. There was, therefore, nothing special in the inquiry of my hon. Friend to justify the noble Lord in going out of his way to find or impute motives to that inquiry. The affair, says the noble Lord, is not an affair between Gentlemen on this Bench and Gentlemen opposite. It is, however, so far an affair between different Members of the House that the intention of an appeal to the people is that they should affirm either the policy which has been pursued on this side of the House, or the policy which has been pursued upon that. Both sides, I am certain, with the exception of the noble Lord, and of an hon. Member opposite must recognize that the Constitution requires the earliest possible appeal to the people, in order to bring our machinery of Parliamentary government again into play. Well, then, the question is, how is that to be done? Now, here, I admit, the interpolation of the noble Lord is in place; that is to say, there has been a new Reform Bill, and consequently, the question arises how far this matter is qualified by that circumstance which renders the machinery of the present constituencies a machinery which it is undesirable to use for ascertaining the opinion of the people. Well, then, we come to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, which was very much like an authoritative declaration that, according to the sentiments and judgments of men well skilled in these matters, there might be an autumn Session. That statement was made, I think, a full month ago. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: On the 4th of May.] It was made, my hon. Friend informs me, on the 4th of May, and on the 29th of May the right hon. Gentleman gives us to understand that he does not see his way; that he has a vague hope something may be effected, but cannot say what or when; and that he cannot indicate the time when he will tell us his intentions. I must say there is something very extraordinary in this change of tone on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. It was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to know his own meaning at the time when he told us that in the judgment of skilled and experienced persons it was practicable to have an autumn Session. The right hon. Gentleman says no time has been lost. I entirely disagree with him. Every day that passes is a day lost, because the operation to be effected is an operation upon the machinery of registration. It has no connection with the progress of Business in this House. The progress of Business is, it may be, very important with respect to a limited number of Bills, and as to those we can see our way perfectly well; but what is really important is that we should now ascertain, at the earliest practicable moment, what can or cannot be done to expedite the operation of the machinery for the new registration. Now, it was with reference to that point that I suggested the other day that a small Committee might possibly afford a convenient instrument for arriving at a conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman made no response to that suggestion either then or to-night; and, of course, if the Government have a plan to propose, it might be more advantageous than to refer the subject to a Select Committee. It is plain, however, that if day after day and week after week slip from us, while the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman, instead of becoming more clear and precise as we approach the point, become more vague and ambiguous and misty—if we pass the 10th of June, when the first step in the registration is to be taken, and the 20th of June, when the second step is to be taken, and if all those periods which we intend to shorten are to be allowed to slip away—why the question will practically decide itself. I wish, therefore, to impress on the mind of the right hon. Gentleman much more than it seems to be impressed at present the gravity of this question, and the absolute necessity, after he himself laid the ground in a declaration of the most solemn kind, which, in my judgment, exists for bringing it to an early issue. We have now come to the Whitsun holidays, and must pass another week in total ignorance of what course the Government intend to take. I hope that when the House re-assembles, the right hon. Gentleman will be in a position to make a distinct and determinate declaration of his intentions. If he is not in a position to make such a declaration, I think that, looking to all the circumstances, and to the undoubted and unquestionable argument applicable to the subject, as well as to the precedents to which I have referred, it will become necessary—in default of just action on the part of the Ministers of the Crown—a default which I, for one, should deeply regret—for independent Members to consider whether they ought not to take some steps of a definite character for the purpose of obtaining the judgment of Parliament upon the subject.

MR. PAULL said, he was glad that reference had been made to the shame and disgust which prevailed out of doors with regard to the language which had been used in the House during the last few weeks, and which had recently called forth a cutting rebuke from the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne). Only last night an hon. Member gave the lie direct, and was obliged to retract, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had just described the remarks of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) as offensive. [Mr. GLADSTONE: My words were "Not to say offensive."] Well, that was a negative way of saying that they were offensive. There had been a great number of dictatorial speeches, and the exhibition of angry passions which ought to have been kept under control; and he was bound to say that not the least dictatorial speech of all was that which had just been delivered by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He could see no reason why the House should listen to such speeches or why such language should be used, and surely those who had most contributed to the delays of this Session had the least right to press the Government to forego the satisfaction of carrying necessary and desirable measures. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Milner Gibson) in his usual fascinating manner, had appealed to the Government to withdraw all measures except those relating to Reform; but he had omitted to mention a little Bill which was quite unnecessary and which might be dropped with very great advantage—the four-clause Suspensory Bill. What justification could there be for proceeding with that Bill, which would throw all ecclesiastical affairs in Ireland into confusion for twelve months? How had the proper Business of the Session been delayed but by the sudden introduction of proposals for disestablishing the Irish Church? What object that procedure could serve, the right hon. Member for South Lancashire could best say. The right hon. Gentleman knew well the fire-brand he was throwing down. In fact, of all the Bills before the House there was none for which there was less cause than the Bill in question. A Suspensory Bill ought not to have been introduced unless there was a reasonable certainty that within the twelvemonth during which it was to be in operation permanent legislation would take place; but he could see no such certainty in this case. For his own part, considering that long intervals between dissolutions and elections were extremely inconvenient and expensive, he should like to get the election over within a fortnight of the close of the Session, so that Members might begin their holidays with their difficulties over; but it was only right that time should be given to the country to consider the questions at issue. It took some time to arouse the political feelings of the people, and he trusted that during the next few months the country would consider the position of the Church in Ireland, and the results which would follow to the Church of England if the Irish Church were disestablished. It was but fair that the people should have time to reflect on the changes which had been proposed, and to consider whether they should support the present Government or the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He hoped that a dissolution would not be pressed forward too hastily, but that the difficulties in the way of registration and other matters would be fully considered and carefully investigated by the proper authorities.

MR. COGAN said, they had at last got an avowal as to the cause why the postponement of the dissolution was thought to be desirable, namely—that they might have an opportunity of getting up a cry. He thought it greatly to be deprecated that an attempt should be made by any political party to get up a religious cry. Nothing would be more disastrous to the interests of the country than to inflame the passions of the people on the ground of religion. He believed no cry was likely to do such permanent injury to the country, or to inflict more indelible mischief and disgrace on those engaged in getting it up. Whether or not it would be successful he could not say; but they had already seen the peace of this country broken by religious riots in the North of England, and he believed a most serious responsibility would rest on any Minister, however, eminent his fame and talent might be, who lent the sanction of his high authority to raising a religious cry, whether that of "No Popery," or "No Protestantism." There had been other ominous signs and indications, though of a minor nature, as to the course of proceedings intended to be taken. A Notice of Motion given by a Member of that House had been distorted and misrepresented in a way which, during his experience of Parliament, which now extended over sixteen years, he had never seen equalled. He alluded to the manner in which the Notice given by the hon. Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) for the insertion of clauses in the Oaths Bill had been vilified and misrepresented in double-leaded columns in an organ of the party opposite, and to the extraordinary interpretation put upon it by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire a short time back.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member refers to a past debate, which he is not at liberty to do.

MR. COGAN said, he would not pursue the topic further. He thought it a serious matter that these religious questions should be stirred in this manner, and the public passions inflamed. The sooner the issue was taken the better for the country. He sincerely believed that the condition of Ireland was one of very serious import, and if not soon remedied might be a cause of permanent disaster to the interests of the Empire. There was a lull at this moment in the dangers of Fenianism; but he trusted the House and the country would not be led into false security by the peril appearing to have passed away for the moment, and that the hopes excited by the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and affirmed by a majority of the House, might not be indefinitely postponed. Nothing could be more injurious to the prosperity of the Empire, or to the interests of Ireland, than that the faith of the country in the wisdom of Parliament should be shaken, and that the public should be led to think they had no redress for the evils that oppressed that portion of the Empire. He believed in the justice of the English people, and was happy to think that the efforts to create discord had to a great extent failed. He looked forward with confidence to the public supporting that policy which was directed to the maintenance of union and harmony between both branches of the Empire, and which would ultimately, he trusted, attain a prosperous issue.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he very much regretted that the discussion had not been continued in the tone in which it had been introduced by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). The question raised by the hon. Member was a very simple one. With respect to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone), that the Government were going back from something they had stated before, he entirely repudiated any such insinuation. He asked the House whether it would be possible to introduce a Registration Bill, or to adopt means to facilitate the registration, until they knew what the boundaries of the boroughs were to be, and until the matters were settled which were to be the basis of the registration? When his right hon. Friend made his statement, he expected that the question of the Boundary Bill would have advanced much more rapidly. The House, however, although it was the Commission of their own appointing, had thought proper to refer the subject to a Select Committee. He understood that some changes had been made by the Committee, which would have to be discussed, and either adopted or rejected by the House. Until that was done, it was impossible to say in what way the registration could best be facilitated. He was prepared to say on behalf of the Government that they did not go back in any sense from what they had stated. At that very moment, those who were acquainted with the matter, were waiting and watching for the completion of the Boundary Bill, and the Government were prepared, if the opportunity were given them, to hasten a dissolution as much as it was proper to do.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had heard with very great pleasure the statement just made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. When the First Minister of the Crown made his statement on the 4th of May, he asked him whether he had spoken after consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown? He understood the right hon. Gentleman to give him an assurance, and he had since remained in the hope that he would do so, and would then make a more definite statement to the House. He had never taken any step to press the right hon. Gentleman, though he had certainly expected to hear something more definite. It appeared to him that the statement now made by the Secretary of State was satisfactory, and he had no doubt that after the Recess the House would receive some definite proposal from the Government on the subject.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to know whether the two Bills having reference to the Government of India would be proceeded with?

MR. DISRAELI said, he would make inquiry of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India as to the Bills, and take an early opportunity of stating the intentions of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

House, at rising, to adjourn till Thursday next.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PARLIAMENT—RULES OF THE HOUSE.
RESOLUTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to call attention to Rule 164 of "The Rules, Orders, and Forms of Proceedings of the House of Commons"—namely, "No Member may allude to any Debate in the other House of Parliament," and to its frequent infraction or evasion, and to move that it be rescinded. These Rules were often treated like a net which was strong enough to stop the little fishes, but which the great fishes broke through whenever it so pleased them. Now he could not understand the use of Rules that were not to be uniform in their operation. All Members of that House were presumed to be on a footing of perfect equality. They recognized no social rank as giving any preponderance in the estimation of the House; a noble Lord had no greater weight than his talents and character might give him in their debates, and no advantage over another person who was a Commoner. A Minister was no more than a Member. He was, therefore, not ready to give one Member impunity in infringing this law; an impunity not extended to others, simply because he had occupied the position of a Minister in this House. He had noticed that when anything had occurred in the other House of Parliament, which excited interest in this House, hon. Members who had been in office previously, and who expected to be in Office again, were habitually accustomed to disregard the Rule in question, and to refer to debates in the other House of Parliament, and even to give the speakers' names, repeating the ipsissima verba of their speeches, without even going through the formality of apologizing or asking permission before doing so. He was always desirous of avoiding direct personal reference to Members of the House, and therefore he would not mention the particular occasion to which he referred; but it must be within the recollection of the House that, on a recent occasion, the Rule to which he alluded was completely broken through. But minor Members were not allowed to infringe the Rule without being called to Order. Though personally not in favour of restricting Parliamentary freedom, he thought that if the Rule were not to be observed in high quarters, it would be better to abrogate it entirely. There was another Rule of the same kind, which had been applied to an hon. Member only a few minutes ago. It was of precisely the same character as the other, and it was for the credit of the House that, if applied to one, it should be applied to all. He held that Members of that House were completely on a par one with another, though one might excel his fellows in some qualifications for public distinction, just as the horses which ran for the Derby two days ago were all blood horses, almost exactly equal in breed and training, though one might come in a head or a neck in front of another at the end of the race. He did not put his own judgment against the experience of centuries which had established the Rule, but he desired that his Motion should be proposed from the Chair pro formâ, so that the subject might be discussed.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the rule of this House, 'that no Member may allude to any Debate in the other House of Parliament,' be rescinded,"—(Mr. Darby Griffith,)
—instead thereof.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member says that he desires to put this Motion pro formâ; but the fact is that there is no such Rule in existence, in a shape that it can be formally rescinded. Certain Rules are to be found in a book which defines what the observances of Parliament are; but they are not in the nature of Standing Orders. There is no Standing Order dealing with this subject, or anything that can be rescinded in the manner suggested by the hon. Member. I will, however, put his Motion if he desires it.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would ask Mr. Speaker, as a Question of Order, whether he could not enforce these Rules, and whether he would not enforce Rule 164 against any private Member; and also whether it was not a fact that Rule 160 had that very evening been enforced in the case of a private Member?

MR. SPEAKER: Certainly, if any hon. Member infringed Rule 164, which, as I said, is an account of the practice of Parliament, I should feel it my duty to put that Rule in force; and I trust that I should do so with impartiality in the case of any hon. Member who transgresses it. But the matter can be very easily arranged. If the hon. Member desires the law of Parliament should be laid down that allusions to debates in the other House of Parliament should be permitted, it would be more proper for him to put his Motion in that shape than in the form in which it stands on the Paper.

MR. GLADSTONE: I understood the hon. Gentleman—though what has fallen from him is not very clear—to cast some censure upon me for having made allusion to debates in the House of Lords.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: I do not presume to censure the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GLADSTONE: Well, I do not mean to complain of the hon. Gentleman's censures or observations whichever he meant. What I wish to say is this, that it appears to me that reference to debates in the House of Lords is, as a general rule, very improper and inexpedient; but cases may occur in which it would not only not be improper and inexpedient, but in which it would enter into the obligations of Members of Parliament to do so. I can say for myself that I have been extremely rigid in abstaining from all references to the House of Lords in any matter of general controversy. I think I may say that during my public life, extending now over thirty-six years, I do not remember to have referred to anything said in the House of Lords except on two occasions, and both of these were in the present year. They were cases which did not refer to myself, but they were cases where the position of the House of Commons was involved. It appears to me that in cases where a Member of the House of Commons thinks, whether rightly or wrongly, that a declaration made by a Minister in the House of Lords is material to the position of the House of Commons, it is, I do not say his duty to refer to that declaration as having been made in the House of Lords, but it is his duty to get at that declaration in any manner he can, and make it part of the subject-matter of discussion in this House. So again, if a Member thinks, whether rightly or wrongly, but in good faith, that remarks have been made in the House of Lords disparaging to this House, he would be fulfilling his duty, rather than doing a thing calling for any apology, in referring to them. I do not conceive that any reference ought to be made to the House of Lords except in those two cases; but I must add that I have heard many speeches in the House of Lords which consisted simply of replies to the arguments of Members of this House. With respect to the rescinding of this Rule Her Majesty's Government will, no doubt, have their own opinion upon that; but I conceive this Rule, like every other Rule of the House, must be applied with discretion. There is no rule more rigidly observed amongst us, than that no Member should speak more than once; but it constantly happens—sometimes in the case of a Minister, sometimes in the case of a Member who has been attacked—that the House by a just instinct relaxes the rule in his favour on grounds of public convenience, and he is not only allowed, but encouraged, to infringe the rule. These are customs which are a good deal more honoured in the observance than in the breach in ordinary circumstances; but peculiar circumstances will arise from time to time, and the good sense of the House may be trusted to discern the cases in which it is better to allow the custom to be broken through. But now, with regard to the hon. Gentleman, I wish to return his animadversions upon himself for one word which he used in the course of his observations. He spoke as if you, Sir, only enforced this Rule against private Members. I am not sure that I know the definition of a private Member; but if there be a definition strictly applicable to that word, it includes all persons, except Mr. Speaker himself and the Gentlemen who are Officers under the Crown. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will admit that it is impossible to apply these Rules in a more equal or impartial manner than is now done in the conduct of Public Business and the regulation of our proceedings.

MR. DISRAELI said, he hoped the House would always support that Rule; because he thought it prevented controversies and recriminations between the two Houses, while it had a tendency to promote mutual courtesy and softened the manners of a popular assembly, which required some restriction of that kind. He trusted, therefore, that the House would not sanction the criticism of the hon. Member nor the object to which it would lead. As to any observation which might seem to impugn the impartiality of Mr. Speaker, he could only say, speaking for those who sat on that (the Ministerial) side, that there existed only one feeling—that Mr. Speaker exercised his functions with an impartial discrimination towards both sides of the House.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH disclaimed

any intention to impugn the Speaker's impartiality, and said he would withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COAL MINES.—QUESTION.

MR. GREENE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, The intention of the Government on the Committee on Coal Mines? With respect to accidents in coal mines he was satisfied, from conversations which he had had with the owners of these mines, that the number of them might be greatly reduced, and he thought the House ought to give its calm and dispassionate consideration to that important subject. He desired to impress upon the House that the inspectors did not visit the mines in such a manner as to be of any practical use in the prevention of accidents. He thought that much good might be effected by the appointment of educated and practical men to act under the present inspectors of mines. He knew it was a disputed question whether by the appointment of official inspectors the responsibility of the owners of mines might not be weakened; but he was himself convinced that active and competent officers, carrying out an efficient system of inspecting mines from time to time, would do much practical good in preventing these most deplorable casualties. They had had a Report presented to that House from a Committee appointed to inquire into this subject, but no action whatever had been taken upon that Report. He regretted that a question which involved the lives and health and comfort of so large a class of the industrial population should attract so little interest in the House. He had been asked why he took up the question, and his reply was that he might be regarded as impartial on the question, because he had no interest in coal mines and did not represent a coal country. His own opinion was that any inquiry into this subject should be entrusted to a Commission composed of eminent scientific men. They all knew that in time of battle a man valued his life at very little; but that in time of peace he valued it greatly. If he should be a Member of the Reformed Parliament he would endeavour to attract its attention to this subject, and he would not leave it till he had seen a fair and honest attempt made to grapple with it. He would just say that he did not wish to interfere with any arrangement between masters and men.

MR. AYRTON said, the hon. Member had misunderstood his relations with the House if he imagined that there was the other evening the least indisposition on the part of the House to entertain this question. The fact was the hon. Member brought it forward at a most inopportune moment. He received an intimation to that effect from the House; and there was a feeling that he did not do justice to the gravity of the subject; for the hon. Member introduced it as a new one, as if he had suddenly discovered that something ought to be done, while, in fact, the House had thirty years ago, and upon many occasions since, devoted much attention to it, and Parliament had passed an Act to prevent accidents in coal mines. Since the passing of the Act the House had appointed a Committee to make inquiries into the subject, and that Committee, which was presided over by his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), had sat during three Sessions, and had received a considerable amount of scientific evidence from persons practically acquainted with the working of mines. After the conclusion of the inquiry his hon. Friend prepared an elaborate Report, which was presented to the House at the close of last Session. At the beginning of this Session his hon. Friend asked him (Mr. Ayrton) what course he should take, and his answer was that the Government ought to be allowed a certain time to carry out the recommendations in the Report; and that if they failed to do their duty then it would be his duty to bring the Report under the consideration of the House, and to urge the Government to do something upon it. Whilst that point was under consideration they were surprised to find that the hon. Member had placed a Motion on the Paper for the appointment of a Royal Commission. Now, if that Notice meant anything it could only have a tendency to disparage the labours of that Committee, and to re-open the whole inquiry. [Mr. GREENE: Hear, hear!] If that was the object of the hon. Member he would put it to the House whether he had done any useful service to the mining population of the country? The result had been that the hon. Member, from his want of knowledge, perhaps, had himself practically obstructed the progress of the question more than anyone. [Mr. GREENE: No!] But he did do so. He had illustrated the old adage, "Most haste, worst speed." If he, instead of suddenly rushing into this question had taken the trouble to inform himself correctly of what had been done during the past thirty years—[Mr. GREENE: I had done so.]—he would have rendered more service than by plunging into it, and in bringing it under the consideration of the House in the manner in which he had done. If the hon. Member had informed himself, he had not done so with the advantage which might have been expected. The fact was, through the course he had taken he had prevented the Chairman of the Committee from bringing the Report under the notice of the House. Nothing would be more useless than appointing a roving Commission, to take what was called scientific evidence. Having taken part in the labours of the Committee he trusted their Report would receive the attention of the Government, and that the Home Secretary would intimate that evening what course the Government proposed to adopt for the purpose of giving effect to their recommendations.

LORD ELCHO said, he was very glad that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had justified the House from the aspersions cast upon them by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene), because the hon. Member would have led the country, and the miners in particular, to imagine that there was an indifference felt in that House to protect the lives and interests of the working population of this country, of whom the miners were as good specimens as could be found; while from his own knowledge there had been an earnest desire to endeavour to legislate practically upon it in order that the lives of Her Majesty's subjects might be preserved. He thought the Motion of the hon. Member was unnecessary. What was wanted was practical legislation, and not further inquiry; and this was confirmed by Mr. M'Donnell, the President of the Miners' Union, who, indeed, had stated that if the Act already passed were put into force, protection could be given to the miners. There were ample powers under the Mines Inspection Act, if properly and judiciously exercised, to establish a healthy state of ventilation in mines, if the Secretary of State for the Home Department would only put them in operation. There was also power to fence off places suspected to contain explosive gases; but to use these powers effectively it was necessary

there should be proper inspection; the present inspection was deficient in quantity. There were twelve inspectors of mines, and some of these gentlemen had 600 mines to inspect, a matter physically impossible. The two greatest accidents in recent years were those at the Oaks and the Ferndale Collieries, and it was alleged that the Oaks pit had not been inspected for five years. The only question between the Committee and the miners was this: the Committee recommended the appointment of more inspectors, the present system of inspection being inefficient; and the miners recommended the appointment of men of their own class as sub-inspectors. They said that the class of men who filled the position of overmen and viewers were sufficiently scientific for the purpose of inspection. If it should be objected that these gentlemen recommended themselves for the position, his answer would be that it would be well that they should have something to look forward to, and that a position of trust was a proper object for the ambition of those men who raised themselves above their fellow-workmen. The miners proposed that the sub-inspectors should have power to enter the pits at all times, but that they should not interfere with the working of them, nor say one word to the men; but if they should see any reason for increased ventilation, they should report to that effect to one of the head Inspectors, and he should go and inspect the mine himself; and they further said that, with a proper system of inspection, accidents would be minimized, and that such an accident as the one at the Oaks Colliery would not occur. He could not help thinking that if it had not been for the great Irish question, which had put a stop to all practical legislation for this Session, the Government would have been prepared to bring in a Bill to carry out the views of the Select Committee. There was a great anxiety throughout the whole mining population of the country that something should be done, and should the present Government remain in Office, he hoped they would be prepared to deal with the subject.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he did not think blame ought to be attached to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene) for having brought this question again under the consideration of the House. On the last occasion when the subject was before them a count out took place; and such an occurrence was calculated to lead the miners to suppose that their interests were neglected in this House. Under the guidance of the Home Secretary, he had no doubt improvements might be made in the present mode of inspection. There were some districts in which novel experiments were tried with a view to cheapen the price of obtaining the mineral, and it was in such cases that more stringent regulations as regarded inspection were required. He would not express an opinion as to whether a Royal Commission ought to be issued or not, but this he would say—if additional legislation were needed, he knew no one more likely to carry that legislation into effect than the present Home Secretary.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was personally connected with mines as an owner, and he was convinced that, though the appointment of inspectors might have had a good effect here and there, still, on the whole, it was not equal to the supervision on the part of the owners of mines and persons interested in them which it had superseded. A good medium course was now open to the Government—to bring to the aid of the paid inspectors the opinions of those personally interested in the mines.

RIOTS AT ASHTON, STALEY BRIDGE, BIRMINGHAM, &c.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY proceeded to call attention to the recent Roman Catholic riots at Ashton, Rochdale, Staleybridge, Bury, and other places in the county of Lancaster, and at Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Stone, Hanley, and other places in the counties of Warwick and Stafford; and to move for a Committee to inquire and report to the House as to the origin and nature of such riots, and what, if any, measures are requisite to secure to persons engaged in the delivery of lectures or speeches on the subject of Protestantism, and to the public, better protection. He must, he said, in the first place, express his surprise at the Answer which the Secretary of State for the Home Department returned to him at an earlier period of the evening. The right hon. Gentleman generally met every difficulty in a straightforward and manly manner, and did not, as a rule, seek to make excuses, more or less frivolous, in order to avoid responsibility. To-night, however, he had adopted a course very different to the one usually pursued by him; and, in answer to his (Mr. Whalley's) Question respecting these riots, he had said that pending legal proceedings he could not reply to it.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, he rose to Order. The House a few minutes ago was engaged in the discussion of a most important subject—namely, coal mines, and the safety of those engaged in them. That subject was not yet disposed of; but the hon. Member for Peterborough had risen, and introduced something upon an entirely different matter, which had nothing whatever to do with mines. It would, therefore, be well to know whether he was in Order or not.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question now before the House is, "That I do leave the Chair," in order to the House going into Committee of Supply. That being so, I have not any power to prevent the hon. Gentleman from pursuing his observations.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had not intended to thrust his Motion before the House; but he was under the impression that the former question had been disposed of. He ventured to express his earnest belief that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had, by the casual Answer which he gave to his Question, struck a blow at liberty of speech in this country. What was the position of matters after the Answer which had been made by the Home Secretary. When the local authorities thought that a breach of the peace was about to be committed, they might, in total disregard of liberty of speech, interpose and prevent the delivery of these lectures. Now, it was the fact that Mr. Murphy, one of the lecturers, whose lectures had been disturbed by rioting, only did that which for a considerable time had been done by the opposite party. Dr. Manning had perambulated the country giving lectures, in which he denounced Her Majesty as a heretic, and in which he turned English history altogether topsy-turvy; and monks and friars in full canonicals had gone about from place to place, and had visited the borough with which he was connected, delivering similar lectures. Mr. Murphy was engaged merely to reply to such lectures, and he assumed that he and his colleagues had done nothing to disentitle them to the protection of the law. They were engaged in carrying out what they firmly believed to be right. But as the matter now stood, wherever Mr. Murphy or his colleagues intended to give lectures, any one who had an objection to such lectures might go to the magistrates and swear an information, and have them stopped. That principle, if carried out, would put an end to the whole system of lectures and public speaking, whenever there were any persons who were disinclined to have such lectures delivered. No doubt Dr. Manning and others, who had travestied our history after their own fashion, would desire that the other side should not be heard in reply. The Roman Catholic who manifested so great a sensitiveness to Orange colour, to the declaration of facts connected with the confessional, and to many other things which had been said, or might be said, had only to go and swear before a magistrate with that remarkable facility for getting all affidavits which was observable on that side, and no lecture would be permitted in exposition of Protestant doctrines, or in reply to the lecture of Dr. Manning. That was the law now laid down by the high authority of the Home Secretary. The Home Secretary had said that he would not answer his Question until certain legal proceedings were over; but look what was going on in the meantime. Not only Murphy, but others, had been prevented by the magistrates from lecturing, on the ground that it would disturb the peace of the town. But how was that known? Because both men and women were organized and drilled in their schools for the express purpose of getting up these riots and preventing the lectures. If ever there was an instance in which a Minister of the Crown had—he trusted unintentionally—struck a vital blow at the liberty of speech in this country, it was in the course which the right hon. Gentleman opposite appeared to be ready to take in connection with this matter. In a letter from one of the men who had been delivering lectures in the country, Mr. Houston, a tradesman, of Birkenhead, it was said—

“When we have arranged for a lecture, the priests go to the magistrates, who induce the owners of the halls we have engaged to break the contract made with us after it has been signed, the money paid, and the object and character of our lectures fully explained. I have been before the magistrates at Blackburn, Warrington, and Rochdale, and asked them to protect me, and they would give me no answer, though the request was made in the most civil and courteous manner. Our opponents are thereby led to believe that we and our supporters are outlaws, as it were, and consequently they make murderous assaults upon us, and get up riots to frighten the authorities into putting us down. I have been lecturing for seventeen years, and there has never been a riot, or an attempt to riot, at any of my meetings, except when the magistrates—at the bidding of the priests—interfered, at Warrington and Rochdale. We cannot afford to pay for halls, and to have our money kept and our meetings stopped, and we cannot bear the expense of legal proceedings. What is our liberty worth? I fear we shall have to take our stand in the open air, for we will not give up our right to speak.”

He (Mr. Whalley) entirely concurred with the writer of that letter, and was willing to surrender all he possessed for the purpose of sharing with those persons the dangers and penalties consequent upon the assertion of their right to speak. He wished to mention that he had had nothing to do with these meetings or lectures for more than nine months; but, on the last occasion when he attended one at Birmingham, he was very near being blown up. He afterwards examined the ammunition which had been placed in the meeting for the purpose, and which was fortunately discovered by a policeman. He laid no stress on that; but he wished to show that the people would not give up their right to speak, whatever might be the penalty. It was asked by Mr. Houston and his friends why, if Dr. Livingstone carried arms to protect himself against the African savages, he and his friends should not be permitted to arm themselves with a view to resisting the attacks of the Papists? He would remind the House that two years ago he had asked for a Committee to inquire into the circumstances connected with the Fenian outbreak; and he now asserted that if his Motion had been acceded to, many lives, enormous cost, and much national degradation would have been spared, and the real nature of the conspiracy would have been fully exposed. That conspiracy was never more thoroughly organized or more ready for action than at the present moment. That statement might be treated with contempt; but he fearlessly made it, and the responsibility of accepting or disregarding it rested upon the Government which had charge of the interests of the country. Nothing they could do with the Irish Church or with the establishing of a Roman Catholic University could touch Fenianism in the slightest degree. The conspiracy was co-extensive with the Roman Catholic population, and co-ordinate with the doctrines preached from Sunday to Sunday, and the principles taught and believed in by the Roman Catholics. All this he could prove if he had the opportunity. He had been very reticent upon the subject for the last two years. He might have referred to it upon many occasions, and especially in connection with the Clerkenwell outrage and the attempt to assassinate the Duke of Edinburgh. But the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) had now challenged investigation into the causes of the recent riots, and that challenge he was willing to accept. It should be remembered, in fairness, that Mr. Murphy had simply been sent upon the track of Dr. Manning, who had gone forth on a mission organized by monks and friars, and with all their paraphernalia and devices, and with the rhetoric which the country paid so dearly to provide them with. This Roman Catholic mission was undisturbed. At Birmingham, where the Queen was denounced as a heretic, the use of the Town Hall was granted to Doctor Manning, and it was also allowed for the purpose of a Roman Catholic bazaar; but when 2,000 Protestant ratepayers of the place presented a requisition to the Mayor (Mr. Dixon), now one of the hon. Members for Birmingham, asking him to grant the use of it, in order that Mr. Murphy might reply to Dr. Manning, not only was the request refused, but the police were sent round to all other suitable places, to warn the managers against letting them to Mr. Murphy. To meet the difficulty thus raised by the authorities, a building was specially erected, and after the roof of it had been twice or thrice pulled down during the night time, they succeeded in making it suitable for the purpose for which it was wanted. On that occasion—it was the first of Mr. Murphy's appearances in Birmingham—the house of the father of a young man who was secretary to a Protestant Association was wrecked before Mr. Murphy had opened his mouth in Birmingham; and before the meeting, or rather service—for it was on a Sunday—had commenced, three men, in what was believed to be a dying state, were brought into the meeting, the victims of the violence inflicted on them by the bands outside. The public, who were afterwards confirmed by the chief superintendent of police, attributed the outrage to the Roman Catholic priests, who adopted the most unusual course of closing their chapels that afternoon, thus setting their people free to employ their energies elsewhere. The representations in the newspapers respecting Mr. Murphy, and attributing to him the riots, were wholly unfounded. Mr. Murphy had played the part of the lamb, and the wolfish proceedings of the other side were not his fault. It was true that on that occasion, when those three men were carried past him, dead or dying, Mr. Murphy told the audience that he would prove that the Roman Catholic priests were cannibals, murderers, and liars; and these expressions had been paraded through the whole country, and had been held sufficient to fix upon him the responsibility for the atrocities committed. Thereupon he (Mr. Whalley) went down to Birmingham, and for the first and last time heard Mr. Murphy, who repeated these words and explained them clearly and distinctly, in a manner that was considered unobjectionable by a Roman Catholic gentleman present, who volunteered his satisfaction; and though he (Mr. Whalley) did not defend them, it was fair to remember that some of the mysteries of the Roman Catholic faith might be, in the heat of the moment, represented under the type of cannibalism, and that, according to certain passages in the "Confessional," murder committed for the glory of God and of the Church might be justified; and Mr. Murphy, it was stated, had seen his own father stoned to death at the instigation of the priests, because the family had been converted from Romanism. ["Oh, oh!"] So much as regarded Birmingham. At Wolverhampton the police, he believed, were in a conspiracy with the Roman Catholics, and encouraged the riot there in June last; and in other places the police were not to be relied on for protecting the Protestant lecturers. That was one of the things he would undertake to prove if the Committee for which he asked was granted. More than one Irish priest, disguised as a workman, was among the rioters, hounding them on. The Rev. Dr. Armstrong, a clergyman of high standing, in a letter to him, complained strongly of the conduct of the stipendiary magistrate, who attempted to throw the blame of the riot upon him. No doubt the accounts in the public journals put a very different complexion on these transactions; but the English Press was not free to speak the truth. Orders issued in 1836 by the Roman Catholic hierarchy had controlled the liberty of the Press; and he believed that there was scarcely a newspaper in the Kingdom that could with impunity give full utterance to what might come to its knowledge respecting the proceedings of the Catholics; and thus the House could not get full information of what transpired. It might be asked what was the use of these meetings? and to such a question he should reply that they were of the greatest use in protecting the people of this country, including the Roman Catholics themselves, against the tyranny of the priests. What he had stated was merely a specimen of what had occurred at all the towns mentioned in his Notice. What was the remedy for this state of things? The remedy that appeared to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) to be the proper one was to get rid of the lecturer; but that was no remedy, because the matter was still smouldering. Lecturers hired a hall, and then informations of apprehended riot were sworn, but no effort was made to prevent the riot; the lecturer was sent away instead. Now nothing was more unworthy of Englishmen invested with local authority than such conduct as this; for they thus placed every town at the mercy of any mob which chose to prevent free discussion, on any given subject, by threats of riot. If a Committee were granted, he should be able to show that the local authorities had wholly neglected their duty by not affording the requisite security to these lecturers. Mr. Murphy and those associated with him had never done anything to disentitle them to the protection which Dr. Manning had received in delivering his lectures. He believed the local authorities had become involved in the vortex of party feeling. The proper step to take, in order to prevent a breach of the peace, was to afford the lecturer protection. The delivery of lectures and exposing the doctrines of the Papacy was the only means of protecting the people against the priesthood. In the time of Elizabeth persons were actually commissioned to go through the country to make known the doctrines of Romanism. To stop such lecturers as Murphy would be to strike a blow against Protestantism. One of the colleagues of Mr. Murphy had been tried for firing off a pistol and wounding a policeman during one of these disturbances, and the jury had found him guilty, but had earnestly recommended him to mercy on the ground that he had acted without any premeditation and under the influence of a feeling of great excitement. The remarks of the Judge who had conducted the trial were still well-remembered in that district, and had given rise to considerable dissatisfaction. The Court of Queen's Bench itself had lately delivered a judgment which he knew was challenged by the opinion of a large portion of Westminster Hall. That Court had decided that the book entitled The Confessional Unmasked was an obscene book, and had refused to take into account the intention of the publishers of the work, whose object was the suppression, and not the encouragement, of obscenity. That decision was founded on Lord Campbell's Act, but it was opposed to the ancient maxim of our law, that it was the intention which constituted a crime; and it was received with a murmur in Westminster Hall. He thought that the only way to meet this matter was by the appointment of a Committee, which would decide whether it was not expedient to amend Lord Campbell's Act in respect to such a matter, and to enact that, as in all other cases, the intention should constitute the crime. He thanked the House for having heard him, but would not make any Motion.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I trust the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene) will forgive me if for a time I am carried away from the subject he brought so ably before the House by the very numerous charges which the hon. Member who has just sat down brought against myself and various other persons. The hon. Member has concluded without moving for a Committee of Inquiry; but he brought under the notice of the House a very extraordinary collection of accusations. He first accused me of having stated in this House, on the occasion of a Question addressed to me a few nights ago, what certainly I never did state. Then he accused various authorities throughout the country of conniving at illegality; he charged a stipendiary magistrate with not doing his duty; and he concluded by extending this latter charge to the Court of Queen's Bench. [Mr. WHALLEY: No!] As I understood it, this Committee was to inquire into a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench; which, of course, is not a question for a Committee or for this House, but one for a higher tribunal.

MR. WHALLEY: What I stated was that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench with respect to a recent Act of Parliament was a proper subject for inquiry, in order that this House should consider whether that Act ought to be continued.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The hon. Member said that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench had caused—I think a

"shudder" was his expression, in Westminster Hall. [Mr. WHALLEY: No; a murmur.] Very well; a "murmur," which if it implied anything, implied that the Bar thought the decision was a wrong one. But if that were the opinion of lawyers, the proper mode of dealing with the decision would be to bring it before a higher tribunal. When an hon. Gentleman makes so many extravagant charges as have been put forward by the hon. Member for Peterborough, though some part of his subject might be worthy of consideration if brought forward in another form, the effect of those charges is to throw doubt upon every part of the statement. Indeed, one allegation made by the hon. Member was so strong and so offensive to many Members of this House that I almost expected you, Sir, would feel bound to interpose, on the ground that his language was un-Parliamentary. I think that language was beyond the bounds of what should be used either in this House or out of it. The hon. Member said that Fenianism was co-extensive with Roman Catholicism—that in every case Roman Catholicity was tainted with Fenianism. Now, differing in religious matters as widely from the professors of the Roman Catholic faith as the hon. Gentleman can do, and being, I trust, as strongly attached to my religion as he is, I must still say that, in my opinion, that charge is an unfounded one. In my official capacity, I have had much to do with the measures taken by the authorities in consequence of the Fenian conspiracy, and I must say that, in my dealings with Roman Catholics, I have found in the great majority of them a loyal attachment to the Throne, and an absence of any desire to further the interests of Fenianism. The hon. Gentleman said that, on a former occasion, the Government would give him no answer, because legal proceedings were pending. I am in the recollection of the House when I assert that my statement on the occasion referred to by the hon. Member was that it was not the intention of the Government to originate an inquiry while legal proceedings were pending, because we thought it probable that during those proceedings the facts to the elucidation of which an inquiry would be directed, if one were to be made, would be better elicited in a Court of Justice, on oath, than through an examination conducted by a Commissioner sent down for the special purpose of such an inquiry. With regard to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's Question—namely, as to whether the Government intended to make any better provision in favour of the persons to whom he referred—I stated that that was entirely for the local authorities; every one, so long as he did not commit a breach of the peace, being entitled to the protection of the law. As regards controversy, no one would protect its freedom in religion and politics more thoroughly than I would do so. I think every man has a right to put forward his own creed, and to support it with such arguments as he may think proper; but I do not think it advisable to put forth inflammatory placards containing language calculated to provoke a breach of the peace—language insulting, and, no doubt, in many instances, meant to be insulting, to people professing other creeds. But in connection with this case that question was not brought before me, for it could not properly be brought before me. If a stipendiary magistrate does not receive informations which the parties tendering them think he ought to receive, their course is to go to the Court of Queen's Bench and apply to it for a mandamus to compel him to take those informations—this course has recently been adopted in the case of ex-Governor Eyre; but parties have no right to come to this House and complain that a stipendiary magistrate has refused to receive informations. Then the hon. Gentleman complains that there has been a breach of contract on the part of persons who had engaged to let places for lectures to be delivered in, and he follows that up by another complaint directed against the Government—namely, that we do not interfere to enforce the performance of private contracts. The hon. Gentleman appears to believe that it is the duty of the Government to enforce civil contracts—there are Courts of Law open for that purpose. Really I am anxious that this discussion should close. I do not think it would be of advantage to the House that a discussion so commenced should be continued. I do not think that the speech of the hon. Member was of such a character as to lay the foundation for a useful discussion. I believe that however strong the feelings of some hon. Gentlemen may be on certain of the topics introduced by the hon. Gentleman, they will be of opinion that a speech in which such extraordinary charges have been brought against every one from the highest to the lowest is not one on which it would be well to raise a debate on those topics.

With regard to the very important subject in which the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's (Mr. Greene) has taken such a zealous interest, and of which he has spared no pains to make himself thoroughly master, I can assure the House that it has received our earnest consideration; but it is absolutely impossible for me to undertake legislation on the matter this Session. My hon. Friend who assists me at the Home Office with such assiduity and zeal received deputations on the subject from time to time when I was too much engaged with other duties to permit of my doing so. I had hoped to take steps with a view to legislate before this; but other events have so disorganized the Session that I have not been able to do so. The point of inspection is one that will require very careful consideration. I think it may be desirable to increase the number of inspectors to a certain extent, but if this be done it must be done with great care. Though an addition to the number of inspectors would increase the patronage of the Home Office, it would at the same time impose upon it a troublesome duty. The suggestion for the appointment of sub-inspectors was negatived by the Committee after careful inquiry. The matter will need a very delicate handling; because there is the danger of too much inspection, which would make owners less sensible of the responsibility which properly attaches to them, and would render the workpeople even less careful than they are at present. I believe there will be other opportunities of discussing this subject during the present Session, because I perceive that my right hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce) has this evening given Notice that he proposes to call attention to it, and my hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Vivian) is to bring under the notice of the House a proposition for dividing mines into compartments. This would involve considerable expense to owners; but it is a proposition well deserving that consideration which I am sure it will receive when treated by my hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire. As I see my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall present, I shall say a word with respect to that class of mines in which he is particularly interested. There had been a Commission on those mines. Questions had arisen as to the health of the people employed in them; but still greater difficulties were experienced as to how they should be dealt with. Those mines are not worked like coal mines. You do not get large galleries, as you do in coal mines, but you have to follow the ore into small places—in fact, wherever you can find it—and great difficulties in the way of ventilation have arisen in consequence. On that subject I have been requested by Lord Kinnaird to see whether some scientific provisions could not be introduced by which the mines might be worked with greater safety. But there are questions of expenses in this case as well as in the other; it is difficult to work the mines at a profit, and the wages of miners are lower than at any former period, and there would be great risk in any rash interference. But I do assure the House that the subject is under consideration, and that if we should have an opportunity we shall be ready to deal with it in a fair and reasonable manner.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he had never risen in that House with more reluctance than upon this occasion, and he felt extreme regret at being forced to join in a discussion which was so unworthy in its tone; and, indeed, if he was not unwilling to use language which might not be of a Parliamentary character, he would describe the manner, and the remarks of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) in much stronger words. What was the course taken by the hon. Gentleman after scattering broad-cast around him, for upwards of an hour, observations and charges which were not only unjustifiable, but wholly unfounded. After demanding apparently with earnestness an inquiry into those charges which he had the temerity to make, he had shrunk from moving his Resolution for the appointment of a Committee, under the pretence of which only he could have attempted to occupy the attention of the House.

MR. WHALLEY said, he rose to Order. The hon. Gentleman charged him with having shrunk from an inquiry, whereas, as he had already explained, he had relied on the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) to second his Motion.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member for Peterborough was out of Order. He was not explaining, but repeating a statement which he had previously made.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he had no other desire than to state accurately what had taken place. He doubtless did so in warm language, as he felt that such proceedings should be put a stop to. The hon. Member had taken the liberty of using his name more than once recently in his erratic observations, and he (Mr. O'Beirne) desired to set himself right with the House, and out-of-doors, as he did not believe it was of advantage to be in any manner connected with or appealed to, by the hon. Member. He (Mr. O'Beirne) was satisfied the House would sympathize with him if he had spoken severely, as it demanded more than ordinary patience for a Roman Catholic Member, or indeed any other Member of the House to listen to such a speech as had been just delivered by the hon. Member for Peterborough, which was, as he had said, utterly unjustifiable. But with the permission of the House he (Mr. O'Beirne) would proceed to make the explanation, for which purpose only he had risen. The circumstances were these, and they had been so frequently alluded to by the hon. Member, and in a shape so well calculated to mislead the House and the public, that he (Mr. O'Beirne) desired simply to refresh the memory of hon. Members by repeating on the authority of Hansard, what really did take place. In the month of May, 1866, when he was very little experienced in this House, and was unaccustomed to the singular wanderings of the hon. Member, he was startled by a charge made by him, that the war then unhappily prevailing in New Zealand, had originated in a conspiracy got up and encouraged by the Roman Catholic priests. He (Mr. O'Beirne), with the ill-timed zeal of a new and inexperienced Member, felt such a charge acutely, and challenged the hon. Member to move for a Committee and to prove his charge if he could. Other hon. Members, Friends of his (Mr. O'Beirne's), more accustomed to the eccentricities of the hon. Member for Peterborough, only laughed at such folly; but he (Mr. O'Beirne) charged him with uttering language which must have been, as he then described it, "the fruit of a fevered brain." The hon. Member did upon a later occasion move for a Committee; when, after a long and continuous expression of disapprobation from the House, and an attempt to count the House out, upon an appeal from the Chair—a course most unusual and seldom called for—the hon. Member yielded to the marked expression of disapprobation on the part of the House, and resumed his seat. The hon. Member had since then frequently remarked upon the fact, that he (Mr. O'Beirne) did not support him in seeking for that inquiry. That was perfectly true. He (Mr. O'Beirne) had, however, in nothing that had ever fallen from him, justified the hon. Member in supposing he could have any support on any subject from him, and his frequent allusions and appeals to him (Mr. O'Beirne) were as groundless, and as unfounded, as were the wild and incoherent statements upon which he had sought to obtain an inquiry upon this occasion. He hoped, although perhaps, against hope, that there would now be an end of this sort of irritating and highly unsatisfactory mode of proceeding.

MR. BAZLEY thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department for his very judicious and temperate reply to the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley). He regretted that he had no influence with the hon. Member. If he had he would have used it for the purpose of inducing the hon. Member to withdraw his sanction from these proceedings which, in the manufacturing districts, were endangering the lives of Her Majesty's subjects, and imperilling a great amount of property. It was but an act of justice to state that when himself a large employer of labour many of his workpeople were Irish, and that they showed the same fidelity as others, while with regard to the care for the labouring class shown by the ministers of all denominations, the Roman Catholic clergy were as devoted as any. He feared that serious disasters would ensue unless measures were taken for the preservation of order and for the suppression of exciting topics.

DECLARATION AGAINST TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he rose to move "That there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Declaration against Transubstantiation, &c., taken by the Sovereign of this Realm at his first Parliament, or at his Coronation, whichever shall first happen after his Accession." In doing so, he wished to make a brief explanation with reference to a Notice of Motion which he had placed upon the Paper, and which had been very much misrepresented both in that House and out-of-doors. That Notice of Motion had received a good deal of publicity in consequence of the kindness of some association which was acting in the interests of Her Majesty's Government. It had moreover been misrepresented by the Press, and the public mind had been disturbed and confused upon the subject. A noble Lord (Lord Elcho), in the course of a debate a few nights ago, had animadverted upon that Motion without having given him (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) any intimation of his intention to do so. The noble Lord said that the clause—which he (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) had given Notice to move to introduce into the Promissory Oaths Bill—was an attempt, in the first place, to interfere with the Coronation Oath; in the second, to open the Throne to Roman Catholics; and, in the third place, that it was a Motion made in connivance with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), who was said to be endeavouring to upset and do away with the Protestantism of this country. As to this last notion it was too absurd for notice. The fact was that he had had no communication with the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, the proposal being made on his own sole responsibility; and not a single Member, as he believed, having had any knowledge of it until it was placed on the table. The allegations that he proposed to tamper with the Coronation Oath and open the Throne to Roman Catholics were equally unfounded. The Protestantism of the Sovereign was secured by express provisions in the Act of Settlement and in the Bill of Rights. The 9th section of the Bill of Rights declared that any person professing the Popish religion or marrying a Papist should be incapable of inheriting or possessing the Crown; the people in any such case being absolved from their allegiance and the Crown descending to the nearest Protestant heir. That Act was followed by the Act of Settlement, passed in the same reign, which repealed the provisions contained in the former Act, and further required that whoever came to the Throne should join in communion with the Church of England as by law established. He need only refer to the provisions of those Acts to show that the Notice which he had put upon the Paper had nothing to do directly or indirectly with the Protestantism or Protestant succession to the Crown; of these realms, as falsely represented in placards which had been extensively distributed. But it might be said, if this were so, what was the meaning of the Notice which he had given?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member gave Notice of a Motion relating to this Declaration. I think he cannot enter at the length which he is now doing upon a subject that stands for future consideration.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he would not discuss the matter at any length, but in moving for the copy of the Declaration he did not think he was out of Order in alluding to the Motion for which he wanted it. The object of his Motion was simply to get rid of the particular Declaration, a copy of which he now moved for, and which was established in this kingdom in the reign of Charles II., at a time when Protestant feeling was strongly aroused in consequence of the excitement connected with the Popish plot. The Declaration which was required to be taken by all persons holding office was framed expressly for the purpose of excluding persons who, though nominally Protestants, were not relied upon as such; and hence the Declaration was one of a most offensive character. He would not read the whole of it, but would merely give the substance. [The hon. and learned Baronet read passages from the Declaration denouncing the belief in the doctrine of Transubstantiation, the adoration of the Virgin Mary, and the sacrifice of the Mass.] The Declaration was framed in the most offensive and insulting manner to Catholics. It was a relic of that temple of intolerance which had been reared by our ancestors long ago. From the time he first entered the House he had endeavoured to erase that offensive Declaration from the statute book, and on his introducing a Bill for that purpose the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole), with the feelings of a Gentleman and a Christian, stated, on behalf of the Conservative party, that he should offer no objection to the removal of this Declaration. The Bill passed through the House of Commons, but, as they were all aware, it was not the custom in "another place" to pass a Bill of the kind the first time it was sent up to them; and accordingly the application was repeated in 1867, when he was happy to say that it became the law of the land, and now every person under the Crown was relieved from the necessity of taking that Declaration. It was formerly required to be taken by the clergy in Ireland; but a Royal Commission appointed in 1865, unanimously declared that it ought to be abolished even as to the clergy. The Report of the Oaths Commission described the Declaration as "painful and irritating in its nature," and also as "needless and mischievous." At the time he first introduced the Bill he carried last Session, he did not know that the Sovereign was required to take the Declaration; but afterwards it came to his knowledge that such was the case. It was too late then to put any provision into the Bill; but this year, especially after the Report of the Commissioners had been published, he had felt that advantage ought to be taken of the Promissory Oaths Bill being before the House to relieve the Sovereign from the necessity of making a Declaration which was no longer required from any of her subjects. It was with that object he had put upon the Paper a Notice for abolishing the Declaration. It was quite possible to frame a Declaration that would be effectual for the purpose without containing in it words that were almost indecent in their condemnation of doctrines believed in by nearly one-half of Europe, and by many millions of Her Majesty's subjects. He certainly had ventured to hope that a Parliament which—though it was called a moribund Parliament—had done so much for the cause of religious liberty, and in adopting the Resolutions relating to the Irish Church had shown its zeal for religious equality, would be anxious, before it passed away, to complete the noble work it had undertaken. He felt it right to make this short explanation for the purpose of explaining that the Motion was entirely his own, that it had nothing whatever to do with the Protestantism of the Crown, or the alteration of the Coronation Oath, and that its object was simply to get rid of a foolish and offensive Declaration, as the Motion was much misrepresented out-of-doors, and the misrepresentation, if uncontradicted, was calculated to do much harm by aiding the Protestant cry which Her Majesty's Ministers had attempted to raise in view of a General Election.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Declaration against Transubstantiation, &c. taken by the Sovereign of this Realm at his first Parliament or at his Coronation, whichever shall first happen after his Accession,"—(Sir Colman O'Loughlen,)

—instead thereof.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. and learned Baronet had been very anxious to disclaim any intention of interfering with the Act of Settlement; but he must admit that the Declaration to which he so strongly objected was required to be taken not only by the Act of Settlement, but by the Bill of Rights. Hence it was not surprising that the people of this country should think the hon. and learned Baronet intended to repeal a part of the Act of Settlement, inasmuch as he proposed to strike out of that Act the provisions requiring this Declaration to be taken by the Sovereign. It was he who had called the attention of the hon. and learned Baronet to the fact that if his Bill of last year became law the Sovereign would remain the only person compelled to make this Declaration. Its terms were complained of as offensive; but its offence lay in the fact that it distinctly and plainly repudiated those cardinal doctrines of the Church of Rome, which mainly constituted the difference between that Church and the Church of England. It was unnecessary to repeat the origin of this Declaration; but there was a time in the history of this country when the religion of the aspirants to the Throne was doubtful. It was thought that the Duke of York, afterwards James II., was a Roman Catholic, and it was determined that in some explicit manner the Sovereign should make a Declaration on this leading doctrine of the Church, and should assert his identification of belief with the Reformed Church of this country. He admitted that the language of the Declaration was plain-spoken, and he consulted the present Lord Chancellor, then Sir Hugh Cairns, and Mr. Whiteside on the subject. Their opinion was that by substituting a declaration of adherence and acceptance of the 27th and 28th Articles of Religion of the Church of England all the offensive terms of the Declaration against Transubstantiation might be eliminated, and yet that the substance of the Oath might be retained. This proposal he submitted to the House in Committee on the Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen). Was he satisfied with this honest attempt to eliminate the offensive terms? No, he aimed at the substance of the Declaration, and induced the Committee, by a small majority, to reject the Amendment. After that opinion, given by two of the most eminent lawyers in the kingdom, and confirmed by other lawyers, and the attempt he had made to carry it into effect, he could put no faith in the hon. Member's statement that he only desired to rid one portion of the Act of Settlement of the offensive terms contained in it. He believed that when the people out-of-doors saw an attempt made to tamper with the Act of Settlement, which, if there were any such, was the fundamental statute on which rested the rights of the Throne and the liberty of the subject—when they saw that this was done upon the plea that it was only an attempt to get rid of offensive words after an honest attempt had been made to sweep them away and retain the substance, it was not surprising if the proceedings of the hon. and learned Gentleman were regarded with great suspicion. They had heard from the hon. Member for Manchester something about the desirability of putting some limits to the right of free discussion. And at what period was this bold suggestion made? Just when repeated attacks were being made upon the Protestant Establishments of this country, and when an energetic Roman Catholic Member was attempting to tamper with a portion of the Act of Settlement. The experience of 200 years had shown that the terms and substance of this Declaration were necessary, and that it was requisite that the Sovereign should with his own lips declare his sincere attachment to the Protestant religion.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN rose to reply, but—

MR. SPEAKER said, he had not thought it right to stop the hon. Member for North Warwickshire in replying to the speech made by the hon. and learned Member for Clare; but the hon. and learned Member had gone too far in the observations he had made, and the House ought not to be led now into further discussion.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, it was not his intention to proceed with his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £66,314, to complete the sum for Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions, Ireland.

(2.) £11,421, to complete the sum for Common Law Courts, Ireland.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked how this Vote had increased £9,000?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, a large portion of the expense for which the Vote was now taken used to be borne by the Consolidated Fund. There was also an increase owing to the Act passed last year involving the payment of their salaries to a certain number of Masters, who had been deprived of their offices.

MR. CHILDERS said, he had advised caution in respect to the Act of last year. There was an increase of nearly £2,000 apart from the special reasons assigned.

COLONEL SYKES said, this increase was only a drop in the ocean of the entire Vote, and the total cost of our law was about £3,000,000, while the charge in France was only £1,334,221.

MR. WHALLEY said, but for the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) the Votes would have been much higher this year.

THE EARL OF MAYO thought it right to say that, so far as the Government were concerned, they had done everything they could to reduce the expenditure of last year.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £6,020, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Legal Charges, Ireland.

(4.) £6,000, to complete the sum for County Prisons, Ireland.

MR. WHALLEY asked the cost incurred in consequence of the Fenian prisoners?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, a portion of their expenses would be borne by the county prisons, and the charge for those who were sent to Mountjoy Prison would come under the head of the convict service. The legal expenses would come under this Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £47,484, to complete the sum for Criminal Proceedings, Scotland.

(6.) £33,378, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland.

(7.) £11,909, to complete the sum for Register House Departments, Edinburgh.

(8.) £8,705, to complete the sum for Admiralty Court Registry.

(9.) £49,979, to complete the sum for Probate Court.

(10.) £3,470, to complete the sum for Land Registry Office.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thought the office ought to be self-supporting.

MR. GOLDNEY reminded the Committee that this was one of the offices he had before referred to, which ought to be amalgamated with some other office, in order that it might be made to pay its own expenses.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the attention of the Government had been directed to that office, which it had been hoped would prove self-supporting, but which had undoubtedly been a failure. The subject was now undergoing inquiry, the result of which would shortly be laid before the House.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £160,332, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, of the Superintendence of Government Prisons in England and the Expenses of Transportation."

MR. CHILDERS said, the number of convicts in Government prisons had most materially diminished, having fallen from 9,000 to 7,000, and therefore there was a considerable want of prisoners for carrying on the public works at Chatham and Portsmouth. The result was that those public works would cost the country £500,000 more than was anticipated in consequence of the short supply of convicts. It would be, of course, in other respects an advantage to the country if there were a decrease in the number of convicts; but he wished to ask why the Government were now proposing to take an additional Vote for conveying convicts to Gibraltar, as the convict establishment at Gibraltar had been universally condemned by every Department and was quite useless.

MR. FLOYER said, in the Report of the Directors of Convict Prisons it was stated that there had been a decrease of charge for convicts during the last three or four years; but this year that decrease appeared to have come to an end. Indeed, there was an increase this year of £25,000. The estimated number of convicts for whom the proposed Vote was to be taken for the year 1868-9, was, according to the tabular statement and given in the Estimates, 7,750, as against 7,470 for the year 1867-8, showing an increase of 280 convict prisoners. He hoped they would receive an explanation on that point from the Secretary to the Treasury; for it was a grave matter for the country if the improvement which had been in progress for some years past had now, without any special cause that he was aware of, ceased, and if crime of a very serious description was again on the increase.

MR. GOLDNEY pointed out that a great number of items of expenditure connected with the management of the convict establishments, and especially the pay of the officials, showed an increase over the previous year.

COLONEL SYKES asked why the number of convicts who were to be provided for was not given in the Estimates each year? It was now the practice to give the number of troops and seamen in the Army and Navy Estimates.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that on the Report he should be able to give more complete information upon the point; but from general information he could state that about 200 convicts were sent to Gibraltar about two months ago, in consequence of the demand from those in charge of the works there for additional labour. As long as Gibraltar was continued, it would be necessary that the works should go on there; but as transportation had ceased, there was now no other drain upon the supply of convict labour.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the whole question of the Gibraltar establishment was gone into by a Committee three or four years ago, and it was certain that the employment of convicts there was unremunerative, while their employment at home was highly remunerative. Gibraltar did not relieve the country permanently of any convicts, as they were all returned to this country. It was only an expensive penal establishment at home.

MR. CANDLISH asked for an explanation of a certain increase of salaries which appeared in the Vote?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that these salaries had been brought under the notice of the Treasury last year, and were revised and increased, some of them on the recommendation of the hon. Gentleman himself.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked why, if convict labour was so remunerative, convicts were liberated before their term of servitude had expired?

MR. LOCKE said, with reference to the Gibraltar establishment, it was most important that they should have the opportunity of sending criminals out of the country. Prisoners thought transportation a much more severe sentence than penal servitude at home with the prospect of a ticket-of-leave before long.

MR. CHILDERS said, that whether a prisoner was sent to Gibraltar or kept at home, the sentence now passed was penal servitude, and the regulations respecting tickets-of-leave were the same.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that the rules respecting the remission of sentences were exceedingly rigid, and the present system of penal servitude was anything but inviting to convicts. Tickets-of-leave were granted upon very strict conditions; those who received them being placed under strict surveillance by the police, and being sent back to prison for the remainder of their term on the smallest infraction of the rules. The system of shortening the period of imprisonments by marks given for good conduct had had a most beneficial effect upon the convicts in insuring their good behaviour during their imprisonment, and there was no fear now of a convict getting released before a fixed period of his sentence had expired.

In answer to Colonel SYKES,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that the charge for bedding and clothing varied according to the stock in hand and the requirements of the establishments.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that there was this year a diminution in the charge for Gibraltar of £10,000.

MR. CANDLISH said, that the charge for salaries at Chatham increased, while for salaries at Dartmoor, a similar establishment, it did not. He moved the reduction of the Vote by £400.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £159,932, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, of the Superintendence of Government Prisons in England and the Expenses of Transportation."—(Mr. Candlish.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that Dartmoor stood upon an entirely different footing from Chatham.

MR. WHALLEY detailed the amounts paid to Roman Catholic chaplains in prisons, and asked upon what principle those salaries were fixed, because only 4 per cent of the prisoners asked for the ministration of Catholic priests?

SIR HENRY EDWARDS said, the abuse of Roman Catholics by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) had been going on ad nauseam; and he hoped the hon. Gentleman's constituents, when he met them next, would ask him what his religion really was, as he thought there was ground for grave doubt on the subject.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the chaplains were paid according to the average number of the prisoners who declared themselves Roman Catholics on entering the prison.

MR. CANDLISH said, he would not press his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INDIA—POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH PENANG.—QUESTION.

Mr. T. BARING said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Post Office Department contemplates the renewal of the direct Postal Communication by Steam Packets with Penang, which that Settlement has enjoyed for the last twenty-two years; and, if so, what are the measures to be adopted?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, this subject had been for some time under the consideration of the Post Office authorities; but he was unable to state that they had arrived at any decision on the subject. The matter was still under their consideration, and perhaps his hon. Friend would repeat his Question on a future day.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE EAST WORCESTERSHIRE ELECTION.

QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BATESON: Being opposed to the endowment of the Church of Rome in any form, I wish to put a Question to the First Minister of the Crown, and I trust he will be able to give a clear and explicit Answer. ["Order."] Well, I will ask him if he can give a clear and explicit Answer; and also, if he is aware that the sympathies of many hon. Members on this side of the House depend upon the Answer he will give? I wish to ask, Whether his attention has been directed to a Letter purporting to be written by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire on the 26th May, with reference to the East Worcestershire Election, in which it is stated that Her Majesty's Government proposed during the present Session to endow the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and also to create a Roman Catholic University, paying its expenses out of the taxes of the country; and how far such statement is correct?

Mr. DISRAELI: Sir, I am afraid my hon. Friend has fallen into a trap which I evaded. My attention was certainly called—as it is called to most things—to a letter purporting to be written by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire on the 26th of May. I believed it to be, and still believe it to be, one of those effusions which, in election language, are sometimes called squibs and sometimes hoaxes. It appeared to me to be a gross caricature of the right hon. Gentleman's least happy style, and as it contained assertions which could not be proved, and which nothing but the excitement of an election would justify, I really have given no further consideration to it.

Mr. GLADSTONE, who rose amid cries of "Order," said: I only wish to give notice to my hon. Friend opposite that I think his Question calls for comment from me. But as I do not wish to interrupt the Business of the House, I will take an opportunity of making such comment on the Question that the House go into Committee of Supply.

ARMY—TRANSPORT OF TROOPS TO INDIA.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE STUCLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is conducive to the health and discipline of officers and men to send them from their depôts in England so that they shall arrive in India during the months of April or May; thus spending their summer, exposed to the heat at Kur-rachee or elsewhere, away from the Commanding Officers of their own regiments, or occupied in travelling during the intense heat of summer to join their regiments in the North-West Provinces?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that last year, in consequence of the system of sending troops overland to India, some of them did arrive somewhat later than they should have done; but with regard to the transport of troops in the approaching season, he hoped none of them would arrive in India later than the month of February.

ARMY—CAVALRY UNIFORMS. QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE STUCLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the statement made by Captain Hozier, in Vol. II. of The Seven Weeks' War, that the 3rd Regiment of Prussian Dragoons, at the Battle of Königgratz, in an attack against the Austrian Cuirassiers, lost very many men and horses, victims to the terrible sword cuts which, coming down upon the shoulder, cut clean through the shoulder blade, and often deep down into the body; that the swords of the same heavy Austrian Cavalry were shivered upon the brass plates of the Uhlans, who marked their track with heaps of dead, dying, and wounded; and, whether, after such experience, it may not be desirable to place some metal protection upon the shoulders of the British soldier?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I cannot pretend to offer any opinion upon a Question of this technical character; and my answer must be that this question of the uniform of the British troops is entirely one for the Executive Departments of the army. All I have to do is to report the Question, and I shall certainly do so, to the Commander-in-Chief.

Mr. Gladstone

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE EAST WORCESTERSHIRE ELECTION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will trespass for a few minutes upon the courtesy of the House. I wish to comment upon the Question put by my hon. Friend opposite (Sir Thomas Bateson) to the First Lord of the Treasury. My hon. Friend asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention had been drawn to a letter purporting to be written by me on the 26th of May, with reference to the East Worcestershire Election, which my hon. Friend says had a considerable effect upon the result of the election. Sir, that is a very great compliment to me; and if he is really correct in his supposition, which I am not vain enough to credit, I receive the statement with satisfaction. He has called the attention of the Head of the Government to that letter. Now, I wish to call the attention of my hon. Friend to the letter; because it seems to me that he has not attended to it, nor does he cite its purport accurately. I will not defend the style of the letter against the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman, which are, perhaps, fair enough under the circumstances; but I own the authorship, and I abide by the assertions. I do not intend to recede from any portion of them. The mistake into which my hon. Friend has fallen is this—He says it is stated in my letter—

"That Her Majesty's Government proposed during the present Session to endow the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and also to create a Roman Catholic University, paying its expenses out of the taxes of the country."

SIR THOMAS BATESON: I omitted from my Notice the words "during the present Session," after reading the letter more carefully.

MR. GLADSTONE: If I had stated that, it would have been an over-statement, because Her Majesty's Government did not propose to endow the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland during the present Session; nor, indeed did they make any proposal upon the subject; and I rather think I carefully refrained from saying that they had made any such proposal. I confined my assertion to the plans they submitted on the subject of the Roman Catholic University. There was a declaration made by the noble Earl the Secretary for Ireland (the Earl of Mayo), which, however important, was not a proposal for the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church. I must also say that I was not guilty of that which the Question of my hon. Friend would seem to impute to me—though I have no doubt he had not the least intention of doing so—namely, of holding up the conduct of the Government to odium specially and singly on account of its being a proposal to endow the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. I do not consider myself, or anyone sitting on the Opposition side of the House, in any manner responsible for the first importation of the odious elements of theological and sectarian strife into this great political controversy. How they were first imported, I will not now inquire; but they were not imported in consequence of anything said by me, or, I was going to add, by anyone on this side of the House; but probably if I were to say so much, the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) might take some offence, and therefore I will make no further reference to it. My statement is in these terms—

“This Government proclaimed ten weeks ago that they were friendly to religious equality in Ireland, provided it was brought about by endowing the other Churches, including the Roman, in Ireland, and not by disendowing the Protestant Church; and by way of earnest they proposed at once to create a Roman Catholic University, and pay its expenses out of the taxes of the country; whereas we take away the Establishment, which now exists, and make no more, in Ireland.”

This, therefore, the plan of concurrent endowment, or general endowment, is what I exhibited as the policy of the Government, and not the plan of endowing the Roman Catholic Church in particular. The hon. Gentleman treated it as a charge against the Government; but, permit me to say, I have never treated it as a charge. The noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Earl of Mayo) stated the other night, and I think with perfect truth, that this plan of concurrent endowment is a plan which had the sanction of some of the greatest names in our history; and though I am not in favour of it, and think that the plan is in itself quite unsatisfactory, and also wholly unsuited to the circumstances and exigencies of the present day, yet far be it from me to presume to pronounce any condemnation either on the measure sanctioned by Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, and a long series of great statesmen whose names I revere, or by the noble Earl and the Gentlemen sitting near him, because I think that the time for the adoption of a plan of that nature has passed away. So much with respect to the assertion of my having brought a charge against the Government that they intended to proceed at once to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church. With regard to the matter itself, to which the supposed charge would have related, it resolves itself into these two points. I stated that the Government saw no objection to bringing about religious equality in Ireland, provided it was done by endowing the other Churches, including the Roman Catholic—that is to say, substantially the Government were favourable to the endowment of the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian Churches, because these are the only ones of sufficient magnitude to require a large endowment; and if they were endowed, perhaps no one would object to any crumbs of endowment which might fall to the lot of other communions. Is that a just or an unjust charge? The noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) stated with regard to the Presbyterians that they receive a grant miserable in amount, and wholly inadequate to their requirements. These words may not in themselves imply that the Regium Donum was to be augmented and the Presbyterian Church more largely endowed as a matter of necessity; but when taken in connection with other words used by the noble Earl, to the effect that religious equality was not objected to, if not effected by the process of levelling down; that the ecclesiastical arrangements of Ireland were to be re-cast, and to a great extent equalized; and that there was no objection to make all the Churches equal, but that result must be secured by elevation, and not by confiscation—it appears to me that what the noble Lord meant by “that result” is perfectly evident. And I must again point out that the noble Earl was not speaking on that occasion in his individual capacity. He was announcing on behalf of the Government their Irish policy, and it was not merely because, as Minister for Ireland, whatever he said on the subject of Ireland had a peculiar importance, but because it was a policy professed and promised beforehand by other Members of the Cabinet in “another place,” as well as in this place, thereby identifying the Cabinet in the strongest manner with what fell from the noble Earl. But I am bound to say that noble Earl’s language in no way went
